Many curious customs exist in the East which we think. In their dress and adornment they express their natures, as the flowers do their sweet and odors. Women are seen in the modest dahlia and violets—they never look or appear bold. Others are like the gaudy tulip or hollyhock. Others are not themselves unless they can come out in the brightest colors, as the tulip or bush, which has not seen women just like white lilies? We know several dozen, unscented by others, and not limited by their diversities, they do not fail to express their true characters, they become a form of expression very genuine and useful.

A new spider has been discovered at the Arunt diggings, Australia. It is about half the size of the common garden spider, and is marked longitudinally with alternate stripes of very dark green and grey. The back is flattened on the top, and the sides are bent. There are fifty varieties from which young spiders may be seen leaving and again returning after a short stay outside.

GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN.

We give on this and the next page, and on pages 520 and 521, several sketches relating to the Army of the Potomac and General GRANT's campaign.

GENERAL STANNARD'S HEAD-QUARTERS, illustrated on this page, is one of the most delightful places within the lines, although only a hundred yards from the enemy's front, and a considerable distance in advance of General SMITH's head-quarters. It is situated in a little ravine, with a brook running at each end, and in the hottest days it is clear of dust and refreshingly cool. The birds build their nests in the trees overhead, and the squirrels play around the quarters just as if they were not within reach of whistling bullets and bursting shells. General STANNARD commands the First Division of the Eighteenth Corps.

We give also on this page a sketch representing the INSPECTION OF THE SECOND PENNSYLVANIA

ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—GENERAL HANCOCK AND STAFF.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

ARTILLERY by GENERAL AMES, as seen from General SMITH'S head-quarters. This regiment is one of the largest in the service, numbering, when it left Washington, over three thousand men. It is commanded by Colonel A. A. GIBSON, who has the rank of Major in the Third United States Artillery.

On this page two illustrations are given, taken from photographs by BRADY; they represent Generals HANCOCK and WARREN surrounded by officers of their staff.

On pages 520 and 521 we publish a view of PETTISBURG as seen from Captain DAVIS'S Battery, First Connecticut Artillery—a portion of the battery appearing in the fore-ground. This battery is situated on the Appomattox River in front of the Eighteenth Corps; it is armed with 30-pound Parrott guns and eight-inch mortars, and completely commands the city. The woods in front and on the flanks are occupied by the enemy's sharpshooters. The Eighteenth Corps up to Thursday, July 28, held the extreme right of GRANT'S lines.

MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON.

JAMES B. M'PHERSON, Major-General of Volunteers and Brigadier-General of the Regular Army, whose Portrait we give on our first page, was born in Sandusky, Ohio, November, 1828. He graduated at West Point in the year 1853, standing at the head of a class which numbered among its members the rebel Generals HOOD, WALKER, and ECHOLS; General SCHOFIELD, Commander of the Army of the Cumberland; General W. S. SMITH, General R. O. TYLER, General SHERIDAN, General TERRIL, who fell at Perryville; and GILL, who was killed at Stone River. Entering the army as Second Lieutenant of Engineers, he was immediately, although hardly twenty-five years of age, appointed as an assistant instructor of practical engineering at West Point. In 1854 he was employed as assistant-engineer on the New York harbor defenses; in 1857 he superintended the construction of Fort Delaware; also the fortifications on Alcatraz Island, San Francisco Bay, California. December 15, 1856, he was appointed First Lieutenant, and until August, 1861, was engaged as Chief of Engineers on the Pacific Coast.

When General HALLECK assumed the command of the Department of the West he selected M'PHERSON as an Aid-de-Camp, with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel. He was GRANT'S Chief Engineer in the operations against Forts Henry and Donelson, and also against Vicksburg. May 15, 1862, he was promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and during the following summer superintended the military railroads in the Department of West Tennessee. When our army at Corinth was cut off from its supplies, in October of that year, he succeeded in bringing up reinforcements to its assistance, and for this service was made Major-General of Volunteers.

It is not, however, merely as an engineer that M'PHERSON has distinguished himself in this war; now he was appointed to guard the rear in a retreat, and now to lead an assault. He and SHERMAN were GRANT'S great allies in the capture of Vicksburg.

When General GRANT recommended his various officers to the Government for promotion for their services at Vicksburg, he wrote as follows about General M'PHERSON:

"He has been with me in every battle since the commencement of the rebellion, except Belmont. At Forts Henry and Donelson, Shiloh, and the siege of Corinth, as a staff officer and engineer, his services were conspicuous and highly meritorious. At the second battle of Corinth his skill as a soldier was displayed in successfully carrying reinforcements to the besieged garrison, when the enemy was between him and the point to be reached. In the advance through Central Mississippi General M'PHERSON commanded one wing of the army with all the ability possible to show, he having the lead in the advance and the rear entitled. In the campaign and siege terminating with the fall of Vicksburg, General M'PHERSON has filled the most eminent part. At the battle of Port Gibson it was under his direction that the enemy was driven, late in the afternoon, from a position that was considered in holding all day against an obstinate attack. His corps, the advance always under his immediate eye, were the pioneers in the movement from Port Gibson to Hawkinson's Ferry. From the North Fork of the Bayou Pierre to Black River it was a constant skirmish, the whole skillfully conducted. The enemy was so closely pressed as to be unable to destroy their bridge of boats after them. General Hawkinson's Ferry to Jackson the Seventeenth Army Corps marched roads not traveled by other troops, fighting the entire battle of the movement, and the bulk of JOHNSTON'S army was fought by this corps, entirely under the management of General M'PHERSON. At Champion Hill the Seventeenth Corps and General M'PHERSON were conspicuous. All that could record a battle there was performed by the divisions of General M'PHERSON'S corps and General HOVEY'S division of the Thirteenth Corps. In the assault of the 22d of May on the fortifications of Vicksburg, and during the entire siege, General M'PHERSON and his command took unfading laurels. He is one of the ablest engineers and most skilful Generals. I would respectfully, but urgently recommend his promotion to the position of Brigadier-General in the regular army."

The appointment was given to date from August 1, 1863.

On the 12th of March, 1864, on the promotion of Lieutenant-General GRANT to the command of the United States armies, and General SHERMAN to the command of the military division of the Mississippi, General M'PHERSON was placed in command of the Army and Department of the Tennessee, embracing the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Army Corps.

In SHERMAN'S advance on Atlanta M'PHERSON has conducted some of the most gigantic flank movements of the war. At Fayetteville, Jonesboro, Dallas, he obtained an important victory, driving the enemy and inflicting on him a loss of 10,000 killed and wounded. After crossing the Chattahoochee he held the extreme right of SHERMAN'S army at Decatur, and was here killed in the battle of Friday, the 22d. He was shot while riding along his lines, superintending the advance of his skirmish line, by a band of rebel bushwhackers in ambush. Then occurred the most notably disgraceful act which has ever blackened the annals of civilized warfare. Having shot M'PHERSON, the rebels took the body and stripped it of its clothing. Colonel STRONG, however, had a charge and secured the body. Thus the Army of the Tennessee lost its brave commander.

MAJOR-GENERAL OLIVER O. HOWARD.

GENERAL OLIVER O. HOWARD, whose portrait we give on our first page, and who, according to late advices, was to succeed General M'PHERSON in command of the Army of the Tennessee, is a native of Maine. He entered West Point in the year 1850, was brevetted Second Lieutenant of Ordnance in 1854, and First Lieutenant in 1857, when he was appointed Assistant Professor of Mathematics. This position he held until the beginning of the war, when he became Colonel of the Third Maine Regiment. Many of our readers will remember the march of this regiment in Canada gray uniforms down Broadway, June 6, 1861. In the battle of Bull Run HOWARD'S brigade stood side by side with those of HEINTZELMAN, FRANKLIN, and SICKLES in the hottest of the fight. Six weeks afterward he was appointed Brigadier-General, at which time he was with MEADE, CASEY, MCCOOK, RICHARDSON, MELROY, and LEW WALLACE. In the battle of Chancellorsville HOWARD commanded the Eleventh Corps, having a short time previously been appointed a Major-General. He had been in all the great battles of the Peninsular Campaign, where he had gained a reputation of unusual talent. At Antietam he took the command of SUMNER'S Division after that officer had been compelled by two severe wounds to leave the field. But here at Chancellorsville he was placed over men who were not known to him, and the task was a difficult one. It was upon this Eleventh Corps that the weight of STONEWALL JACKSON'S advance fell on the memorable 2d of May, when A German brigade on the right gave way. Division after division broke and fled. HOWARD was left almost alone. He begged his men, and threatened them; but all in vain, the day was lost. At Gettysburg and Chattanooga, and on many other fields, this Corps has retrieved its honor, and compelled admiration. In SHERMAN'S present campaign General HOWARD has played an important part. On the 19th of June he wrested from the enemy an important position, which, in an attempt to retake, the rebels lost nearly a thousand men without gaining their object. General HOWARD has lost his right arm in his country's service. It used to be a joke between him and KEARNEY, who had lost his left arm, that, as a matter of economy, they might purchase their gloves together.

SWEET FACES.

CHILD-FACES round us beaming,
How wonderful they are!
Although so common-seeming,
Yet each a perfect star;
In every cr owded city
These new conceits have birth,
And thoughts of God in pity
Are thus express'd on Earth.

When Katie's face I'm viewing,
If she's at work or play,
Whatever she is doing,
She leads my mind away
To where bright birds are winging
Swift flight from tree to tree,
And songs to her are singing,
Or so it seems to me.

There's Rose, a little lady,
Now nearly ten years old,
So quaint and so old-mindly,
So shy, and bold withal;
In all she says so clever,
In all she does so kind,
And sunlight shines whatever
Her gravest looks behind.

There's Annie, always smiling,
I think she can not frown,
That smile is so beguiling,
Oh, could I write it down!
Oh! could I to these pages
The perfect charm impart,
To bind forever all the ages
The deathless human heart!

If one sweet face has vanished
That seemed to us divine,
From one delight we're banished,
Yet are not left to pine;
For freely in all places,
As flowers upon the sod,
Spring up these childish faces,
So bountiful is God!

A SCHOOL-GIRL'S STORY.

I.

"A new scholar, girls, and for our room, too!"

It was study-hour in Room A, but as Hallie Parker ran in, breathless with haste, books were pushed out of sight, and study suspended while all discussed the news she brought.

"I saw her in Dr. Ealing's office just now."

"But are you sure she is to be a boarder, Hallie?"

"Quite sure, Carry. Her father is with her, at least I presume it is her father, and while Miss Ealing was giving me my theme-book, I heard the gentleman say that he understood from the general rule of the institution to admit pupils after October, but he would gladly violate the rule in this instance for the sake of having his daughter under his care." His very words, girls, so you see 'Miss Katharine' must be of considerable importance in the Professor's eyes."

"I wonder who she is? What kind of person is she, Hallie?"

"What kind of person?" Hallie repeated, slowly. "Well, she is just the loveliest creature I have ever seen!"—and the dreamy look, indeed, I never knew a girl more religiously devoted to self-culture; and I use the advverb advisedly, for in its highest sense selfculture was a part of her religion.

To us she was ever kind, ever gracious, goodnatured, but never to oblige. During all the months of our living together, in fact, we never but once saw Katharine Veighn angry, and that once we never forgot.

Thus we learned to know her and learned to love her as few school-girls are loved by their fellows, but we learned no more. Most of us, girl-like, had our little romances more or less earnest, our little heart-secrets, tinging our lives with those delicious rose-color only found in the balmy air of early youth. Of these Katharine had, or seemed to have, no share. In the growing visions of the future she often listened, adding now and then a touch of her own bright fancy; but of love, lover, or marriage, she never, herself, so much as spoke; and with all her graciousness of manner there was always about her a sort of stately dignity that forbade question.

So we came to think her proud and cold, misjudging her as we did too oft, alas! unjustly, her sisters. Even Mollie Harris, with all her talent for weaving the brightest Goblin of fancy out of the veriest cobweb of fact, could build no airy castle for Katharine Veighn.

"I tell you, girls, she is not like other women. She is far superior to her very ordinary sun, and there are no heroes nowadays. That ring is a gift from some one else; who knows? perhaps it was her mother's."

One peculiarity of Katharine's was, that she held no letter Katharine was there, were you not?"

"Yes, ma'am," Hallie replied. "Dr. Ealing was talking with the young lady's father about receiving 'Miss Katharine,'" and Hallie threw a comical look across the table.

"Not her father, my dear; the gentleman was her guardian. She is an orphan, doubly so, fatherless and motherless since childhood."

"Do you know her very well, Miss Ealing?" Carry ventured to ask, finding our governess so unusually communicative.

"Not at all, Carry, but papa knew her parents, and esteemed them very highly. I think you will find Katharine a very pleasant addition to our little circle."

"She is quite a young lady, Hallie says, Miss Ealing," Carry's voice was quite tremulous, and, as Miss Ealing replied, with her glance turned smilingly on the questioner, that "Katharine was decidedly more of a young lady than some of us," her eyes sought the floor, and her face vibrated between unusual pallor and flush. Her love of fun got the better of her, however, and she led in the laugh that followed at her expense. The laugh was quickly hushed as the door opened, and Dr. Ealing entering, announced,

"Miss Katharine Veighn, young ladies. I bring you your new charge, daughter; I am sure she will not be a troublesome one. Girls, I commend Miss Katharine to your kindness, trusting you will make Room A very pleasant for her."

As our principal withdrew we resumed our seats, and the newcomer advanced to receive the cordial greeting of our governess. I sat nearest to her, and I found to look up to I should meet her eye; but the looks and gestures of admiration passing around the table told me that Hallie Parker had for once at least not exaggerated. Presently,

"Phebe, I will assign Katharine to you as a partner. You are the only one not mated, I believe."

As I rose, Miss Ealing presented me to her.

"This is Miss Phebe Warner, Katharine. She will show you to your room to lay aside your wrappings."

The young lady's hat and cloak were soon removed, and passing her little white hands carelessly over her dark hair, Katharine announced herself ready to go down.

Once at the table with us, the young stranger strove to enter into our employments. Having no work for the time, Carry Hallie, introducing her, and indeed all the girls, by name. Hallie found a skein of silk, and Katharine held it while the owner wound.

There, at last, I could look at her.

How beautiful! Yes, how beautiful was Katharine Veighn! Tall, slender, graceful in figure, almost faultless in face, with a queenly stateliness of manner, joined with a winning grace a child might have worn, Katharine Veighn was a woman to win admiration, almost to dread of a few romantic young girls—a woman to be loved and honored as queens are loved and honored—a woman, whom to win, a king might have thrown down his crown and life.

All this I thought as I watched the classic head, with its heavy coils of black hair, bending slightly over the hand-skein. The large dark eyes shining softly beneath their long black lashes, the clear, pale complexion, the delicate lips, as the speaker or smiled; the perfect mouth with its lovely, childlike smile, and its proud curve when at rest. How beautiful beyond beauty, how stately, how gracious was Katharine Veighn!

The tangled skein—ah, yes! that was how we came to see it. Katharine slipped the skein from her left hand, carefully, so as not to increase the entanglement, and pulled indolently at an obstinate knot. Just then, Mollie Harris touched my arm. I looked up and caught, as her hand moved, the flash sparkle of a diamond engagement ring. "On the engagement finger, too," as Mollie whispered in my ear, at the first opportunity. I dreamed of her that night, in a princess robed in purple and ermine, and thought a fair-haired prince knelt to woo her, and placed upon her hand a jeweled ring of betrothal.

Days passed, and it was Christmas-time, and we knew little more of Katharine Veighn; little more at least of the inner side of her thoughts, her dreams, her secrets. Outwardly her noble character grew before us and upon us every day. We had learned to love her, and though the cold reserve companion was far beyond us in scholarship. She was richly gifted, and every gift had been cultivated to the utmost. Indeed, I never knew a girl more religiously devoted to self-culture; and I use the advverb advisedly, for in its highest sense selfculture was a part of her religion.

To us she was ever kind, ever gracious, goodnatured, but never to oblige. During all the months of our living together, in fact, we never but once saw Katharine Veighn angry, and that once we never forgot.

Thus we learned to know her and learned to love her as few school-girls are loved by their fellows, but we learned no more. sad disasters to our arms with prophecies of a speedy and glorious retrieving.

One day at noon, as Miss Eling was about laying down her paper, she said, sadly:

"Another long list of killed and wounded, girls. Many of them are Pennsylvanians, too, poor fellows!"

After reading the names she resumed her work, and Carry Burns asked:

"May I call Katharine Veighn, Miss Eling, if you please? I know she would like to see the list."

"Certainly, Carry. You will find her in the music-room yonder, I think," nodding toward a door, standing ajar.

Carry entered, but started back with a wild cry:

"Oh, Miss Eling, she is dead!"

In a moment we were in the next room. Katharine was kneeling by the music-stool, her head and outstretched arms hidden forward upon it. Her face was livid, and her hands cold as death.

Silencing our outcries with the assurance "it was only a swoon," our governess dispatched some of us for Dr. Eling and the school-physician; some for water and restoratives. As for me, as Miss Eling held Katharine in her arms, I knelt beside her, chafing and kissing the cold, cold fingers.

At last, after long effort, we won her back to life. The deathlike pallor gave way slowly to living warmth and brightness, as the rich blood awoke from its deep slumber, and presently, with a long, shuddering sigh, she opened her eyes and looked around upon our anxious faces. She tried to rise, but, succeeding, was glad to sink into an arm-chair's shelter.

Miss Eling asked, kindly,

"My dear child, how did this happen? Why did you not call when you first were feeling ill?"

"I could not—I did not know."

The words were fairly grasped, as if with a new agony, and she covered her face with her hands.

"Are you in pain, Miss Katharine?"

The physician waited a moment, then repeated his question. Raising herself she looked up into the kind old man's face.

"In no physical pain, thank you, Sir. I think I will go to my room for a little while, however."

All hastened to assist her, but she declined.

"Thank you, Miss Eling, thank you, girls, you are all very kind, but if Pa'lee will help me here am I shall get up very nicely."

I sprang to offer it, crying like the rest, for the utter unnaturalness of this meek, and manner fell upon our hearts with a chilling dread. As we reached the sleeping-hall she stopped and kissed me.

"Thank you, child, I do not need you any longer."

I insisted upon waiting to see her comfortably in bed, but such a negative gesture also passed in and locked the door.

The next morn at the foot of the staircase with troubled faces; and Carry met me here.

"Did you notice, as Miss Eling read that list, several names from the —st Pennsylvania? Colonel R——'s regiment, you know. Do you think she could have heard them?"

I could not tell, but I thought—yes.

At tea-time Katharine came down, looking pale and worn, and thenceforth she resumed her school duties as usual. As usual, have I said? Alas, no!—not as usual with Katharine Veighn. The heart was gone from her work, the head and the hands went on with their mechanical tasks as best they might. Katharine's smiles were faint and rare now, and there was a look in her dark eyes that told of a sorrow too deep for words—too deep even for tears.

The brightness had died out of our school-life, and a sober quiet was setting upon us hitherto undreamed of in Room A. All felt it—none could explain it; only Carry knew that a deep grief had fallen upon Katharine Veighn and each of us; even the wild Carry strove to make the burden lighter for her. Changes came quickly to the school, and all this had occurred within little more than a week after Katharine's illness.

One evening after tea Allie Milner, a lovely child of eight or nine years, entered our room with a message for Miss Eling from the Principal. The little girl had evidently been weeping violently, and as our governess was passing out she asked her kindly,

"What is the matter, Allie? You seem to be in sad trouble."

Struggling to keep back the tears, Allie replied,

"My dear Uncle Alan has been killed by the rebels."

"Poor child!" and the kind-hearted woman sighed as she kissed the little mourner and spoke a few consoling words. "You may stay with the young ladies until bedtime, dear, if you wish. Girls, try to amuse her for a while."

Allie came over to the study-table as Miss Eling left, and talked to us, between her sobs, of her uncle.

"He was so good and handsome, Miss Carry, and such a brave soldier! Mamma's letter says grandma has been very ill ever since they heard he was killed, and that was about a week ago, so maybe grandma's dead too," and her grief burst out afresh.

"What was your uncle's name, dear, and in what regiment was he?"

It was Katharine that asked. She had been poring sadly over a long letter, and I do not think she had heard any thing previously. Startled by the child's crying, she had turned to listen.

"He was Lieutenant Alan Fielding, of the —st Pennsylvania."

She had hardly ended when Katharine caught her up in her arms and covered the tear-stained little face with eager, passionate kisses. We were amazed—the child more than all; but the youngest pupils looked up to Katharine with a sort of hateful idolatry, and Allie forgot her troubles as she threw her arms around the young girl's neck and exclaimed,

"Oh, thank you, Miss Katharine. You are so good! But why do you kiss me so? You never did before. Is it because you love me now?"

"Yes, dear, because I love you now."

Katharine Veighn's face was almost bright again, as she cradled her little figure in her arms, laying her cheek against Allie's, while she lovingly smoothed the golden curls.

"Please hold me so, Miss Katharine, until Miss Eling comes. Sit down in that chair by the window, and rock me, please."

Established to her liking, Allie asked,

"May I tell you about my dear Uncle Alan, Miss Katharine? The wicked rebels have killed him, you know."

"Yes, dear."

Katharine's face was turned away from us; her voice was very low and tremulous.

"He was mamma's youngest brother; and we all loved him so dearly! He was so handsome—almost as beautiful as you are, Miss Katharine, only he had not black hair. His eyes were such a lovely blue, just like the sky up there where it is so clear; and his hair was like mine, in such pretty curls!"

Here I noticed the listener press her lips to the bright hair.

"He was always so good and kind to grandma; and she loved him better than any of us. Oh, Miss Katharine, what will she do, I wonder?"

"I can not tell, Allie."

The voice still trembled; the child went on, in her simple way, not waiting for further answer. At last she said suddenly, after a little silence,

"When I was home, last summer, I heard dear grandma say that some day she would have another daughter, because Uncle Alan had a beautiful lady—loved her, oh, very, very dearly! What will she do now?"

Katharine's face was looking out into the deepening twilight, and she made no answer.

"Miss Katharine, what will she do now?"

"God knows, darling!"

Now the voice was shaken as with agony hardly controlled, and the child sprang from Katharine's arms, and with a sudden cry of pain and remorse.

There was a deep hush in the room, for Carry Burns was crouching upon the floor, and I knew there were pitying tears in other eyes than hers.

III.

It was the night of Wednesday, June 25, 1862, the night of my betrothal; some other announcement would be on the morrow. The friends or relatives of most of the pupils were in town, and the whole school was in an agitation of preparation and expectancy. As we came up from tea the lights were already gleaming in the church opposite, and Miss Eling's voice was sounding through the halls, summoning the Rooms to rehearsal. Room A was the last to go over, and we found the platform filled with teachers and pupils, and the body of the church with a stranger audience much larger than desirable for a rehearsal.

It was Katharine's turn to sing. Hearing her name she arose, throwing down the bandage on which she was stitching, with a heavy sigh that went to my heart. I caught her hand.

"What is it, Flora?"

I did not dare to intrude upon her sorrow, she had not confided in me though I guessed it all, but I longed to comfort her; so I drew her down to me and whispered,

"Katharine, remember God knows!"

She stood violently, and a deep crimson flashed over her pale face as she kissed me, with a scarcely audible

"Thank you, Phebe. I will try to remember."

"Mees Veighn! Mees Veighn! Vy come you not ven I call?"

Madame's voice was raised impatiently, and Katharine withdrew her hand. Upon reaching the piano the flush had all departed, and I noticed, in the full blaze of light, how pale and thin the beautiful face had grown of late.

Her voice was superb and her execution usually faultless, but on this evening she sang in a cold, indifferent way that almost put the excitable German beside herself.

"Mees Veighn! Mees Veighn! I will not have it! I tell you, Sir, she shall sing! Mees Veighn—ja, gimtlich! gimtlich! You have sing me vare so bad before; now shall you not begin! You shall sing dis ting, dis day you have parfect—all! Comprehend?"

Katharine looked at Madame with a kind of proud surprise at her violence, and said,

"I can not sing it better, Madame, at least not this evening. I have done my best."

"Cas not! Cas not! Ach, hieher Himmel! Vat mean you mit cas not, Mees Veighn! I tell you you must dey! you must sing! Nun, noch einmal, you must it sing, I say, parefect! Nun?"

Katharine sighed wearily but took up the score for one more trial, and Madame's angry fingers dashed through the opening chords, fortissimo!

"Nun! Vy begin you not, Mees Veighn?"

"Look at Katharine!"

Madame and Carry spoke at once and with almost equal vehemence. I shall not forget what I saw! I hope it is not irreverent to confess that I knew from that what Paul means when he says of Stephen, "And, looking steadfastly on him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel."

The young girl's countenance was absolutely transfigured, glorified with such an ecstasy of happiness as even in most of us not once in a lifetime even in our dreams.

Lips apart, bosom heaving, cheeks all aglow, hand raised, as if to keep silence lest the blessed vision should vanish forever, Katharine stood with her head bending slightly forward, her eyes fixed upon the main entrance of the church. Thence Dr. Eling was hurrying toward the platform, accompanied by a young officer in lieutenant's uniform, bearing his sword-arm in a sling. The soldierly bearing, the easy, gentlemanly carriage, the handsome high-bred face, with its delicate, perfect oneness of feature and purity of complexion, the broad, high forehead, with a fresh scar running into its shadowing of golden hair, I noticed all this ere he reached us.

He was upon the platform in a moment, a great joy lighting up his pale, emaciated face.

The crowd of girls parted—he passed between—he stood face to face with Katharine Veighn. He held out his left arm, the uninjured one, and in a moment more it was around her, drawing her closer, closer to the warm living heart she had long thought dead and cold upon the bloody sod of Virginia, and she was weeping—weeping in tears of glad thanksgiving the heavy, heavy burden of weeks of tearless bereavement.

And a little head, bright with its crown of golden curls, was peering through the crowd, and a blithe young voice was crying out,

"Oh, Uncle Alan! Uncle Alan!"

THE LUCKY BLUNDER.

"My friend," wrote the ex-Minister Fouquet fo La Fontaine, whom he had so often benefited, "you see me at Vaux where I was at the height of my power. When you read this I shall be buried alive in a dungeon. After depriving me of my property and my liberty they will seek to take my head; and the King, deceived by them, will grant it to them, unless the only person who can save me undertakes to establish my innocence. This person is Mdlle. de la Vallière. Give her the letter I send you with."

"Fouquet in prison! Fouquet on the point of being executed!" sobbed La Fontaine, as he read the letter. "That shall never be. It is impossible: it is a dream."

Then, directly he recovered from his momentary stupefaction, he hastened to Mdme. La Sablière's, where he knew that all the courtiers who were not at Vaux with the King would be assembled, and at once, and to the great scandal of all present, began to ask what news had been heard of Fouquet, and whether it was true that his Majesty was disposed to judge him severely.

This was a forbidden subject—so much so, that not only would no one answer the poor warmhearted poet, but he even found deprecatory glances directed at him from all sides.

"Have you seen the King return from Marly?" asked La Fontaine.

Yes—a few.

"What will be the fate of poor Fouquet?" he inquired.

No one would say. He asked the ladies—he asked the gentlemen, he applied to these in favor with the King, and to those whom the King disdained; but he could obtain no information on a subject which, by common consent, was proscribed. Molière and Mdme. La Sablière were the only persons present who could not sympathize entirely with the warm-hearted man; but they really knew no more of Fouquet's fate than did La Fontaine himself.

The company had dined and dessert was served. Never had a dessert been so dull before, and it must be remembered that poets and writers generally are not tolerable in high society unless they are distinguished for wit among. However, as soon as the dessert was put upon the table, La Fontaine composed, and gravely to the assembled guests,

"Ladies and gentlemen, I have a question of the greatest importance to propose to you."

"Ah bah!" cried the guests. "I thought we should have him at last."

"We are going to have a discussion," said the sage.

"We are going to shine," said the wits.

"We are going to have compliments paid us," said the ladies.

Every one paid the most scrupulous attention to the words of the worthy but hitherto dull La Fontaine.

At last he opened his lips.

"Can any of you tell me," he began, "when his Majesty will return from Marly, and what is the fate of the unfortunate Fouquet?"

The poor man thought that he had already put these questions ten times to every one present.

Mdme. de la Sablière and Molière exchanged a glance of intelligence and pity, but the rest of the guests preserved the most rigid silence.

Fouquet was evidently to receive a loud laugh.

"By Heavens! gentlemen, this is no laughing matter," thundered out the usually timid and reserved La Fontaine.

The young men were abashed, and answered not a word.

"What a noble man!" said Mdme. de Sablière to Molière. "He is as fine as your Alceste."

Mr. Fouquet is accused of all sorts of crimes," continued the fabulist, with renewed courage, "but he is innocent of them all."

A shudder ran through the company. In spite of Molière, who tried to restrain him, the good La Fontaine said again,

"He is innocent, and I tell you so. And I will tell the King the same, and will defend him every where."

"Mad! evidently mad!" muttered one of the courtiers to his intimate friend sitting by his side.

"You were waiting me as excite some verses a little while ago," he went on. "I will recite you some now that I have composed on this very subject of Fouquet and his arrest."

And the poet read about his beautiful lines to the "Nymphs of Vaux," in which Fouquet is enthusiastically defended under the name of Oronte.

Mdme. de la Sablière gave the signal for applause, which soon became general. Whatever the company might think of Fouquet's affair, and the prudence of openly defending a disgraced minister, there could be no two opinions as to the beauty of La Fontaine's verses.

Molière at that moment rose and spoke a few words to M. de la Cavoie, the least courtier-like of all the courtiers. It was of him that Louis XIV. once when in a merry humor had a conversation with Racine, "There is M. de Cavoie teaching Racine how to be a courtier, and Racine teaching M. de Cavoie how to be a poet. An excellent plan for making a bad poet and a bad courtier."

Nevertheless, M. de Cavoie was able to introduce La Fontaine to the King, and did so as soon as his Majesty returned. The Dauphin recognized the poet at once, and called out his name—a terrible sin against court etiquette. The King frowned at the offender, the Princesses smiled, and La Fontaine felt at his Majesty's feet.

"Yes, Sire, I am La Fontaine," said the fabulist; "the most humble of your Majesty's subjects, and the most unhappy. I have come here to implore your Majesty's justice and clemency for M. Fouquet."

For a fortnight no one had dared to pronounce the name in the presence of the King, on pain of a deathlike silence reigned, but nevertheless La Fontaine continued:

"Pardon my assurance of Court usages, Sire said, "and listen only to the dictates of your own generous heart. M. Fouquet has committed no crime. His enemies have dared to accuse him to your Majesty, but he is really innocent."

The King motioned to the guards, and was about to order the unfortunate fabulist into arrest when he saw that he held a paper in his hand. La Fontaine had resolved to offer to his Majesty his "Nymphs of Vaux." He had, in fact, composed it for that very purpose.

"Give me that paper," said the King. "What is it?"

"Some verses, Sire, that I venture to submit to your Majesty," said the fabulist, as he presented the paper.

The King unfolded it; started, frowned, read it from beginning to end, and then, in a voice thick with emotion, said to the petitioner,

"You love Fouquet?"

"Yes, Sire. You shall know it. Fouquet's fate afterward."

Then the King rose from his seat, and it became evident now that he was in a violent passion.

"Ah!" exclaims the fabulist, to himself, "what have I done? I have ruined my benefactor."

At length, however, La Fontaine remembered that he had still the letter for Mdlle. de la Vallière, and he was once more sufficiently master of his recollection, for he already knew her and esteemed her, as did every one else who was acquainted with her, for her disinterestedness and her tender, loving heart.

She has more influence with the King than any of them," said he to himself. "She will speak to his Majesty, and my poor benefactor will yet be saved."

La Fontaine hastened, then, to Mdlle. de la Vallière, and, taking a folded paper from his pocket, excused, without losing time in any preliminaries,

"Mdlle. Mademoiselle, from M. Fouquet, now the most unhappy of mankind."

The favorite opened the paper, and, after trembling violently for a time, and then bursting into a more satisfied look, which at length became a beneficent smile, to the contrary. La Fontaine was in raptures. When she had finished, Mdlle. de la Vallière said, with a look of delight,

"Admirable! admirable! charming. You, of course, will me to present them to his Majesty ?"

"Verses, Mademoiselle? No! It is a letter from M. Fouquet."

"Excuse me; but here are the verses, and here is your signature at the end."

La Fontaine was in despair. He had given his verses to Mdlle. de la Vallière! Then he must have given Fouquet's letter—that terrible, compromising letter—to the King!

"Good Heavens! is it possible?" exclaimed the favorite, in a voice of terror, when the poet explained to her what a terrible blunder he had committed.

And out ran La Fontaine, now again in a state of despair, and exclaiming, as he struck his forehead, "I have killed him! I have killed my benefactor!"

On leaving Mdlle. de la Vallière's presence he, in fact, believed that Fouquet had been condemned to death. But he was determined to make one more effort to save him. He rushed to his friend M. de la Cavoie, and implored his powerful influence. Cavoie listened to ran my risk rather than let his benefactor suffer through his fault.

He hastened to M. de la Cavoie how terrible and fatal a blunder he had committed, and was giving vent to his despair and his despair, when suddenly an officer of the guard entered and asked whether M. de la Cavoie knew where to find M. de la Fontaine.

"Here I am," cried the poet, as he rose.

"His Majesty wishes to see you," said the officer. "Follow me."

"Follow me! pardon me, Sire!" cried the poet when he found himself in the King's presence. "I cet your vengeance fall on me alone, fore alone am to blame."

"Hire," said the King. "An hour since M. Fouquet was condemned to death."

La Fontaine shuddered with horror.

"But now I revoke the sentence. He will be imprisoned or banished; but his life is spared."

La Fontaine wept with joy.

"Go to your friend at that table," continued the King, "and communicate this news to your friend yourself."

La Fontaine collected all his strength, and wrote two hasty lines to his friend and benefactor to tell him that he was not to die.

"Now," said the King, the mystery was simple enough. Fouquet's enemies had succeeded in persuading the King that Fouquet was a successful rival in the good graces of Mdlle. de la Vallière. Now Fouquet's letter, which had fallen into his hands by accident—evidently by accident—contained the following lines, which at once proved how far Fouquet was from being the successful lover of the lady who had now gained entire possession of the heart of the King:

"You alone can save me," said Fouquet, "by telling his Majesty the simple truth. You, who replied my verses so delightfully, know better than any one that it was not carried very far, and that I obtained the copy of your letter in a strange manner. Pardon me, and you will be the cause of my being pardoned."

GIVE HIM NO CHANCE.

BREAK up the road of the prisoner released,
Cover his pathway with shame;
Brand the man as
That he never can know
The wealth of a worthier name.

Open the gates, and tell him to earn
The wage of an honest man's toil;
Then follow him out,
And dog him about—
A CAIN on the breadth of the soil.

Let him doff prison garb—once more let him wear
The dress of his free fellow-men;
Then cut off his chance,
Without his advance,
And let him be cursed again.

To his car keep the promise, that plenty of work
Waits either in country or town;
Then break to the hope—
Bind the man with the rope
Of evil repute—and turn down.

"Go, sin no more," said the Master of men—
'Twas a pardon untainted with guile;
And we say the same,
But we think it no blame
To cheat our forgiveness a while.

Day after day he calls out for help,
But finds it all vain to implore;
Help must not come,
Not even a crumb
Is thrown from the callous world's door.

Not alone shall the stain of his guilty record
Be fixed on the felon enlarged;
But the brand of his shame
Must be hung on the name
Of his kindred as they are discharged.

Then the man setteth down with a gnashing of teeth,
And a clenching of hands in the air;
Then returns to the thief,
With a bowl of relief,
And a scornful and vengeful despair.

QUITE ALONE.

CHAPTER XI.

A DEAD AND GONE FESTIVAL.

WHEN poor little Lily reached the foot of the common staircase she found nobody there but the portress, who was engaged in a more or less amicable dispute with the aforesaid portress of the house, who, with the assistance of a donkey, a cart, and several cans, was in the habit of bringing good milk to the particularized people. She had just informed the Auvergnat that he was a fiche bête; to which he had responded that she, the portress, was a vieille sorcière, who was born in the time of Pharamond, and had not invented a grapnel. Thereupon Madame la Concierge was about making an assault upon the uncivil milk-seller with her broom; but at this conjuncture the postman fortunately entered the lodge with the early batch of letters, and for ten minutes or so the portress had quite enough to do in examining the superscriptions, peeping between the interstices of the envelopes, and smelling the seals of the missives brought by the Mercury of the Rue Jean Jacques Rousseau.

"Pouah! comme on parle mosc," she said, posing one delicious-looking billet. "Pink paper, too, satiné! Allons donc! And a hand like a spider out for a promenade, and all that for the roi-faisant whom he has his varnished boots mended, and owes two terms to our proprietor. Ah, ah, my fine, if you don't have warning before another month is over your head my name is not Cornelie Degrenay. Il pleuvera des cornes dans cette maison. Why, how now, ma petite, whither are you bound so early?"

This was to Lily, who had timidly asked for the cordon.

"I am going for a walk—I am going to take a bath."

Lily faltered. It is certain that nobody yet ever did say thing wrong in this world without having to pay for so many falsehoods in payments with. The embryo murderer has to tell a lie about the pistol or dagger, the would-be suicide about the poison he purchases. The boys down which the bad ship Wickedness slides to destruction must be greased with lies. Lily's criminality was of no very deep dye; yet you see she had been unable to try a pace in her expedition without telling a fib.

"There you are, then," said the portress, pulling the desired check-string. "Go thy ways, and a little good-morning to thee. Ah! quelle petite mauvaise," she continued, musing as the girl glanced through the portal; "she gives herself no airs, and, all things considered, is not far from being pretty. Cela a un petit air de rêve du tout tout pas mal. Going to take a bath, was she? Well, it's hot enough. I wouldn't mind one myself if that pot-au-feu did not demand my attention." Good old portress! Since twenty years had she been preoccupied by that same pot-au-feu, perpetually simmering. "Mais dites moi donc au peu, what on earth makes all the girls in our time so very anxious to take baths? Does that reckless Coquelin keep the baths of La Samaritaine, I should like to know? When I was a girl we were not so fond of bathing."

And Madame la Concierge, having concluded her examination of the postal delivery, proceeded to skim her pot-au-feu.

Lily went but into the great desert: to her quite trackless, and barren of oases. She had cast her skin, as it were. She had done with her old friends, her old habits, the old-new name with which they had invested her. She was now only Lily, and Quite Alone.

Still, though she was solitary among a crowd of thousands, and could not hope, between sunrise and sundown, to light upon one friendly human face there; though she was cast as a frail cock-boat, without mast or rudder or pilot, in the wide ocean, stretching she knew not whither; though she had scarcely the means of obtaining that night's shelter or to-morrow's bread, Lily was in business. She was preoccupied. She had affairs of moment on hand. There never was, I conceive, any so idle, short of death, who, like Lily at the outset of the question, could not remember that he had something to do. Lily was quite overwhelmed with business. She had to get to England: God alone knew how. She was to do something little guessed at by living God alone knew what. Oh! she was a fully-engaged and absorbed young person; but, first of all, there was that bath to be had. Conversant in the ways of the world as she was, she dared not flatter herself that nineteen francs seventeen centimes would be her to London. Indeed, she had scarcely pronounced that word as yet; but it was latent in her mind, and unconsciously that she was going to London. Not a Turk in Asia Minor wakes up from his pipe-trance and thinks he would like to be in Tranquistan; not a Lascar coolie ships on board a homeward-bound Indiaman; not a long-tailed vagabond of Shanghai lays in a stock of rice and shark's sides for a voyage across the main; not a Genoese beggar-boy is sold by his parents to grind the organ in the English hereties, but knows, although he may scarcely have mastered the words to say it, that he shall see London.

The locket! The locket! Lily knew that she was about to do a naughty thing, and, desperately set her mind wavering upon the deed, she tried to stave off the evil moment of commission for yet a little time longer. Bishop, who murdered the Italian boy with Burke and with his children half an hour before he slew him. He, too, had on his first murder been so fascinated in deferring the thing for thirty minutes. We like to put the consummation of our villainy off. A coward in a pantomime will do once that he counted seven hundred and fifty, neither more nor less, before he took pen in hand to commit the forgery which sent him to penal servitude for twenty years. I knew a man who repaired to the counting-house with the intolerience told him sin would follow. As he was biding tyse a flash of remorse came over him. He was turning a piece of money in his hands he vowed that if, when he drew it out, head should be uppermost, he would abandon his intent, and go away before the fatal deed was done. It was head uppermost;—whereupon the man broke his vow and kept his tryst to the latter end. Lily was not quite so much dazed as that.

So, when Lily knew well that the locket must be sold, her poor little trembling spirit was casting about on every side for a respite, were it even for the fraction of a day, before she set. She must be quick about it. She knew that; for discovery and pursuit, although not probable, were just barely possible. Oh! for another minute, another half hour, before she would be forced to confess her crime even to her own eyes. Fortuitously, the bright morning air reminded her that she was hungry; and she remembered that she had left her breakfast. Where was such a meal to be obtained? She had walked as yet up one street and down another, and progressed in a northerly and an easterly direction, but had not yet come to a restaurant. She saw plenty of cafés around her: splendid cafés, all gilding and plate-glass; restaurants, with the savory odors smelling of smoke, dirty, and generally ill-favored. The cafés were full of people, who were visible in most of these cafés as she peeped through the glazed doors frightened Lily. There were one spectacled student over a duffy white bit, a great glass screwed into one eye, a twisted chin-tuft like a colossal comma: who, with his hands stuffed into the pockets of a pair of tartan trousers so wide at the waist and so narrow at the ankle that they looked like the bags of Scotch snuff, was standing, smoking, on the steps of a coffee-house in the Rue Monsmartre. Lily feared Lily's appearance would be passed him, sticking his arms akimbo, and humming something about "La Faridondaine. She should certainly have been frightened away. Oh! she must make haste to get to England: vague intuition told her that London was a very secluded place, and that she was but a dumb in the midst of five hundred thousand wolves.

She saw set a number of shops in which windows were displayed two large bowls full of milk, with a sky-blue basin and a yellow scum on their surface; sundry jugs of boulevert crusted flowers; a siphon of eau de Seltz; a flap of raw meat with a cucumber and a lemon lying thereon; several huge white coffee-cups and saucers; and the Siècle newspaper of the week before last. Lily saw many little bits of advertising and inscriptions in white letters. Lily learned that this was a Crémerie; that its sign was Au bon Marché: that bifteks, bouillon, coffee, and chocolate were to be had there at all hours, and that meals were even portés en ville—carried to the patrons of the establishment at their own residences. Furthermore, there was a tariff of prices which assured Lily as to the capacity of her purse to endure the charges of such a very modest little breakfast as she needed.

She entered the Cheap Creamery, and making known her wants to a brawny Norman wench with big gold ear-rings, who had a bonnet voice, the possession of which a corporal in the Chasseurs d'Afrique would not have disdained, and who, when she was called did not answer "Voilà!" after the fashion of waiters generally, but thundered forth, "Y'veu y êtes!" Murmuring her brief commands to this formidable servitor, Lily was presently supplied with a big white bowlful of chocolate, and a French penny-piece of bread, the which (the whole costing but eight sous) made no very serious inroad on her stock of ready money.

The place was full of working people: the men in blouses, the women and girls in neat white caps or kerchiefs tied round their heads, who were as kindly and courteous in their demeanor as in their business. She was presently spied. She had affairs of moment to end to. There never was, I conceive, any so idle, short of death, who, like Lily at the outset of the question, could not remember that he had something to do. Lily was quite overwhelmed with business. She had to get to England: God alone knew how. She was to do something little guessed at by living: God alone knew what. certain; but it appears that he was known as a great frequenter of the Salons Frascati, and losses at the gaming-table may have been the primary cause of his sad catastrophe (traite nominal). Millord Bluet had formerly been rich to millions, but of late had become much reduced in circumstances. With touching solemnity M. Jean Baptiste Constant has charged himself with the interment of the remains (decomplies mortalis) of this unfortunate son of a Albion."

Lily read this paragraph through, read it again and again, and fell into a dream. The names recorded were unfamiliar to her. She knew nothing of proprietors who were natives of Berne in Switzerland and were domiciled at Paris, of restaurateurs who lived in the quarter of the Madeleine, or of Milords Bluet, with that thundering addition of "esquire," who was he? And yet—Jean Baptiste Constant, Rataplan, Bluet—Rataplan, Bluet, Constant—she knew she had she not ever heard those names before? She passed over the simple and sorry incidents in her life in review before her. She strove to remember every place where she had been, everyone whom she had known—there were the Bayscastles: there those sisters, the old lady, with her sentimental wool-gathering talk, the servitude, the discreet apothecary, her prattling, ever complaining school-mates. Then up came a vision of a gentleman in a cloak, who had spoken to her lately, but sharply; and a vision of another gentleman, with a glossy black whisker on his cheek, who had held her in his arms not unkindly. Again started up the image of the fierce and imperious lady, with her temper, her cunnings, her fondness and her coolishness. To her succeeded Cutwig & Co., the cheery foreman, the demure Miss Eldred, the large-mounted lady who grinned and ate apples. Was it in the Greenwich dinner she had heard the name of Bluet, or on board the steamer, when the gentleman with the heavy whiskers and the gold-laced cap had given her chocolate? Was the sickly gentleman in the corner-dock named Bluet? Had Rataplan's name ever been pronounced at the Pension Marcassin? Did Margrédel ever speak of a certain Constant? J. B. Constant—Jean Baptiste Constant—the name, the initials, kept ringing in the ears of her mind. But it was all a dream, and would fain nothing tangible. So soon as, for an instant, the thought that she had grasped at a form and a substance, they slid away from her as though she had been walking on glass, and all was impalpable. An apparition often has a form of beauty, and sometimes in a sigh of the wind, and sometimes in a word, forgotten so soon as it was uttered, if uttered indeed it was. Lily fancied that she remembered something—she knew not what, she knew not when, she knew not how—and then the fancied reminiscence faded away into nothingness and a perplexing blank, in which memory had no place.

Very sadly she rose, folding up, she could scarcely tell why, the copy of the paper, and placing it in her pocket. Perhaps that might some back again, she tried to think, and tell her something more definite. At present she was bound to go on her business. Rue Chaptal-locket! Yes; the evil time might be no longer stayed. So she walked down to the quays that were about the Pont Neuf. It was a wonder she did not meet little Amanda on her morning's walk with Phillip Firmin, negotiating on the grand doings the Pompes Funèbres would have when the corpse of the Emperor came home.

There were plenty of goldsmiths' shops on the Quai, plenty expressing on their signs quite a facetious eagerness to purchase gold, silver, and diamonds at their utmost value. Lily entered the first shop on her way. The gentleman who kept it appeared to deal in all kinds of rags and bones, so to speak, of the precious metals. His counter was all covered with fresh and tarnished epaulets; with coils of torn and shabby gold and silver lace; with cast-collars, coat-pockets and spangles, dotted with faded colored tinsel, and ruthlessly torn from their parent garments; with embroidered cuffs, bullion tassels, and bridal veils with silver spangles, and broken tea-pots, and mugs crumpled up as though they had been made of paper, and flattened tea-spoons, and the tops of mercschaum pipes, and the lozenge plates from cigar cases, and the bosses and mouldings from carriage-harness, and the stoppers of bottles from dressing-cases: any thing you please to mention in the way of gold and silver. In front of the counter was a stout wire grating reaching to the ceiling, and in front of the grating was the dealer in the precious metals himself. He was smoking a half-penny cigar, and, with the assistance of a pair of tweezers, was loading some delicate scales with a little heap of gold dust.

"I won't buy any thing this morning," he cried, as Lily hesitatingly entered the shop. "That scoundrel Pallet. He pretends to go to the Orkney Islands for pearls. There's not one of them here worth five francs, ma petite mademoiselle."

Lily, wincing under this rebuff, was about to withdraw, when he called her back.

"Stop! What is it? What have you got? The défroque of a marshal of France, or the sceptre of Charlemagne? I'll treat the whole thing for the sake of your eyes. I love eyes. I wish I could sell them."

He was such a florid dealer, and such a voluble dealer, and, withal, such a very hungry not to say rapacious-looking dealer, that Lily was more than half alarmed at the manner in which he accosted her. However, there was no help for it now. She nerved herself to a strong effort, and produced the ill-fated locket. She had previously taken out the hair of the Martyr King, wrapped it in a piece of paper, and put it carefully away in her bosom. At last she would not sell that, she thought.

"And what might you want for this little bit of a toy?" asked the dealer, turning over the locket, as he spoke, with much contempt.

"A hundred francs," answered Lily, at a guess. "You see, Sir, there are diamonds outside."

"I know, I know," retorted the dealer, who with avid eyes had taken stock of the whole. "Diamonds! Do you call these little pins' heads diamonds? They're nothing but beads: mere children's playthings. Come: I'll be liberal. I'll give you fifty francs."

Unused to bargaining in any shape, and perfect novice as she was in the marketable value of the pretended beads, Lily could tell that it was conscious that an attempt was being made to swindle her. She hastily represented that the locket must be worth considerably more even than the price she had put upon it, and that fifty francs was really a sum that she could not think of accepting.

"Where's the hair?" cried the dealer, suddenly opening the locket and then shutting it with a sharp snap. "Where's the miniature of General Foy, or the tomb of Héloise and Abelard, or the hair of your well-beloved, that ought to be inside?"

Lily replied that she had removed that which had been inside the locket. It was a secret, and she did not intend to tell it.

"Then I will buy it at all," snarled the dealer, tossing the locket toward her. "Take back your trumpery. I don't buy empty lockets. Nobody likes to buy 'em; and to look up, it isn't worth a louis."

"Oh, Sir—" Lily began to plead, as well as she could for the emotion that rose within.

"Take it away. I think you stole it. I get into trouble for how about my copper stock. It belonged to a countess in the Faubourg St. Germain, and her chambermaid had robbed her of it. They married me with the countess's money! Mr. Israel Sarpajou! Get out of the shop, or I'll call the guard."

The mention of all which was, that M. Israel Sarpajou had been somewhat disappointed that morning in the quality of some loose pearls in which he had invested capital; and, not daring to lay out any more ready money just then, thought he could help it in a little more than by baiting a girl whom he knew to be poor, and guessed to be friendless.

Indignant, and alarmed, Lily was hastily leaving the shop of the ill-conditioned dealer, when, in his vapid slobbering voice, he called out,

"Come back, little one. Give me a kiss and you shall have seventy-five francs for your locket." But Lily staid to hear no more, and hurried away as fast as ever she could.

She went into gold and silver dealer's shop after another; but, through a kind of fatality, as it seemed, no one would give her any thing like a remunerative price for the locket. One overflowing philanthropist, who was a Christian, offered her twenty-five francs for it; another, who was a Jew, advised her to make a gift to her young man, and then she would no longer desire to sell the locket which contained his beautiful black hair—ses beaux cheveux noirs. A third was more practical. He was an optician as well as a goldsmith, and wore himself a huge polygonal blue goggles ær to look like a walking light-house. He told Lily that her locket was worth, at the very least, two or three hundred francs—not to melt, but as a work of art—and advised her, instead of selling it, to take it to the nearest bureau of the Mont de Piété, where they would lend her half its value.

This beneficent counselor gave her, besides, the address of a commissary prisoner—one Monsieur Gallifret, who lived in the Rue Montorgueil. Thither Lily took her repair with palpitating steps; and very seldom, I will venture to surmise, was the first visit to a pawnbroker's paid so blithely.

Monsieur's office was up a narrow filthy passage, and down a pair of stairs. There was a traiteur's on the first floor, and a preparatory school on the second; and the mingled odors of soup, school-boys, and the humbler of evening apparel in the pawnbroker's store-closets, were decidedly powerful, but far from pleasant. Monsieur Gallifret was not at home; but his wife was—a snuffy old woman with a red kerchief.

"A hundred francs," said Madame Gallifret, when she had examined the locket.

Lily bowed her head, meaning the gesture as a sign of acquiescence.

"Cent francs, ni plus, ni moins. Do you take it? Est-elle sourde-muette, la petite? Speak out."

"I will take it."

"Bon: what is your name?" went on Madame Gallifret, opening a large thin ledger.

"Lily Floris."

"Drôle de nom! Your profession?"

"Couturière." Oh, Lily, how fast one learns to lie!

"Domicile?"

"A hundred and twelve, Boulevard Poissonière." Does not making rapid progress in mendacity; but that locket had to be got rid of.

"Where is your passport?"

"My passport, madame?"

"Yes, your passport, your papers. Don't I speak distinctly?"

"I have none."

"Bien fâchée, then, but we can have nothing to do with you. No business is transacted in this office save with persons provided with papers perfectly en règle."

And once more Lily went forth into the street: the locket still unsold, and even unpawned.

ON AT LAST.

THE wedding ceremony was all over.

Through the arches of Trinity the tumultuous sweetness of the organ rolled in billows of sound, while the tinted splendors of stained glass casements streamed like shivered rainbows across the path of the bridal cortège. And Karl Chesney, looking down at the fair face shrined in a silver mist of tulle and jasmine blossoms, felt his strong heart thrill within him with a new-born happiness.

"My wife—my darling!"

Was it but a sickly fancy, or the rose-leaf hand shrink away from his arm as he pressed it closer to his heart? Surely she loved him, this little wild flower he had transplanted from the wilderness to his own home—there could be no doubt about that. Yet the mere possibility that for an instant flashed across his mind seemed to curdle the warm current of his blood to ice.

"Does not she look like a freshly-gathered rosebud?"

There was a momentary stoppage in the crowded vestibule, and Karl Chesney heard the low-spoken words from one of the bridesmaids beyond.

"Yes; I was afraid the sleepless night and all those tears would spoil her beauty."

"Did she weep much?"

"Poor thing! if you could only have seen her sobbing on my shoulder after the wreath and veil were on. She don't love him—that's plain enough! Just consider how brief the acquaintance has been."

"That is true," sequiesced the bridemaid.

"But then it was such a splendid match, and her mother insisted on it. She would have refused him, I feel him, though, if it were not for the fact that his regiment marches to-day. He will be away somewhere, and in time to forget—what may happen before he returns? In any event time will reconcile her to the marriage."

The words had been spoken in a whisper, but every syllable fell on Karl Chesney's ear as distinctly as if pellet-lightning had been launched from—hell itself like fiery rain on the upspringing blossoms of his heart.

So he had been blinded, trifled with, deceived. A bright, brief dream! But he was rudely waked at last with a pang than which death would have been welcome. It was well that he was so soon to leave the young wife who detested him; and the passionate fire flashed into eyes as he thought of the words he had just heard—"Who knew what might happen before he returned?"

"Goodby, Lily!"

He touched his cold lips to the fair forehead overhung with radiant ripples of gold hair, and held for a moment the soft hand in his own. "How lovely she was! how innocent! A bride, yet a widow; a wife, and no wife!"

Karl Chesney had sworn within his inmost mind a solemn oath that he would never return by choice to an unloving heart. And Cecile looked up into the dark, stern face, and wondered if it was wrong to be glad that her husband was going off to the wars within the hour. Poor child! She was not so much to blame after all.

So Captain Chesney left his beautiful wife, all unconscious of the misery that he bequeathed, such sick hearts, into the tumult and carnage of the battle-field. It is not to be wondered that with this fierce abandon that makes a world stand by in awed wonder.

"There, I thought how it would be. Allen is down. What on earth possessed the General to send all officers off, now?"

Colonel Playfair spoke the short, fierce words between his teeth, as he drew his rein and hurriedly surveying the confused field through his glass. Karl Chesney struck his spurs into his horse's flanks and rode up alongside with a curious gleam in his eye.

"Who is to take his place, Colonel?"

"Whoa! Allen's horse! Nobody that cares a fig for his life. I tell you, man, any one that rides beyond that hill rides into the jaws of death."

"Nevertheless, the orders must be carried. You have a duplicate; give it to me."

Colonel Playfair dropped his glass and stared blankly at Chesney.

"Man! are you tired of your life that you would throw it away in that manner? Oh, my God! how much longer is this massacre to last before retreating orders come?"

At that instant a young aid-de-camp galloped up with a whispered message. Playfair turned sharply round.

"At last! Well, it is not my business to criticise. Tell the General that Playfair and Chesney are gone, and I don't much care if we never return!"

It was a heavy heart that throbbed behind the blunt old man's battle-tarnished uniform as he rode slowly at the side of his decimated regiment that night—a heavy heart and a sore, for he had liked the two brave boys that were down.

"Where am I? what are you doing to me?"

The red stream of lantern-light seemed to burn across Karl Chesney's eyeballs like molten fire, as it revealed the swarthy faces bending above him.

"Turn him over, Benson—gently, gently! Now a long strip of bandage and a tuft of lint. I wonder how long it will be before the ambulances are here?"

The surgeon spoke indistinctly with a sharp steel instrument between his teeth. Chesney watched his arm from the kindly touch, and tore the bloody ligatures away.

"Leave me alone! why can not you let me die in peace? I was dying."

"Hallo!" ejaculated the Confederate surgeon; "Here's a new aspect of things! Sturdy, are'nt it? it isn't my business to let people die if I can help it."

"Then go to some one that needs you."

"I am of opinion that you need me," said the surgeon, coolly striking the revolver from Chesney's hand. "I don't require that little instrument, and it is not exactly dreadful to point it at my head. Tie his hands, Benson! I see we shall have to do with people against his will."

"Ain't he game!" ejaculated the admiring cadet. "Wants to die, just because the Yankees have got him down! Ain't he a Britisher, I say, doctor, it's all I can do to hold him."

"Will you venture me back into life? I tell you I have no desire to live."

"For several reasons," said the surgeon, quietly. "One is, that I don't choose to have you Yankees say that you don't receive proper attention within our lines. Another is, were you aware that this cut across your upper lip is likely to prove rather an awkward affair for your beauty? Did you ever wear a mustache? because you'll have to now. A curious zigzag scar; I should think it might change the whole expression of your face. There! are you any more? Benson, a hand here and help lift him into the ambulance. My boy," he added, in a lower tone, as he softly laid the wounded man's head on the cushions, "I have a son about your age in the ranks; I have done for you what I would fain have some charitable soul do for him, were he in your place. Now, do you what I would say to him, don't forget that you have no right to throw away the life that is not yours!"

So the Confederate surgeon went on his way.

"What a delicious breeze there is from the Atlantic to-night!"

Harper Talboys was sitting on the long hotel piazza with his wife, enjoying an evening cigar from the dark-faced fellow-traveler who had come in the same steamer with them from Cuba. Mr. Streighton did not reply, but then he was not a man that talked much at any time, and Talboys was used to his silence habitually.

"Lots of people here, Jenkins tells me, and pretty girls enough to drive a fellow distracted. But the belle of the season is a young widow, Mrs. Chesney."

"Observe old you say?"

"Ay, the widow of an officer who fell in that unfortunate affair at ——, a year ago. A beauty and an heiress—a splendid match for any one you and me, Streighton. I just saw her at the dinner-table, and—I'll be hanged if here she don't come now on the other side! Is there a creature she makes among those young fellows on the steps! By Jove, what a beauty!"

Streighton rose deliberately up and walked forward a step or two, leaning back against a column of the piazza to get a good view of the reigning beauty.

Like a shower of gold the fair curls floated away from under the white gossamer lissom of her riding-hat, while the liquid blue eyes sparkled with healthful exercise, and the color on her cheek was deep and soft as the warm tints of pomegranate blossom at the nook up to the hotel steps in the carmine glow of the August twilight.

"Who is that dark gentleman on the piazza?" she asked, looking rather earnestly at the stranger.

"Mr. Streighton," replied her cavalier, rather sulkily.

"Streighton, I think his name is, from Cuba. Take care, Mrs. Chesney: it is never safe to drop your bonbons like a child when he is inclined to be a little gay."

The words were yet trembling on his tongue when Selim gave a forward spring. Cecile caught at the rein; but it was too late, and the next moment the beast was checked with a firm hand like iron, and she was lifted from the saddle by the dark stranger.

As he bowed and turned away she laid her hand timidly on his arm.

"May I not know when I am to thank?"

"Mr. Streighton, Cuba." And the pleasure of being useful to you, madam."

Cecile was startled by the solution of the main ose; but there was something in that olive face, with its dark, melancholy eyes and heavy mustache, that made her tremble more quicker and brought the roses back to her blanched cheek.

All that evening Streighton watched her bright, innocent—very pretty, forsooth—ways—watched her girlish happiness and unconscious beauty, while his heart ached with unspoken pain.

"She could not mourn for the husband who fell in battle," he pondered. "I wonder if I could make her love me, Charles Streighton. It is worth the trial. I love her in spite of every thing, and in spite of every thing she shall love me!"

Those were the days when the sea-side—days of golden air and blue quivering sunlight, with silver shimmers on the snowy beach and pulses of liquid music rolling up against the rocky battlements below; bright days, but they came to an end, like all bright things.

"Going to-morrow, Mr. Streighton?"

Her lip quivered in spite of her resolute effort at self-control, and he could feel the tremble of the little hand that lay on his arm.

"Yes."

"Oh, I am so sorry!"

They were alone in the moonlight shadows of the garden, while the merry music of viol and flute streamed from the brilliant windows of the house beyond, and died away in delicious cadences among the moving leaves.

"Do you care, Cecile?"

"Do I care, Charles?" she said, reproachfully.

"Oh, Cecile!" he exclaimed, turning to her with an almost passionate intensity of fervor, "is it possible that you have learned to love me at last?"

"At last?" she repeated, vaguely.

"Tell me, love," he went on, "could you feel for me what a wife should feel for her husband? Do you love me in very truth, Cecile?"

He trembled now—she saw the quiver that ran through his whole frame.

"Are you mine, Cecile? mine in heart and soul? Love, do not deceive yourself or me, tell me the truth."

She put her hand on his shoulder and looked frankly and lovingly into his white, agonized face.

"Yours, dearest! yours forever!"

He drew her close, close to his breast with a strong, convulsive sob.

"Oh, my wife, my darling! did no warning impulse tell you that it was your own husband to whom you pledged the gift of your affection? Oh, Cecile! my blue-eyed dove, I have won your heart at last!"

So Cecile Chesney had two wedding days—one for her band, the other for her heart.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHY is an interesting book like a toper's nose?—Because it is read to the very end.

A week filled up with selfishness, and the Sabbath stuffed full of religious exercises, will make a good Pharisee but a poor Christian.

NICE DESCRIPTIVE.—"I tells peppermints on Sunday," remarked a good old lady, who kept a candy shop, "because they carries 'em to church and eats 'em, and keeps me awake to hear the sermon; but if you want candies you must come week days. They're secular commodities."

"PS, do storms ever make salt lipsen?" "No, child; why do you ask?" "Because I heard Ma tell Jane to bring in the clothes, for a storm was brewing."

WANTED to know the exact length of a rope used when a man is "tied to the stake?"

AT a recent exhibition of cross dissolving views in Lincolnshire an arrangement was made with the musicians in attendance to play appropriate music for the scenes represented. The order of the music was arranged according to the order of the views; but by some mistake the order were transposed. On arriving by the programme to the dissolving view of the music presented to the order assigned, and played "Home, Sweet Home," while upon the illuminated screen appeared a distinct representation of the Medal Prison at Portsmouth.

AN Irish lawyer, of the Temple, going to lunch, left his directing his boy to "Come to the Temple Coffee House, where you shall find me; and if you can't read this, carry it to the nearest coffee house, and he shall read it for you."

CURTIS says that each man carries under his coat a "private theatre," whereon is acted a greater drama than is ever performed on the minute stage, beginning and ending in eternity.

In the garden of a certain nobleman's country-house there happened to be fixed up at different spots painted boards with this request: "Please not to pluck the flowers nor touch the fruit." Some wag got a paint-brush and added an "o" to the last word!

IF 20 grains make a scruple, how many will make a bank?—If 7 days make one week, how many will make one strong?—If 52 yards make a pole, how many will make a Tory?—If 40 poles make a league, how many will make a conderney?—If 4 quarters make a yard, how many will make a quarrel?

PUNCTUALITY.—It is indeed a pretty sight in the country to see a hundred proprietors standing about with an ash smoking a cigar.

"If you want boys awake," said a parent to one of his hearers, "when you find drowsy, they don't pay you much of mind!" "Why," was the shrewd reply, "the mind should be put into the sermon."

In the course of a conversation or disquisition on Satan, Archbishop Whately once startled his hearers by asking, "Is the devil dead?" and, when about to go to find a satisfactory answer without giving much time for reflection, replied, "To a gin palace, for bad spirits are retained there."

THE sea is of the Quaker persuasion; it has a broad brim.

A country girl, coming from the field, told by her postmistress that she had had a letter, in a dairy kissed with dew, and Sieve Pyman the writing agreement of the purchase, the other answered, "No: it was agreed that I should be at your date for the remainder; how can that be if I pay it?"

Some merchants went to an Eastern sovereign, and exhibited to him a pearl of very rare beauty. The king admired them, and bought them; he, moreover, gave the merchants a bag of gold in exchange for their paper toy. In time the king died, in a spotless manner, ordered his grave to be dug, and a fair sheet of white silk to be bedded. He did so, and put his Majesty's name at the bottom of the sheet, and then lay down in the grave. "Now," said he, "I expect to meet many you don't know, and who will never come to me." "Ay, but," said some they should have back?" "Then I shall cross your name and insert theirs."

A PRISON, kept several days at his own expense, sent a friend to the jailer to complain that he had been given nothing for his attendance. "Oh, tell him," said the jailer, "that he has been given all he has to go before a jury himself he will get one for nothing."

A thin old man, with a rag-bag in his hand, was pleading for a number of small articles of rubbish he had found on the street. The deposit was of such a singular nature that the old quizzical-looking gentleman before he supposed they came there. "Don't know," he replied, in a squeaking voice; "but I guess some unfortunate female was wrecked hereabout somewhere."

A good instance of absence of mind was an editor quoting from his own paper one of his own articles, and hooting it "Wretched Attempt at Wit."

"Why, Mr. B——," said a tall youth to a little person who was in company with half a dozen huge men, "I protest you are so very small I did not see you before." "Very likely," replied the little gentleman; "I am like a sixpence among six copper pennies—not easily perceived, but worth the whole of them."

Jerrold said to an ardent young gentleman who burned with a desire to see himself in print, "Be advised by me, young man: don't take down the shutters before there is something in the window."

WHAT is that which is full of holes and yet holds water? A sponge.

GEN. SHERMAN'S ADVANCE.

On this and the preceding, as well as on our first page, we continue our illustrations of General SHERMAN'S great campaign. One of these, on page 524, represents THE FOURTH CORPS—General HOWARD'S—CROSSING THE CHATTAHOOCHEE. This corps was one of the last to cross; it reached the Atlanta side without opposition, taking its position in the centre of SHERMAN'S lines after crossing the river.

TURNER'S MILL, illustrated on the same page, is on Nickajack Creek, which is an affluent of the Chattahoochee, from the northern side, emptying into that river a little above Sandtown. It was near its mouth that the rebel army made its last stand before crossing the Chattahoochee. The illustration is chiefly valuable for its rural rather than its military feature.

Another pleasant scene, which we give our readers on the same page, is that representing the soldiers engaged in setting Fish-traps in the Chattahoochee.

On this page we give a view of the MILITARY COLLEGE near Marietta, formerly one of the first in the South. The area, as seen in the sketch, is filled with rebel prisoners.

Another illustration on this page represents Colonel JIM BROWNLOW, with a small party of men in Georgia costume, crossing the Chattahoochee to capture the rebel pickets. The expedition was a successful one, but it broke up the friendly communication which had been several days established between the pickets across the river. This was before SHERMAN had crossed. The morning after the occurrence notice was given of the changed situation by a Reb yelling out across the stream:

"Hello, Yank!"

"What do you want, Johnny?"

"Can't talk to you 'uns any more!"

"How is that?"

COLONEL BROWNLOW ON A PICKET HUNT.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

"Orders to dry up!"

"What for, Johnny?"

"Oh! JIM BROWNLOW, with his d—d Tennessee Yanks, swam over upon the left last night, and stormed our rifle-pits naked—captured sixty of our boys, and made 'em swim back with him. We 'uns have got to keep you 'uns on your side of the river now."

More interesting, as connected with later and more stirring events, is the illustration given on our first page representing General HOOKER riding along his lines on the morning after the great battle of the 20th. This battle was very severe. The rebels, by their own account, lost over 5000 men, while our loss was less than one-third of that number. The attack was made by the enemy shortly after our troops had crossed Peach-tree Creek. NEWTON'S division of HOWARD'S corps had found time to protect itself by a slight rail-barricade. HOOKER was attacked while yet in column, his "family," as he calls the Twentieth Corps, getting into order almost without an order. The heaviest attack fell on General WILLIAMS'S division. WARD'S and BUTTERFIELD'S divisions were more successful. They had for trophies seven rebel flags. When HOOKER rode along the lines the next morning, as represented in the sketch, to greet his troops and to congratulate them on their success, these flags were all brought out for his inspection, the men being engaged in burying the rebel dead lying thickly around.

We also give on this page portraits of General A. S. WILLIAMS and of the late General HARKER.

Brigadier-General CHARLES G. HARKER, killed in the assault on Kenesaw, June 27, was a native of New Jersey. He entered West Point in 1854, at the age of seventeen. He entered the regular army as Brevet Second Lieutenant of the Second Infantry July 1, 1858. He was made First Lieutenant of the Ninth May 14, 1861, and a Captain in October of that year. He entered the war as Lieutenant-Colonel of the Sixty-fifth Ohio Volunteers in the fall of 1861, and afterward became its Colonel. He participated in the battle of Shiloh and the siege of Corinth, and helped chase BRAGG out of Kentucky, being then in command of a brigade. His brigade joined General ROSECRANS'S Army of the Cumberland. In the official report of the battle at Stone River he was recommended for promotion, which he only received last April, when he was made a Brigadier-General of Volunteers. He was under THOMAS when the latter made his gallant stand at Chickamauga.

CLARA'S PLEDGE.

"You are not in earnest, Clara?"

"I am—most certainly."

If a sleader-stemmed wild columbine, drooping over the precipitous ledge of some woodland rock, were to take unto itself the attributes of humanity, you might fancy it transformed into such a woman as Clara Read—delicate and fragile, with blue, serious eyes, and folds of chestnut hair knotted low upon her neck.

She sat by the open window watching a tiny brown bird rock on the branches of a blossoming linden in the park below, while the yellow sunshine burnt her hair to auburn depths, and the roar of the great city sounded dully in her ear; and Olive Compton, kneeling at her side, played with the rings upon her white, slim fingers.

"You have signed the pledge, Clara?"

"Yes, and I mean to keep it."

"Oh but, Clara," cooed the little brunette, "it don't say you're not to wear all those pretty dresses you have already made up—it says only you are not to buy any thing new of foreign manufacture."

"The letter of the pledge may intimate some such thing, Olive. I have given in my adhesion to its spirit."

"I don't see any necessity for being so very particular."

"But I do. Oh, Olive, could I have the heart to wear diamonds and laces and rainbow silks when so many lives are laid down without a murmur?"

That beautiful crimson silk!" sighed Olive, leaning over to arrange the lustrous folds of a superb evening dress that lay on a divan opposite. Clara shuddered.

"Do you know what I fancied, Olive, the night I wore it first, and the news came from the Wilderness?"

"No; what?"

"I imagined there was blood in all its crimson shine: I almost looked to see the dark drops fall!"

"Nonsense, Clara, you are so fanc..ful." And the pearl necklace you have never once worn!"

"I could not wear it, dear; it would be like changing round my neck the tears of widows and orphans who have given up their best and bravest."

"But, Clara, this is all a romantic fantasy. What good do you suppose it will do the Army of the Potomac for you to lock up all your rich dresses and India silks, and go into a nun's costume of calico and linsey-woolsey?"

"Listen, Olive!" said Clara, softly, while the blue light in her eyes seemed to glow into tremulous sapphire, and a fair crimson tinge came to her cheek—"do you suppose it will do our soldier-heroes no good to know that we, their wives, sisters, daughters, have made the manly resolution that death sway the country's wealth, and are crushing our petty vanities for their sakes? It is easy to give money, but it is not so easy to renounce these daily articles of luxury. Can not we make one tasting sacrifice in memory of those who have given up home, and comfort, and life itself for us? Oh, I am sick of hearing cashmere shawls rustle past the marble vests of the bereaved ones, and tired of seeing diamonds shine over the fresh sod of new-made graves. Is it meet or seemly that we should lavish money on this absurd display when West stalks grimly in our midst, and the soldier's helpless orphan lack their daily bread?"

"How can you speak of such dreadful things?" said Olive, complainingly.

"They make you shudder and grow pale, do they, the mere mention of them? What must it be to endure them?"

"I am sure I am not to blame for them," said Olive. "I didn't make the war, and I don't see how it will help matters for me to turn myself into a homespun fright."

Clara sighed, remembering that Olive Byington was the representative of other women innumerable on whom argument and persuasion were alike wasted.

"But, Clara," went on the little brunette, tripping to the mirror so as more satisfactorily to adjust a scarlet geranium that had fallen from her glossy black hair—"this is better in theory than practice. You can't wear calico to Mrs. Eytinge's to-morrow night!"

She nodded triumphantly as she spoke.

"Can't I?"

"No!"

"You will see."

"Clara! you never will be so absurd—so Quixotic!"

Clara did not answer, she was leaning over the roses that filled the balcony, and thinking of something sweet, yet sad, for there was a smile on her lips even while a crystal drop sparkled through her eyelashes.

"All aboard!" shrieked the conductor. There was a rush for the platform—a shower of sparks surging up from the grimy smoke-stack of the locomotive, and the long train began to move.

And just as the last car glided slowly past the station a tall soldier rushed from the coffee-room, and hurriedly seized on board, nearly knocking over the two or three loungers who were setting the "Rules and Regulations" of the Company at defiance by lying on the platform in the teeth of law and order.

"Hallo!" ejaculated the new-comer; "I came within one of being left, and that rascal who sells cigars told me there was plenty of time. Before I'll believe his depraved villainy again—I beg your pardon, Sir; I hope my head wasn't harder than your metal buttons, for—Why, it's Walter Vivian!"

"Of course it is," said Captain Vivian, coolly; "and if you'd been just a whit less lucky in catching the car-guards, you would have been in the late Private Byington."

"Well, you see I'm pretty well used to hairbreadth escapes," said Byington, laughing. "Have a cigar?"

"Perhaps you are right. I don't myself think they ever save the shores of Havana. Are you homeward-bound?"

"For a day or two—yes."

"So am I. I put run down to Philadelphia this morning on some regimental business for the Colonel, and, having hurrying luck to dance the German with Kate Eytinge to-night. Are you going?—though of course you are."

"I thought of it. How are the ladies in Gramercy Park? Your sister is well?"

"Olive? Yes. Quite well enough to torment me out of my life with her Central Park parties, and her receptions, and ten thousand other absurd ideas."

"And your cousin, Miss Meade."

"All right. They've got the house full of milliners and dress-makers, getting 'em up for Saratoga or Newport, or some such folly. What a lot of money it does take to keep us going, to be sure! Talk about the country's being poor! I should like Uncle Abe to look over Olive's bills this summer. I guess I'll introduce him, marked 'Private and Confidential!'"

And Captain Byington burst into a laugh that fairly shook the platform.

Captain Vivian's face grew grave—almost stern.

"I thought the sons of New York had bound themselves by a pledge, or something of that sort, to put down this reckless tide of extravagance."

"Oh, that's all gammon!" said Martin, trimming off the end of a fresh cigar with his pen-knife.

"Really these weeds aren't so bad, considering the deuce-an-ace's been out of 'em all till this, that pledge—nobody's going to pay any attention to it. We've got money and we're spending yesterday, and I wish you could have seen the silks and muslins and lace shawls that were sent home."

"So," muttered Captain Vivian beneath his dark mustache, "they are not willing even to abridge one of their useless vanities for our sakes."

"Oh well, women will be women, you know, Walter," said Byington. "They don't amount to much except to look pretty and have heads of. There's not one of 'em has a soul above paint lace and ear-rings."

Captain Vivian looked thoughtfully at the far-off hills gliding past as in a dream.

"I had thought better of them," he pondered. "I had hoped the days of a more heroic stamp were at hand. If they could have stood beside me on that bloody field in the Wilderness—if they could have the faint-fighting spirit that was along the sides of those rudely-constructed hospitals, where lives died out in pain and suddenly as I have seen fire-flies vanish in summer glens, they might perhaps learn a lesson which would endure always. These women—how little less than fiends have of the strength that lies within their frail hands! And she is like the rest. I would rather Martin Byington had subdued me than that beautiful girl."

And Byington, innocently smoking his cigar on the platform of the lightning train, marveled at the sudden chill that lay upon his companion's face.

Kate Eytinge was "receiving" in sky-blue silk and sapphires—"receiving" the gay world of her acquaintance as joyously as if no grief stretched its black darkness over the country's horizon. And Captain Vivian, standing in the shadow of a window whose blossomed myrtles made a sort of green wall to exclude the crowd beyond, and surveyed the swaying multitude with a bitter curve to his lip.

"This looks like keeping the pledge," he said, scornfully, as Byington came up to look for a dropped fan.

"I'm not so," said the young man, shrugging his shoulders.

Captain Vivian looked toward the door—he was tall enough to insure a good view—and presently as Olive Byington floated in, the rich folds of her musice-colored silk rippling over the carpet like sunshine, while the point-lace about her shoulders and her perfectly moulded shoulders was clasped with a golden sparkle of a superb Oriental topaz.

Walter Vivian gave him a cold bow, and then turned away with a feeling very like disgust at his heart.

Suddenly a familiar appellation struck on his ear sending the hot blood in a torrent to his sunburnt forehead.

"It is Clara Meade, with Miss Byington. But what is the wearing? Pale-blue silk?"

"No! it looks like grenadine, and yet it isn't. What can it be? India crape?"

"Nonsense!" said plain Mrs. Mandeville. "Don't you see it's blue calico, with a little white check all over it? Now that's what I call good common sense."

The beau monde, gorgeous in moiré antique and shimmering glace, stood appalled and silent as Clara Meade glided moved up the long room to her hostess's arm. Calico! And at a full-dress reception! Why, who ever heard of such a thing?

And then came a murmur of scarcely-repressed admiration—a spontaneous tribute of applause to the girl's simple beauty. Clara Meade had triumphed over Mrs. Grundy, Madam Greenback, and Company.

For she looked strangely lovely in the pale-blue dress, with its delicate edging of lace at throat and wrists, and the creamy water-lily twisted in her shining brown curls, a dream of the Lotus Isles. No jewel sparkled on her breast, only a knot of woven lily-buds; yet all the pearls of the East could not have improved that spray of graceful buds.

"Calico, eh?" laughed Kate Eytinge, archly surveying her friend. "I see you have enrolled your name on the Pledge."

"Yes," said Clara, calmly; "and I intend to observe its regulations."

As she turned away her hand was drawn lightly within an arm that trembled slightly in its Hercalean strength. She looked up, with a sudden blush, through which there glowed the sunbeam of a radiant smile.

"Captain Vivian!"

"Clara, pardon me; but I have only this evening to stay with you, and I have so much to say."

Clara Meade might have thought that the young officer's eye stern would be forced to look tender brightness that illumines the dark irids now. And Clara's glance fell beneath it, as you sometimes shrink from the welcome intensity of the greatest sunshine.

"I scarcely know how to thank you for this," he said, inclining his head toward the folds of her azure dress; "but it is a surety to me that your heart is in our cause. It has given me new hope and strength, Clara."

He stooped to pick up the bunch of lily-buds that had fallen from her bosom.

"I should like to wear these, Clara."

"Keep them, Captain Vivian."

He fastened them back to her silently. She looked up in timid surprise, half fearing that she had unwittingly offended him.

"I will keep them, unless you will give me something else with them, Clara."

"Something else?" she repeated, wonderingly.

"Your heart, dearest!"

She looked downward, rosy as an eglantine, and then gathered up the cream-tinted buds and laid them gently in his hand.

So Walter Vivian proposed and was accepted, and the gay crowd of fashionables around him had not the slightest idea of what was going on. And Clara is to be married in the identical blue calico dress—and Captain Vivian decrees it, and husbands-elect generally get their own way in such matters. And the ceremony, greatly to Olive Byington's horror, is to be "a domestic manufacture" throughout.

"It will be so sweet," sighed Olive; "and yet—I don't know—not signing the Pledge would get me half such a splendid husband as Clara has won I'd go into calico for the rest of my days!"

A MADMAN'S END.

A VERY dear friend who was passing through Hindlesham by the night-express wrote to ask me to meet her at the station. Now my correspondent was not one of those whose requests did not stop at Hindlesham, and it was too late, on the very day of her passing when I received her letter, to reply. I resolved to wait till that day, however, I could not get the night-express out of my head; it haunted me the whole day long; mixed itself up in the perplexing business that was the very important case of Regina and Higginbotham, upon which I was then engaged, and hopelessly scattered all thoughts of work to the winds. This being the case, it was not surprising that I should find myself, at about seven o'clock, at Hindlesham Bridge.

The night, I remember, was dark, though not so dark but that I could distinguish the outline of the trees and the dim, distant Hogargh-pots, lifting single lyke spectres through the gloom. It was the darkness, in fact, of a summer-night.

I walked up and down the stone-wall, which at that part separates the path from the railway. I had —in harmony with the sweet tranquillity of the night—fallen into very pleasant reverie, in which the young lady then approaching on the night-express formed the principal feature, when I was somewhat astonished by the sound of footsteps upon the bridge. This was, I knew, an unusual circumstance at the time of night, and I waited with some curiosity to see who the late traveler might be. As I turned my head to listen the footsteps ceased, but for a moment. When they broke upon my ear again, however, I fancied that they were accompanied by a sound as of something being dragged over the loose cinders of the bridge.

"It is some plate-layer," I said to myself, "returning late from some job, or possibly he has been dispatched to attend to some necessary repair upon the line;" and I felt luck again, not reluctantly, to the pleasant reverie with the thousand pleasant thoughts which grouped themselves round the central figure—the young passenger of the night-express. A very pleasant dream it was, which, floating there as an indistinct, undefined melody in my young mind, has remained, I think Heaven, to have been the prelude to a fuller harmony—the key-note of a more perfect joy.

I can not say how long I had been thus pleasantly occupied; I suppose, from what afterward occurred, that it could not have been for any length of time. All that I remember is, that in one instant, without warning, without preparation of any sort, all the blood in my body was turned to sudden ice.

I got over the wall, Sir—get over the wall," said a voice in a very cool, "and you'll have a better view. By the Lord Harry, Sir, it'll be a sensation hereafter. Real water, and, by jingo, real rocks. Hi, Jo! Come along, come along, or we shall miss it. The Colleen Bawn 's a joke to it. Do you hear, Sir? Why, who ever heard of the Perp o' Ling Boy to fits—ha, ha! fits—fits."

I was almost paralyzed with horror. Having heard no distinct sound, and not having the creamy clank, land of my speculation, the voice broke upon me as though the dead had spoken. The full horror of the situation, however, did not burst upon my mind at once. A glance, indeed, was sufficient to show me that a madman was before me—a madman who, as I gathered from the incoherent words, had deserted the coming train (with what intensity I felt then that it was freighted with all that I held dear on earth!) to a fate too terrible to think of. The diabolical ingenuity which he had employed, however, for his purposes was entirely then unknown to me; and I seen that, I should have almost despaired.

For one moment I doubted how to act; for one moment my thoughts failed to suggest any method of action, in the next I had formed an indelerate plan.

"Well," I said, turning so as to face the man, "but how are you going to do it?"

"Ha, ha! do it!" he replied; "come and see, come and see. But I say," he went on, a momentary flash of suspicion coming across his mind, "you don't—you—you're not a navvy, surely, with you" and he peered into my face with a madman's cunning.

"Fool," I said, "I am not; but I am willing to force a laugh; "who'd tell such a joke as that? I wouldn't whisper it; that is, if you'll let me see how the scenery's managed; where the train's to, you know, eh!"

Oh, the trap," he replied, with a momentary recurrence of suspicion; "it's behind the scenes, you know;" and he laughed again, a hollow maniac laugh, which made night hideous.

I was over the wall by this time, and we were walking together toward the bridge. A very few yards brought us to the spot where the wretched man had been at work. As I there it was, as I thought, a heavy bale of timber bored flat upon the rail with cord—bound with an intricacy and cunning which a madman only would have thought it necessary to use. How my heart sank within me as I saw it, for I knew that the night-express might reach the spot at any moment: I knew that it was at that instant hurrying on its way to meet the hideous fate which this wretched man had prepared for it, and the thought almost deprived me of the power of action. To use force, I had sense enough to know, would be dangerous, for a glance convinced me that the madman was a strongly-built, powerful man, and I was aware that any madman is terrible in his strength. At this moment an expression of cunning on his which offended some hope. "Good Heavens!" I said to the man, "you've got the rope on the wrong line. You'll spoil all. Quick! off with it—it's all wrong—wrong. I'm most shouted in my anxiety.

To my inexpressible relief the madman seized the idea. Once possessed with it, he was down upon his hands gud knees in an instant, endeavoring to correct any suggestion into effect.

With what terrible anxiety I watched the cord unwound! How slowly the coils loosened beneath the fingers of the wretched man, eager and anxious as he was! How I trembled as now and then a knot or intricate bit of work arrested the cord! How my heart ceased its pulsation, as now and anon he would pause in his work to laugh a horrid laugh, muttering inaudibly about some "jolly header!" But the wretched man was earnest in the task; "Spoil all, spoil all," he continued to mutter; "of course it would; why, only yesterday I was mad not to have seen that" and then he fell again eagerly to the removal of the obstruction.

And all this time I listened with an intensity which I can not describe for any evidence of the coming train. Not still no sound of it. The effects of the summer-night to tell of its approach. I heart the river fretting in its narrow channel eighty feet below. The distant chime of Hindlesham Church clock was borne to my ear faintly on the breeze, as it struck the quarter past the hour—the quarter past! when the express was due! I cried; the madman even started to his feet, when the long whoop of an engine broke upon the night from the startled ear of night; but still no sign of the night-express.

I began to breathe more freely as I urged him to his work. All might be well yet, I thought; when back! the shudder in the air, the weird whisper in the trees, the low thousand sighs of the night, and the quick pulsation of the coming train reached my ear.

"Quick, quick!" I said, bending over the madman at his work—"quick, we shall miss it at!" but he laughed loud at my warning. He, too, had heard the train. "Hurrah!" he shouted, "she's coming—coming, the fiery devil's coming; and now I'll get the better of you, you fool, you fool, you header!" and the poor maniac left his work unfinished, and hastened on to the centre of the Abbey Bridge.

To some block of wood which was the work of an instant, and, to my inexpressible relief, I found it loose. I was not one moment too soon. Before I could remove the ponderous timber, indeed, the buffer of the engine caught it from my hand, and hurled it far into the night.

And not it alone! High above the noise and brattle of the coming train I could distinguish the death-shriek of the poor maniac.

The fate which he in his madness had destined for the night-express had met him on the Abbey Bridge.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A CARD.—Owing to the enormous advance in the price not only of the precious metals, but of every other commodity, I find it impossible to continue longer the sale of my Gold Pens at the old prices. This I regret exceedingly, as I had hoped to continue without change; but, having to buy gold at the present fabulous prices, this is no longer possible.

My friends and the public will give me credit, however, for having struggled long and hard against the universal advance, and appreciate the Government credit and currency. The advance now made is not enough to cover me, with gold at present rates; and this remark stands it, or go still higher, a further rise in prices must be made. In my case, however, I intend, as heretofore, to sell a better article for less money than it can be bought for elsewhere.

A circular, with engravings of all the sizes, styles, and present prices, will be sent on receipt of letter postage.

Certificate of Twenty-Eight Years' USE.

NEWCASTLE, Westchester Co., N. Y., Aug. 11, 1861.

DR. B. BRANDRETH, Dear Sir: I am now 70 years old, and for the last twenty-eight years have been a constant user of your Vegetable Universal Pills when sick. Only realizing the advantage of enforcing purgation with a medicine which, while harmless in its nature, removes all impurities. I can safely say that the vigorous old age I now enjoy is owing, under God, mainly to the use of Brandreth's Pills. I have had, in these last 28 years, several fits of sickness, and occasionally some infirmity of age would grow upon me. At these times I have always found your Pills a sure remedy, giving me not only health but strength. I consider them, therefore, not only invaluable as a medicine, capable of removing the disorders known to me. I have never, during these last twenty-eight years, used any other medicine whatever being convinced, by experience, that none was as good. Brandreth's Pills have also been freely used by my neighbors in every kind of sickness, and have never been known to fail when promptly administered. Yours truly,

NATHANIEL HYATT,
Justice of the Peace for forty years in Westchester County, New York.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, carriage paid, in all directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, July 23, 1864.

Notice is hereby given that subscription will be received by the Treasurer of the United States, the several Assistant Treasurers and designated Depositaries, and by the National Banks designated and qualified as Depositaries and Financial Agents, for Treasury Notes payable three years from August 15, 1864, bearing interest at the rate of seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum, with semi-annual coupons attached, payable in lawful money.

These notes will be convertible, at the option of the holder at maturity, into six-per cent. gold-bearing bonds, redeemable after five and payable twenty years from August 15, 1867.

The Notes will be issued in denominations of fifty, one hundred, five hundred, one thousand, and five thousand dollars, and will be issued in blank, or payable to order, as may be directed by the subscribers.

All subscriptions must be for fifty dollars, or some multiple of fifty dollars.

Duplicate certificates will be issued for all deposits. The party depositing must endorse upon the original certificate the denomination of notes regr'd, and whether they are to be issued in blank or pay'ble to order. When so endorsed it must be left with the officer receiving the deposits, to be sent to the Treasury Department.

The notes will be transmitted to the owners free of transportation charges as soon after the receipt of the original Certificates of deposit as they can be prepared.

Interest will be allowed to August 15 on all deposits made prior to that date, and will be paid by the Department upon receipt of the original certificates.

As the said interest falls due August 15, persons making deposits subsequent to that date must pay the interest accrued from date of note to date of deposit.

Parties depositing twenty thousand dollars and upward for these notes at any one time will be allowed a commission of one-quarter of one per cent., which will be paid by this Department upon the receipt of a bill for the amount, certified to by the officer with whom the deposit was made. No deductions for commissions must be made from the deposits.

Officers receiving de osits will see that the proper endorsements are made upon the original certificates.

All officers authorized to receive deposits are requested to give to applicants all desired information, and afford every facility for making subscriptions.

W. P. FESSENDEN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

From the London Sporting Magazine.

A volume that will rank with the very best naval productions of the New or Old World, and the name of Wise will be esteemed as an honorable addition to Cooper, Marryatt, Basilm, "The Old Sailor," Herman Melville, and Scott. The book is most interesting and startling in its incidents, and admirably constructed; the language is earnest, nervous, and graphic, and the characters are sketched with artistic skill: and there is an honest, jovial, genial tone throughout the whole which will fail to win the hearty good will of every reader whose object is to be amused and interested.

From the London Athenæum.

For those who love a good stirring sea story, full of excitement and action—fierce encounters with pirates—breathless pursuits of the enemy—hair-breadth escapes and occasional fatal results—with an account of Captain Brand and his crew in their hiding-place in the Isle of Pines, and the terribly evil end they all met at last, may find in this volume what they can spirit and vigor in the chronicles of Lieutenant Wise, known to lovers of nautical stories as Harry Grinde. Those who delight in Rebel fascination that no stories about good heroes, whether soldiers or sailors, can ever hope to rival.

BEFORE PETERSBURG—CARRYING POWDER TO THE MINE.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.]

COL. PLEASANT SUPERINTENDING THE ARRIVAL OF THE POWDER.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.]

BEFORE PETERSBURG.

On this page, and also on pages 572, 576, and 577, we give illustrations of General GRANT'S campaign. THE CROSSING OF THE JAMES by HANCOCK'S corps, illustrated on this page, took place July 2 and 3, from Jones's Neck to Deep Bottom, on the north side. By 6 o'clock the next morning this corps had all crossed the river, and was advancing across Strawberry Plains to the earth-works of the enemy half a mile in its front. Although exposed to a sharp fire in this advance, they pressed steadily forward, and flanking the rebel left, gained a position from which the rebel line could be easily enfiladed, when the enemy gave way. BARLOW'S division captured four 2-pound Parrott guns which the flying rebels left in their embrasures at the edge of the woods. This capture, the credit of which is particularly due to MIKE'S brigade, is illustrated on page 573.

On this page are also two sketches illustrating the interior of the mine exploded in front of Petersburg July 30. One of these represents soldiers carrying the powder down the covered way into the mine: the other the arrival of the powder, superintended by Colonel PLEASANTS. The mine had two chambers at the end of the covered way, and was 400 feet in length. It was made under the supervision of Colonel PLEASANTS. It was 5.6 feet in length, from the entrance to the point where the galleries diverged. A visit to it was not the most delightful trip that could be imagined. In the first place, the covered way by no means afforded entire security to the passengers through it, as there were numerous places covered by the rebel sharp-shooters, who, upon the traveler's appearance, would fire half a dozen shots at once, to make sure of him—particularly aggravating to the men perspiring under the burden of sand-bags or kegs of powder, the latter carried also in bags. The mine being less than four feet in height, it was necessary to bend double in order to pass through it; the atmosphere was insufferably hot, and the ground so slippery as to quickly tire any one not used to such locomotion. Sitting at the end of it, the men passing in the powder as silently as possible, speaking in low tones, and lighted by dimly-burning dark lanterns, a queer sensation was felt on learning that not more than twelve or fourteen feet of earth separated you from the rebels in the earth-works overhead—an effect heightened by the sounds of the rebel workmen countermining, whose blows in faint thuds reached the ear.

A SOLDIER'S LAMENT FOR M'PHERSON.

WHAT mean these wailing strains
That come like summer rains
Through the air;
Their solemn breathings phy
Upon the tranquil day,
The voices of despair.

Let all the woods around,
With music's saddest sound,
Tell that M'Pherson's dead;
Clouds shed your heavy tears,
For in the time of years
Low lies the honored head.

O comrades in the fight,
How his eye's inspiring light
Led us on!
When battle-trumpets blew,
How grandly he dashed through,
And was gone!

Can we forget the form
That passed to 'mid the storm
Of hissing shot and shell?
'Mid our cheering, wave on wave,
We knew what the look he gave
Was meant to tell.

Ah, giants we became,
When through the battle flame
We saw our hero fall:
We found the foe to yield
His body on the field,
That our breasts might be its pall.

A mother's tears like rain,
A young bride's passionate pain,
O'er his dear face shall pour;
For in the fiercest fight,
Or bivouac's flickering light,
It shines no more!

But far beyond the tears,
Above the mists of years,
The peaceful bow of heaven
Arches in tranquil light:
Their fame, who for the right
Their lives have gladly given.

And on our history's page
Shall gleam through many an age
The name we love to tell;
Our children's children shall repeat it o'er,
"The grand old name of gentleman" he bore,
And bore it well.

THE WADE AND DAVIS MANIFEST.

WE have read with pain the manifesto of Messrs. WADE and WINTER DAVIS: not because of its envenomed hostility to the President, but because of its ill-tempered spirit, which proves conclusively the unfitness of either of the gentlemen for grave counselors in a time of national peril. The President may be wrong, but no such disrespectful critics of his course can be right. These gentlemen seem not to understand that to lose their self-command to the degree of assisting the enemies of the Government is as unpatriotic as it is unmanly, and, while it tends to destroy public confidence in the Administration, forfeits public respect for themselves.

The President may constitutionally veto a bill, or he may allow it to lie, after adjournment, without his signature. In both cases the bill for the time fails to become a law. Now, in the particular case involved in the manifesto of Messrs. WADE and DAVIS, the President received the bill at the last moment, and did not approve it. He might have left it there; but, with his usual frankness of dealing with the country, in which his official conduct may well become a model for his successors, after maturely reflecting upon the principle of the bill, he announced that while he did not approve it as a whole, and consequently could not make it a law by giving it his signature, yet that he did approve some suggestions in it, and in his executive action would be governed by them. Nothing could be simpler, fairer, or further from "despotism." It was his constitutional right to let the bill drop and say nothing about it. But he chose to say that while he could not approve, he could conditionally obey it as a law, yet that he would follow it within the unprescribed limits of his own action so far as it seemed to him wise. In other words, he accepted parts of the bill as suggestions to guide him in his executive conduct. Messrs. WADE and DAVIS complain that he did not accept the bill altogether or reject it entirely. As a law, he did reject it: but, like a wise man, he embraced the sound principles he found in it, and will act upon them.

To declare, as Messrs. WADE and DAVIS indignantly do, that such a notification is unprecedented, is true, but not in the injurious sense they intend. It is in accordance with the perfect confidence in the people which the President always manifests, and which endears him so closely to the popular heart. The Chief Magistrate is certainly not forbidden to announce the general principles which will govern his action, whether he do it without special occasion or in his annual or a special message, or in the form of a proclamation explaining why he has not signed a bill. To charge him, because he does so, with extraordinary and dangerous assumptions of power, is childish. MR. LINCOLN is a candidate for re-election by the people. It is likely to take a step which there is no necessity for his taking at all, and which, if it so plainly lead to absolute despotism and the preference of his arbitrary will to every other consideration, then leads, as he perfectly well knows, straight to his own political annihilation?

The insinuation of Messrs. WADE and DAVIS that the President refuses his assent to their bill from motives of personal ambition is entirely unworthy of them. It is part of the desperate struggle of those who are hostile to the Administration to represent him as destroying all our liberties, and mismanaging the war only to secure his own re-election. Messrs. BENJAMIN F. WADE and HENRY WINTER DAVIS condescend to pander to this effort. But against such assaults, whether coming from shaded friend or open foe, the personal character of the President, as revealed in the fierce light of the war, must be his sufficient defense. From the day when covert rebellion lay in wait to assassinate him in Baltimore, through all the mad rhapsody of the rebel press down to the last malignant sneer of Copperhead Conservatism, the popular confidence in the unswerving fidelity and purity of purpose of the President has smiled the storm to scorn. We hear occasionally of Secretary SEWARD'S little bill, whose tinkle by the President's permission sends any citizen unheard to a dungeon. But nobody knows, and nobody wishes to know more than the President and the Secretary that twenty million pairs of eyes watch that little bell, and its tinkle is effective only because the people who look with those eyes see that the bell is rung to save their liberties, not to secure their slavery. It is simply impossible to make the American people believe that the President is a wily despot or a political humbug. His every act proves, his public and private policy is open to discussion, but that he loves the Union less, or is less faithful to the Constitution than the bitterest of his enemies, we are sure no loyal man honestly believes.

Nor is the censure of the manifest of Messrs. WADE and DAVIS a party matter. There is no party considerable enough in the Union. Unionmen of the country have nominated MR. LINCOLN upon the strength of the general course of his administration and his unquestioned patriotism. They do not profess to approve every act, or to agree with every measure of that administration; but under all the circumstances of the time and country, and his unswerving fidelity to the cardinal principles which the rebellion attacks, they look to him for the country that he should be re-elected. Whatever, therefore, tends to defeat him helps to throw the country into the hands of the rebels and their allies, while no sensible man can be asked or expected to stultify himself for any purpose whatever, surely every patriotic citizen will take care that his conduct shall be governed by the true issue of things, so that he may not hopelessly injure the very cause to which he is devoted.

If the Chicago nominating convention General M'CLELLAN, our friends who are hostile to MR. LINCOLN must either vote for him, or for General M'CLELLAN, or they will throw the vote of the new convention before the election. That they will vote for M'CLELLAN either directly at the polls or indirectly by withholding their vote, we believe. To call a new convention and make another nomination could not detach from MR. LINCOLN the body of his friends, but might secure the election of the Chicago candidate. It would be a division in face of the enemy. But if the fi of the Administration are so fatal as to justify this course, it would be a more direct vote for the Chicago nominee without the machinery of a third nomination.

These are very obvious considerations, but some of our friends seem to forget them. To criticise the Administration and to censure, upon occasion, is not only legitimate, but patriotic. But there is the censure of a friend and of an enemy. There is a criticism which, free from the least suspicion of private or personal motive, strengthens the Government by friendly suggestion. There is another criticism which, by incessant and insulting carping at the details and omission of the general plan and result of an administration, disheartens the desponding, paralyzes the timid, delights the foe, subdues the loyal heart, and helps the hostile triumph. But if there be any ground of doubt of the patriotic purity of motive in the censor, he not only gives the victory to the enemy, but he loses the confidence that was reposed in himself.

We attribute no unfair motive whatever to Messrs. WADE and DAVIS. Their fidelity to the good cause is unquestioned. But is it not a significant sign to them that they have chosen a method to display their friendship which the rebel press is unquestioned.

A PEACE ADMINISTRATION.

WE have already said that the adoption of the extremest peace measures would not give us peace. Let us look a moment and see why this is.

If the peace party shall come into power the leaders must at once take some practical step to secure the object for which they had been elected. They must, of course, first of all, proclaim a cessation of hostilities, and proceed to negotiate with the rebel chiefs. Now there are but three conceivable solutions of the question outside of war. Either the peace administration and the rebels must agree to a convention by whose decision they will abide; or they must put themselves upon some terms of reconstruction, or they must consent to some kind of separation. The peace party, if it obtains power, must adopt some one of these three measures.

The first of these, a convention, except for the express purpose of arranging the terms of dissolution, is plainly impracticable. For the rebels would of course refuse to abide by any deliberations which might result in declaring the indissolubility of the Union. Why should they not, when the very fact of our offering a convention would show that we were irresolute and tired? If we agreed that the convention should virtually let them have their way, the rebels would naturally accept it. But upon any other conditions does any reasonable man suppose they would accept the action of a convention? Would not the very fact that the peace party had come into power prove to the rebels that they were already substantially successful, and prevent their putting that success to the last magnificent sneer of Copperhead Conservatism, the popular confidence in the unswerving fidelity and purity of purpose of the President has smiled the storm to scorn. We hear occasionally of Secretary SEWARD'S little bill, whose tinkle by the President's permission sends any citizen unheard to a dungeon. But nobody knows, and nobody wishes to know more than the President and the Secretary that twenty million pairs of eyes watch that little bell, and its tinkle is effective only because the people who look with those eyes see that the bell is rung to save their liberties, not to secure their slavery. It is simply impossible to make the American people believe that the President is a wily despot or a political humbug. His every act proves, his public and private policy is open to discussion, but that he loves the Union less, or is less faithful to the Constitution than the bitterest of his enemies, we are sure no loyal man honestly believes.

Nor is the censure of the manifest of Messrs. WADE and DAVIS a party matter. There is no party considerable enough in the Union. Unionmen of the country have nominated MR. LINCOLN upon the strength of the general course of his administration and his unquestioned patriotism. They do not profess to approve every act, or to agree with every measure of that administration; but under all the circumstances of the time and country, and his unswerving fidelity to the cardinal principles which the rebellion attacks, they look to him for the country that he should be re-elected. Whatever, therefore, tends to defeat him helps to throw the country into the hands of the rebels and their allies, while no sensible man can be asked or expected to stultify himself for any purpose whatever, surely every patriotic citizen will take care that his conduct shall be governed by the true issue of things, so that he may not hopelessly injure the very cause to which he is devoted.

If the Chicago nominating convention General M'CLELLAN, our friends who are hostile to MR. LINCOLN must either vote for him, or for General M'CLELLAN, or they will throw the vote of the new convention before the election. That they will vote for M'CLELLAN either directly at the polls or indirectly by withholding their vote, we believe. To call a new convention and make another nomination could not detach from MR. LINCOLN the body of his friends, but might secure the election of the Chicago candidate. It would be a division in face of the enemy. But if the fi of the Administration are so fatal as to justify this course, it would be a more direct vote for the Chicago nominee without the machinery of a third nomination.

These are very obvious considerations, but some of our friends seem to forget them. To criticise the Administration and to censure, upon occasion, is not only legitimate, but patriotic. But there is the censure of a friend and of an enemy. There is a criticism which, free from the least suspicion of private or personal motive, strengthens the Government by friendly suggestion. There is another criticism which, by incessant and insulting carping at the details and omission of the general plan and result of an administration, disheartens the desponding, paralyzes the timid, delights the foe, subdues the loyal heart, and helps the hostile triumph. But if there be any ground of doubt of the patriotic purity of motive in the censor, he not only gives the victory to the enemy, but he loses the confidence that was reposed in himself.

We attribute no unfair motive whatever to Messrs. WADE and DAVIS. Their fidelity to the good cause is unquestioned. But is it not a significant sign to them that they have chosen a method to display their friendship which the rebel press is unquestioned.

WE have already said that the adoption of the extremest peace measures would not give us peace. Let us look a moment and see why this is.

If the peace party shall come into power the leaders must at once take some practical step to secure the object for which they had been elected. They must, of course, first of all, proclaim a cessation of hostilities, and proceed to negotiate with the rebel chiefs. Now there are but three conceivable solutions of the question outside of war. Either the peace administration and the rebels must agree to a convention by whose decision they will abide; or they must put themselves upon some terms of reconstruction, or they must consent to some kind of separation. The peace party, if it obtains power, must adopt some one of these three measures.

The first of these, a convention, except for the express purpose of arranging the terms of dissolution, is plainly impracticable. For the rebels would of course refuse to abide by any deliberations which might result in declaring the indissolubility of the Union. Why should they not, when the very fact of our offering a convention would show that we were irresolute and tired? If we agreed that the convention should virtually let them have their way, the rebels would naturally accept it. But upon any other conditions does any reasonable man suppose they would accept the action of a convention? Would not the very fact that the peace party had come into power prove to the rebels that they were already substantially successful, and prevent their putting that success to the last magnificent sneer of Copperhead Conservatism, the popular confidence in the unswerving fidelity and purity of purpose of the President has smiled the storm to scorn. We hear occasionally of Secretary SEWARD'S little bill, whose tinkle by the President's permission sends any citizen unheard to a dungeon. But nobody knows, and nobody wishes to know more than the President and the Secretary that twenty million pairs of eyes watch that little bell, and its tinkle is effective only because the people who look with those eyes see that the bell is rung to save their liberties, not to secure their slavery. It is simply impossible to make the American people believe that the President is a wily despot or a political humbug. His every act proves, his public and private policy is open to discussion, but that he loves the Union less, or is less faithful to the Constitution than the bitterest of his enemies, we are sure no loyal man honestly believes.

Nor is the censure of the manifest of Messrs. WADE and DAVIS a party matter. There is no party considerable enough in the Union. Unionmen of the country have nominated MR. LINCOLN upon the strength of the general course of his administration and his unquestioned patriotism. They do not profess to approve every act, or to agree with every measure of that administration; but under all the circumstances of the time and country, and his unswerving fidelity to the cardinal principles which the rebellion attacks, they look to him for the country that he should be re-elected. Whatever, therefore, tends to defeat him helps to throw the country into the hands of the rebels and their allies, while no sensible man can be asked or expected to stultify himself for any purpose whatever, surely every patriotic citizen will take care that his conduct shall be governed by the true issue of things, so that he may not hopelessly injure the very cause to which he is devoted.

If the Chicago nominating convention General M'CLELLAN, our friends who are hostile to MR. LINCOLN must either vote for him, or for General M'CLELLAN, or they will throw the vote of the new convention before the election. That they will vote for M'CLELLAN either directly at the polls or indirectly by withholding their vote, we believe. To call a new convention and make another nomination could not detach from MR. LINCOLN the body of his friends, but might secure the election of the Chicago candidate. It would be a division in face of the enemy. But if the fi of the Administration are so fatal as to justify this course, it would be a more direct vote for the Chicago nominee without the machinery of a third nomination.

These are very obvious considerations, but some of our friends seem to forget them. To criticise the Administration and to censure, upon occasion, is not only legitimate, but patriotic. But there is the censure of a friend and of an enemy. There is a criticism which, free from the least suspicion of private or personal motive, strengthens the Government by friendly suggestion. There is another criticism which, by incessant and insulting carping at the details and omission of the general plan and result of an administration, disheartens the desponding, paralyzes the timid, delights the foe, subdues the loyal heart, and helps the hostile triumph. But if there be any ground of doubt of the patriotic purity of motive in the censor, he not only gives the victory to the enemy, but he loses the confidence that was reposed in himself.

We attribute no unfair motive whatever to Messrs. WADE and DAVIS. Their fidelity to the good cause is unquestioned. But is it not a significant sign to them that they have chosen a method to display their friendship which the rebel press is unquestioned. If, however, the most obsequious peace party were brought at once into power, it is impossible to conceive any policy which they could adopt that would avoid war. That most flattering promises must fail. They could say neither blood nor money, while they would transfer the seat of war from the South to the North, and plunge every part of the land into mere anarchy. Ought is not, indeed, to be enough to name the names and contemplate the characters and careers of the men who are the most vociferous and acknowledged champions of the peace policy? Think of them, think of the most eminent among them, and then ask whether such leaders can honorably save any nation under any circumstances whatever. Will those men who are universally respected declare that peace is possible with honor, the people will cry Amen! But while those who command respect whether by character nor ability incessantly vituperate the Government and clamor for peace upon rebel terms, the people will continue to cry "Pooh!"

SHOULD M'CLELLAN BE RE-CALLED?

SEVERAL weeks since we recounted the reasons why it would be unwise to recall General M'CLELLAN into active service. It was not because of any conscious collusion upon his part with the rebels, not because of his mischievous military records, but because of his total want of sympathy with the convictions and policy of the Administration. The views then expressed we have certainly seen no occasion to modify. At a late meeting in Hempstead General M'CLELLAN is reported to have said that he enjoyed his flattering reception was offered not to him, but to the cause which he represented. He vaguely explained by saying that the cause was the country; but how he represents the country more than any other citizen not in rebellion—than General BUELL or General FREMONT, for instance—it is not easy to see. The cause is a cause which he does represent, and it is precisely because of that fact that it seems to us unwise to recall him.

In view of all our history, and of the developments of the war, there is yet a party which holds that this rebellion, if not justified, was at least palliated by the discussion of slavery; which insists that the free and legitimate exercise of the most fundamental right of a free party government was censurable, if not almost treasonable; which believes that the Southern system of slavery—notwithstanding the facts of thirty years' and of human nature—is perfectly consonant with a republic like ours; which maintains that, in waging the war against this rebellion, the humane and unanswerable appeal to any thing about slavery except to return the slaves who escape to our lines to their masters, is to be unwarrantably timid; which, with a good foe negroes, that the President is a weak trickster, that the principles and policy of the Administration are fundamentally false, and which steadily flouts and insults the great American doctrine of equal rights as "Niggerism."

This is the cause and the party which General M'CLELLAN represents; and because he represents it, he is not, and can not be considered merely a soldier. We might agree that he was personally a brave man and a good officer, but that would not affect the question of his recall. The moment the Administration summons him, he did it surrenders its own convictions and policy, not to General M'CLELLAN, but to the party and its leaders of whom he is merely the figure-head. For he would be but the entering wedge. If every thing went well, we should hear a shout all along the line of his party that the country had become convinced by genius of this great chieftain, who must be made President by acclamation. If things went ill, we should hear that the same unanswerable logic that was because of the outrageous jealousy and interference of the President and the "Washington Directory." If they went very ill, even the General himself would be incompetent; that cry would swell as it did when he was before in command, into a shout that it was his duty to turn out the imbeciles at Washington and install himself Dictator in their place. Thus, were M'CLELLAN recalled, the tactics of "the cause and the party" which he represents would constantly tend to the same end, namely, their return to political power by any means whatever.

We cannot share the chastened faith that his recall is so strenuously urged at this moment by those of his friends who doubt whether he is to be the Chicago nomination. But General M'CLELLAN has chosen to paralyze his power of serving the country in this war as a soldier by accepting the leadership of the political party which unaccomously reviles and opposes the Government, and he has therefore no right to complain that the Department declines to undertake to blend a policy which he agrees with one that he does not. If, however, the President should yield, he may be very sure that in case of any disaster under M'CLELLAN, the same papers which now so smoothly urge his recall merely as a soldier, would then most loudly insist upon his deposing the Government as a Dictator.

General M'CLELLAN, it must be remembered, is not a Copperhead. Since he has been in office he has said nothing and done nothing which showed either great ability or comprehension of the emergency. He has made several non-committal speeches, he has written a letter urging the election in Pennsylvania of the candidate for whose success the rebels were praying; and he has delivered an oration at West Point, remarkable only for its commonplace platitudes, and for declaring that the war should be prosecuted for the restoration of the Union. He has also published a Defense of his Chickahominy Campaign, the object of which is to show that he was not responsible for its disasters and catastrophes—a point upon which he differs with many leading military men in the land. Another Democratic Senator has also gained an advantage at Antietam, but did not call up his reserve to secure it, and by giving LEE a day's grace, enabled him to withdraw and save his army, thus showing himself to be an eminent disciple of the BUELL school of war.

These are his services. But whether the President be entreated to recall him to the field, or the country be solicited to make him President and Commander-in-chief, he is still but a puppet. Behind him, and controlling his words and acts, are men who are doing and have done what they can to delay the aggressions of the rebellion by discouraging the national hope and paralyzing the national endeavors. General MCCLELLAN is to be judged by the "causes" and the party which he represents; and whoever urges his recall to service urges the Administration to open Pandora's box.

THE BLACK TROOPS.

THERE can be nothing more pitiful than the malevolent eagerness with which certain newspapers deride the colored troops for being no braver than the white troops at Petersburg. Did the negroes run at Bull Run, they ask? Long ago, prove that white men were cowards? Did the misfortune of the noble Second Corps, five or six weeks ago, which General GRANT's order announced must be retrieved, show that they were poor soldiers? Or did every sensible man say at once that the reputation of that brave army was not to be lost by a mishap which might occur to the best corps of the best army in the world? The expression of the late disaster in General M'COOK's cavalry—caused by the fact, as reported, that the men were drunk with whiskey—is it generally asserted that if the Government chooses to employ white cavalry, nothing is to be expected but that they will get drunk and be whipped on every occasion?

Of course not. When we read of M'COOK's misfortune we remember SHERIDAN's, and KAUTZ's, and GUERNSON's, and AVERILL's daring and victorious excursions, and we stand on edge with pride and gratitude the valor of our cavalry while we regret every mischance that befalls them. When we heard that the Second Corps had been flanked and had lost prisoners, we recalled their dauntless conduct at Spottsylvania and in the Wilderness, and shared with them over the temporary shadow that obscured their name. And every sensible and true American citizen, when he reads of the flanking and retreat of the colored troops at Petersburg, recollects Fort Wagner, Olustee, Milliken's Bend, and Beaver Dam's charge upon the very ground at Petersburg, and knows that the failure is not the proof of cowardice or incompetency, but is one of the painful events from which the record of no corps and no army can be entirely free.

We have always insisted that colored men should have the same chance of fighting in this war that white men have; and we have always believed that, when for battle, they would show the same spirit as black. For both the success of the war, the last assault at Petersburg included, belief our belief. And we may fairly ask whether any class of men—whether black or white—whose services had been so grudgingly received and so reluctantly rewarded; who knew that their purpose was equally with defiance, massacre, or slavery, and for whose wrongs retaliation so loudly promised was as yet not inflicted; who were so ruthlessly shuffled, and insulted as the colored men in this country are—we may fairly ask whether any soldiers would have fought more manfully and bravely and willingly than the colored troops in the Union army?

The mental and moral condition of those who begrudge fair play to the most unfortunate, but by no means the least meritorious class of our population, is one of the most melancholy phenomena of the times. The war of that fair play has produced the war, and until we conclude in the war under some form will continue. The most brutal party of our population, led by "Conservative" demagogues, incessantly declare that "niggers are only fit for slaves." The most intelligent American citizens, in the conscience of all Christian civilization, rejects the foul injustice. It is the conflict of that enlightened sense of equity and right with the ferocious determination of class privilege and prejudice which is reddening our soil every where. Whoever pardons to that injustice prolongs the war. Whoever cherishes it postpones the peace which can be permanently established upon Justice only.

The more thoughtful among those who are committed by party spirit and jealousy to fostering the unmanly refusal to allow the black race fair play in this country must sometimes clearly see the hopelessness of their cause. They know as well as we that their profession of seeking the real interest of that race is a self-delusion. They know that the word slavery expresses some form of injustice, disguise it as they may; and they are morally certain that they are fighting against the human heart, against the instinct of civilization, and against the power of the world. In such a cause, however they may prolong it, they are doomed to defeat and ignominy. They know, as we all do, that General GRANT is the representative of one of the colored troops in the revolutionary battle of Rhode Island is a more humane and enlightened figure than any imputation that would have been had he sneered at them as unfit for soldiers because they were "niggers." For that is not the spirit which makes honorable men or great nations. We, long ago, made up into history.

And in our children's eyes which will seem nobler, the men who died bravely fighting upon the flanks of Wagner and Petersburg, or on the plains of Olustee and Milliken's Bend, or those who contemptuously cried as they read the story of the last disaster, "Pshaw! niggers never will make soldiers?"

THE NEW LOAN.

WE gave last week in these columns a perfectly simple description of the new loan and its advantages. Yet to many people all over the country all financial matters are mysteries, yet mysteries which a little explanation will readily remove. We suggest, therefore, to our friends every where, and especially in remote and quiet country districts, that they call meetings to be neighborhood to talk over the loan, to show its direct and vital importance, to point out its peculiar value as an investment, and to explain to every man what to do in order that the United States may get its fifty or five hundred dollars. There are thousands and thousands of people every where who would gladly add to the Government loan if they knew how. The active men in every village and hamlet and country neighborhood, who are used to practical business matters, should form themselves into committees to secure the subscriptions. At least the matter is worthy of their consideration.

The rebel States are bankrupt. The Confederate, already assert that the debt will be repudiated. That the disciples, allies, and well-wishers of the famous Mississippi repudiator, JEFFERSON DAVIS, and of a "Confederacy" which has repudiated all Northern debts, should say so is not strange. But loyal citizens will easily see that the debt is simply the pledge of the people to themselves of all their property. Every citizen is consequently interested in the payment of the debt—first, his honor as a debtor; and then in his interest as a creditor.

Loans and arms are the right and left hands of the nation in war. Any one who would lop or can not bear arms, there are very few who can not lend money. To subscribe to the loan or to go to the field are therefore equally patriotic services; and the former is a service which many a woman who has laid by her earnings can and would willingly render.

FROM THE WESTERN ARMY.

WE have received a letter from "D." in the Western army, inclosing the letter upon BUTLER's death, of which the writer says, "they have the merit of being written currently as news." He kindly adds in another part of his letter, "Allow me to congratulate you upon the wide and healthy influence you are exerting through the columns of Weekly in our army. No rebellion matter that comes to us 'corks' so completely with our feelings as these days of rapidly rising public sentiment. We fight from belief in such a thing as patriotism and love of country; and if our leaders at home shape the installation of the struggle so as to make it more worthy of loving, they will increase our devotion and fighting for it."

Our correspondent subjoins the following authentic particulars in regard to General M'PHERSON's death:

"The morning of July 22d the Army of the Tennessee was in line of battle two miles east of Atlanta, crossing the Augusta Railroad, facing south, with the Seventeenth Corps on the extreme left. Anticipating an attack upon the left flank, General M'PHERSON ordered the Sixteenth Corps, under General Dodge, to form on the left of the Seventeenth, pointing the line northeast. While the movements was being executed the rebels made their first assault. The right of the Seventeenth Corps had not been completed to connect with the left of the Seventeenth, and a column of the enemy penetrated to our rear.

General M'PHERSON, in riding along the line of the Seventeenth Corps, was vociferously cheered by all the troops. Loud patriotism of the heroes of the people. General Dodge. He bowed his acknowledgments with his usual genial grace. A few moments afterwards, in crossing to the line of the Seventeenth Corps, he came upon the force that had turned their left flank, and received from them a volley, by ball struck by a bullet, which passed through the right lung, shattered the spine, and produced almost instant death. The Second Brigade was ordered to charge, recapture a battery of the Seventeenth Corps, and recover the General's body. Lieutenant-Colonel CLARK, General M'PHERSON's Adjutant-General, rode forward with the brigade, and carried the man to a fence by his friends to them to avenge M'PHERSON. They rushed forward with a low cry, swept the rebels from the field like chaff, recaptured the guns, while Lieutenant-Colonel STRONG and Captain BOWMAN, of General M'PHERSON's staff, moved forward with an ambulance, under the guidance of Private Ransom of the Fifteenth Iowa Regiment, and brought off the body.

The following is a copy of the Order issued by General BLAIR, communicating Private RETBOLDS:

HEAD-QUARTERS SEVENTEENTH ARMY CORPS,
IN THE FIELD, NEAR ATLANTA, GEORGIA,
OFFICE ATLANTA, GEORGIA, July 28, 1864.

GENERAL ORDER.—No. 8.

During the bloody battle of the 22d inst., in which this corps was engaged, Private GEORGE J. REYNOLDS, D Company, Fifteenth Iowa Infantry Volunteers, was, while in the performance of duty on the skirmish line, severely wounded in the arm. In attempting to evade capture he came to the rear, where he was relieved and given into the charge of the army, Major-General M'PHERSON, was lying mortally wounded. Forgetting all considerations of self, Private REYNOLDS came to his old commander, and amidst the roar of battle and storm of bullets, administered to the wants of his gallant chief, receiving his dying thanks, and affording him such comfort as lay in his power. Private REYNOLDS' conduct has found favor in his sight. Private REYNOLDS was chiefly instrumental in recovering the body of his dead General, and in conveying it from the battle-field, and assisting in putting it in an ambulance where it was a heavy fire from the enemy, while his wound was still smarted for.

The noble and devoted conduct of this soldier can not be too highly praised, and is commended to the consideration of the officers and men of this command.

In consideration of his gallantry, and noble, unselfish devotion, the "Gold Medal of Honor" will be conferred upon Private REYNOLDS, Company D, Fifteenth Iowa Infantry Volunteers, in front of his command.

This order will be read at the head of every Regiment, Battery, and Detachment of this army.

By Command of

MAJOR-GENERAL FRANK P. BLAIR.

(Signed) Lieutenant-Colonel J. ALEXANDER,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE MILITARY SITUATION.

Since the smooth mode against the enemy's lines before Petersburg, July 30, nothing of importance has transpired in General Grant's army. A truce was allowed by the rebels August 9, to bring off our wounded and dead. The portion of the Weldon Railroad recently in the hands of the rebels was restored to us. The mighty duty of the army, for the time, has been repaired.

The rebel ram Albemarle, built at Edenton, N. C., in 1863, the rebels exploded a mine in front of the Eighteenth Corps, which blew up the rebel ram in the night.

From General Sherman there is little additional news. The heavy battles fought on the 20th, 22d, and 28th of July it is estimated have cost Hood's army 25,000 men, which was more than two fifths and half of that. The Atlanta Appeal of July 24 says that at the rate of fighting since Hood has commanded the army would be annihilated in just three weeks. This was before the battle of the 28th. Of Hood's losses in five or six thousand men, Major-General O. O. Howard has succeeded M'PHERSON in the command of the Army of the Tennessee. Major-General Hooker has unfortunately led to the resignation of Hooker, who is a favorite with the army.

We have the details of the battle of the 28th. On the 27th the army of the Tennessee, General Howard in the line corps lately under M'PHERSON, threatened Atlanta from the east of the city. On the morning of the 28th this army was transferred from this position to the extreme left, where the Army of the Cumberland had been during the man's time, however, and the commanding officer had not yet had time to get his work point which offered to the enemy's position. In the movement from Decatur Logan's division had to march around the whole city, a position between that resting on the Chattahoochee and that occupied by Howard, a distance of about 15 miles. This was accomplished. On Logan's extreme right Jeff C. Davis's division of the Fourteenth Corps was to take its place, but by accident had been filled to the rear. As soon as Howard's army got into position, and had built intrenchments, Hardee's rebel corps, numbering 30,000 men, attacked him furiously with infantry and artillery. Lee, Stewart, and Cheatham, with a brigade of cavalry under Martin, attempted to flank Howard, by dashing on to the rear of Logan's right, by way of woods on his right, and almost succeeded. This rebel column was, however, repulsed by Logan's troops, after two o'clock P.M. The battle lasted till five, no artillery being used by Howard, and very little by Stewart. Our forces had the advantage, as the enemy was wholly unprepared. Logan lost about 1,500 men.

Sherman's position at last advices was such that he invested the city on the north and west especially, having it on the north in a large force forced to the west to cut as he might obtain. The Fourteenth Corps rested on the Chattahoochee Railroad, five miles north of the city.

On the 30th of July General Stoneman, with between three and four thousand cavalry, consisting of Brigadier-General Garrard's command, and another brigade under the Misses Reed. Eighteen miles of the railroad between Atlanta and Macon were destroyed, and a large wagon-train going from Atlanta to Macon burned. M'COOK's cavalry was also taken on the train, were released by Stoneman. Stoneman's superior force under General Iverson, and more than half of the entire command was captured. General Stoneman included. M'COOK made his escape, and has been forwarded to the Department of Washington and the Shenandoah. The rebels have upwards of 1,000 men at various points along the Potomac, and it has seemed to many that Early was contemplating a movement on Washington, and thence into Ohio. What seems most probable is that all the movements for the past few days have been designed to cover their main object, which is the destruction of the Shenandoah. This is as evidences, however, that they will not in future, and perhaps very soon, attempt an invasion of the Northern States in greater force than hitherto. General Grant visited Hunter at his head-quarters at Harper's Ferry, on the 7th July. General Averill had a skirmish with Early's rebels, fought M'Causland's brigade, on the 7th, at Moorfield, defeating them and taking 500 prisoners.

The prisoners on both sides which have been held under fire at Charleston were exchanged on the 6th inst. An effort is being made by the rebel authorities to make Charleston the future exchange point for all prisoners of war.

The United States steamer Fulton arrived at this port, August 8, from Port Royal, having on board the fifty-five released officers whom the rebels had held imprisoned in Charleston under our fire. The retaliatory measure adopted by the Government was perfectly successful. The rebels have started in at the most satisfactory manner. The rebel officers, fifty in number, never having been fairly exposed to the fire from the rebel forts, were on the 5d conveyed in the Connecticut to a point off Sullivan's Island, where they were met by another vessel, the Charlestown, having on board the Federal officers. Having crossed the bar in the Connecticut on either vessel, the Federal officers were invited to dine with Major-General Seldon in the Island Belle, an invitation which most of them accepted. We shall give next week a very interesting sketch of the arrangements designed, in which Admiral Buchanan led his ship and was taken prisoner. Another rebel steamer, the Selma, was captured. Still another, the Gelene, we hatched. The Federal fleet had approached the city. We give herewith a MAP showing Mobile Bay, the City, and its defenses. The numbers on the map indicate the depth of water in various parts of the channel.

It is believed that there are over 3000 bushwhackers on the north side of the Missouri River. If this be true, the task of killing or capturing such a formidable body of thieves and murderers will be a huge one. The last heard of Anderson's gang, who are reported to have done the damage on the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad, they were at Middle Grove, Monroe County, and on the opposite to be pushing on toward Charlton County. Five hundred Federal cavalry are in pursuit of them.

FOREIGN NEWS.

MEXICO.

It appears from advices which have been coming by every mail from Havana lately that Maximilian's empire is not peacefully accepted by the Mexicans. Even by the news of the 24th of July we hear that the Imperialists are not successful in putting down the rebellion. Even by a force of about 500 Juarists, Maximilian has granted an amnesty to all persons whose offenses were strictly political; this, however, does not extend to parties in armed opposition.

EUROPE.

On July 19 a deputation of forty operatives representing Manchester, Stockport, Preston, Oldham, Macclesfield, and other English manufacturing towns, waited by appointment upon Earl Russell at the Foreign Office for the purpose of presenting to his lordship a memorial for the intervention of the British Government in the American war, on account of the stoppage of 90,000 persons engaged in the cotton manufacture. The plea was made to rest, first, on the suffering of the operatives from the war; and, secondly, the hopelessness of the attempt on the part of the North to subjugate the Southern States. Moreover, the deputation begged to submit "that in the opinion of the vast majority of the people of the cotton districts, the Southern States, as well by superior force of arms as by the manifestation of the highest capacity for self-government, had entitled themselves to recognition as an independent Power."

Earl Russell, in reply to the deputation, for the expressed his admiration at the conduct of the operatives, his sympathy with their sufferings, and his sincere regret, but he cannot desire that the time would speedily arrive when the Government might, with good effect, offer a mediation between the contending parties.

The deputation of eminent men of all parties was held at Grosvenor House, Belgrave Square, London, on the 20th, to give formal support and encouragement to the American Union in its war against slavery. An address was drawn up to be sent to the people of the United States. This address recognizes a federal right to be at the basis of the American Constitution. It refers back to similar periods of intestine strife in her Heroditus history, and it coincides with the following sentiment: "The struggle has commenced between the two principles—Liberty and Slavery. The consignee of victory must be the abolition of slavery forever and every where. Hail Liberty! Hail Republic of the United States!" To this address Secretary Seward has made an appropriate reply.

THE CHRISTIAN COMMISSION.

ON page 533 we give an illustration representing the CHRISTIAN COMMISSION on the FIELD OF BATTLE. There is no feature connected with the war which so well illustrates the peculiarity of Republican institutions as the work performed by the Christian and Sanitary Commissions. These are supported not by the Government, but by the people. As our Government is of the people, so is this war the people's war. And the people have taken it upon themselves to take care of the soldiers. This is a peculiarity which distinguishes the North from the South in the conduct of the war. It is on this account that the losses from sickness, and especially from wounds, have been so few in our army as compared with that of the rebels.

Says the Richmond Enquirer of August 5, alluding to our refrigerator ships over the rebels in cannon and ships and otherwise: "Their dietetic and sanitary system have saved them thousands of soldiers who would have died upon the coarse fare of the military hospital. Preserved fruits, dessicated vegetables, solidified milk, the condensed nutriment of meat, the concentrated essence of tea and coffee, wines, and pure spirits, accompany the hospital every where. Ices and cordials refresh, patent mattresses, rubber beds, and hair mattresses solace the sick and the wounded. When the field hospitals beyond the Appomattox suffered for water a canal was cut and steam pumps put in, and an abundant supply was furnished."

This service likewise has its sacrifices and its martyrs. Thousands of Christian men and women are giving up the pleasures of home, and it often happens that they give their lives also. Soldiers' wives work in the hospital while their husbands fight on the field. While BARLOW is taking care on at Fredericksburg his wife dies in the region of fever contracted in the hospital. While M'PHERSON falls before Atlanta, Professor HARKNESS dies in New York, worn out with weariness by long weeks of exposure and fatigue suffered for the soldier's sake.

CHAPTER XLI.

THE WILD WOMAN.

WHAT was she to do? Try another pawnshop? She had no passport. They must have papers. It was the law, it seemed. But how did people get papers? Were they born with papers? Should she go back to the goldsmiths on the Quai and try them once more? Alas! of what avail would that be? She would receive only the same answers, the same rebuffs. Was there no one in this enormous city of Paris who would pertinaciously engage from a quarter to what she wanted to run away? She had heard of a place called the Temple. She had read of it, too, and Madame de Genlis had talked to her about it hundreds of times as the site of that old donjon keep where the Martyr King and his queen had lain in captivity, and where the poor little Dauphin had been handed over to the cobbler Simon, to be slowly tortured to death. The donjon keep was pulled down now, and the Temple was a place where they bought and sold every thing. Should she ask her way there? But she knew that she would have to pass close to the Morgue, and an indefinable terror forbade her to retrace her footsteps.

She came, suddenly, in the middle of the pavement, on a merchand d'habits—an old-clothesman. No Jew was he. In Paris Christians do not disdain to ply over the bag, and wear the three hats. This fellow was a Marseillais, swarthy and bright-eyed, with a head of tufted black hair, dazzling white teeth, and earrings. He had two umbrellas beneath one arm, and a cavalry sabre beneath the other, a cocked-hat in one hand and a pair of boots on his hands, a pair of patent-leather boots tucked in his waistband, and any number of loose garments flying all abroad about him: besides his bulging bag.

"Trouv de Lai!" cried the marchand d'habits when he saw her. "What a pretty girl!"

"Will you buy a locket?" said the girl, shrinking from the man's bold gaze, and holding out the trinket with her little trembling hand. She was desperate now. She would have had courage to ask the statue of Henry the Fourth on the Pont Neuf if she could buy a locket.

"Carragou de zeval," exclaimed the Marseillais in return, "I am not a jeweler. What do you want for your little bretelque, mon ance zérie?"

"A hundred francs," replied Lily, half choking.

"Masoulpatam!" shouted the marchand d'habits, who seemed to possess an inexhaustible arsenal of strange exclamations. "Vocase ou rouinez? Ma, I will be generous. Ze sous Chrétien, tous, et pas one Zoux. Twelve francs fifty centimes for your locket."

"No," cried Lily, passionately. She could have strangled the man.

"Quesco! crrricsicou!" continued the Marseillais. "Don't fly into a temper. I don't buy jewelry or fine clothes. Come and breakfast with me. Allons manger, allons boire!"... And the eyes of the old-clothesman sparkled like unto live coals.

Lily drew her shawl about her, and, spurning his offer, walked indignantly away.

"Fil de Pilate!" the Marseillais muttered, looking after her, "c'est onze zentille petite fillette za. Never mind. I shall dance at the Barriere du Trone to-night. Marchand d'habits-i-i-i-ts." And with his lugubrious and longdrawn-out chant, his bag and his bright eyes, the old-clothesman went on his way. There were magnificent eyes, only he had spoiled them by a habit of squinting, contracted through the endeavor to glance at the first floor windows on both sides of the street at once, to see whether the occupants had any old clothes to sell.

Twelve francs fifty for her locket! The villains. The wicked, hard-hearted people, she thought. Had she had time she could have sat down on a door-step, covered her face with her hands, and cried her eyes out. But it was with her as with the Wandering Jew, "On—on! Onward!"

She remembered that she was not yet quite destitute. Her breakfast paid for, she was still the possessor of twenty-seven silver centimes in francs. That would carry her some distance toward her destination—support her for some days, she thought. And then she would beg. See how beg! Perhaps there were cottages on the road where the people were kind and would give her bread and milk and allow her to sleep on the straw in their barns. She would have nothing more to do with this cruel and pitiless Paris. She would forget her sorrows there. Even if it was to be prosecuted she had not the slightest idea. She knew she had to reach the coast and to cross the sea: that was all.

The Marseillais marchand d'habits had told her, the rascal! that he never bought jewelry on fete-days. Once or twice before in the course of that weary morning's travel she had heard about the festivals. At the pawnbroker's they had bidden her come to-day, as the establishment to close. The pour, it seems, must pawn even on the morning of a holiday, so the commissionaire opened the door for an hour or two before the business of pleasure began.

Lily saw that there were a great many more people about this morning than on ordinary days; that many of the shops, and nearly all those of a superior class, were closed; that the trees and streamers and flags were more numerous; the gristettes clean caps; that the students of the School of St. Cyr were abroad in their holiday clothes; that the gendarmerie of the Seine looked unusually spruce and burnished up; and that the very sergents de ville had waxed their mustaches and given their sword-hilts an extra polish. There were a good many flowers about: from many of the windows hung banners and streamers; and in the narrow streets the lie holding rose great black triangular stages, like monumental scaffolds, for the dancers, supporting on their many rungs pipkins full of oil and tallow, in which were huge cotton wicks. These were the lamps for illuminating the evening's delights.

Then Lily all at once remembered that this was the twenty-seventh of July, and that Madame de Genlis had told her that the twenty-sixth, the twenty-eighth, and the twenty-ninth of that month, in every year, the official gala-days of the Court, the city was en fete. Lily recollected in their own favor by M. le Duc d'Orleans and the banker Lafitte. It is an official celebration, with a procession, a parade, speeches, and the maskings and mummeries and tight-rope dancing are all paid for out of the public treasury. Therefore, the festivities will be on a right-royal scale. Every one looked happy: every body must be happy, thought the poor little outcast runaway, as she looked at every sight in her at the sight of the smiles and the joyous faces. She little knew that among that laughing concourse there were many whose numbers ten thousand times more miserable than she.

It was good that she should not know it. It would not have consoled her. But she had not arrived at that age when "there is something not absolutely disagreeable to us in the misfortunes of our best friends." It is nevertheless she was herself—being, as you know, young and silly, and with the romance of the world—the reader she was to sympathize with sorrow: it was but a little foil at the best, but she never grew out of her folly.

So it was a grand holiday, a very grand holiday. The government liked to encourage holidays; the people liked to keep them; the authorities and saved them from getting the headache over those stupid newspapers. On the third, and grandest day of the fetes, the newspapers were not published at all: another thing which the government liked dearly. A good government, a paternal government, a fully-developed government; it rejoiced to see the hard-worked editors and reporters strolling in the Elysian Fields, dining at the restaurants, and dancing at the Chaumiere—even if they danced that naughty cancan—instead of muddling their brains in the composition of the leaders, or blackening their finger-nails with the bone in taking crabbed shorthand notes of the long-winded debates of the Chambers. "Enjoy yourselves, my children," cried this good government. "In those last years of July we will sing the Te Deum for the Tuileries yonder. See: he wears a tricolored cockade, the emblem of Liberty, in his hat. Is that not good of him? Let us celebrate the feast of the Patriots of July. What glorious fellows they were! Shout! How nobly they fought. Fire the cannon! How heroically they died. Drub the double drums! How very soundly they sleep in the vaults under the column in the Place de la Bastille! Let us extol all their healths, and inscribe all their names, even to the humblest blouse-wearer, in golden letters on the marble plinth. As for the patriots of to-day, they are a pack of sulky disagreeable grumblers, mere spoil-sports and troublefetes, and, lest they should mar the bright sunshine of our holiday, we have put them away in the casemates of Belle Isle, and Mont St. Michel, and Doullens, and turned a big key on them. Soldiers! bring your muskets to the 'ready,' and, bombardiers, keep your matches lighted. This is a fete-day. Every body is to enjoy himself under pain of immediate arrest. Eat, drink, and be merry, my children. Go to the play for nothing. See the illuminations, and the fireworks, and the water-jests, for nothing. And while you, who are your parents and best friends, shall govern you, and look after all your little affairs at home and abroad. There! take the birchrod of ours is getting a little limp. Excuse us if we use our own."

So spoke the Government of July, thinking it was to last forever; but it, and its dynasty, and its festivals, and all the many little swimming eyes, are dead and gone, and well-nigh effaced from the memory of man.

For another Lily knew the gay doings might be in honor of the birthday of King Louis Philippe, or the birthday of Monsieur Lafitte the banker. To her truth the revelation of Life's cowardice but a very dim and meagre impression. Once, when Mademoiselle Esprenemil, who was an Orleanist, and in whose house hundreds of people were killed on the Place du Carrousel fighting against the Swiss guard, she exclaimed, "How very wicked of the people to fight against the king's soldiers!" and was called niguaude, and made to copy out the third chapter of Telemaque for her pains. Lily on ordinary days saw the great doors of the Pension Marcasin at the time of the celebration of the fetes during the whole of the intercession of the penitentiary. Lots of boys or girls had given her, from time to time, glowing accounts of what they had seen during the three glorious days of July those happy, merry fairy tales and fables, as beautiful but as unreal as any in the Arabian Nights.

Now she was privileged—by her own act and deed at least—to see the grand sight, for a momentary peep at which, even, she had often wished. Perhaps she was at all among the merry-makers. But she fled from it all as though it had been a pestilence. She was afraid. While the day lasted, though, it would be folly, it would be madness, to venture into the Elysian Fields, where all the world of Paris would be out walking. No, no: that place was to be avoided at all hazards. Still she had an irresistible craving to see the illuminations and the show before she commenced her flight to England in good earnest. She would wait until evening, she thought, when it would dusk, the crowd would be denser, and the quieter sort of folks gone home, and she might mingle with the throng unnoticed by observant eyes.

Now lagging, now hurrying through a tortuous maze of streets, she came all at once into the Place du Carrousel, in front of the palace of the Tuileries Gardens and the Place de la Concorde one vast Lake of Pleasure, covered with Islands of Delight, Mountains of Joy. She turned away the dangerous open and fled. Ascending the Rue St. Honore she ventured to cross it before the beautiful Church of St. Roch, and even gave a look over the upper part of the Rue de Rivoli into the dismal little labyrinth of by-lanes, full of sellers of old prints, and curiosities, which nestles—well known as the Pâté du Louvre, and which had grown up, a fungus, between the palaces of the Louvre and the Tuileries. To her relief she managed to gain the Quai: not that where the old gold-dealers live, but that which fronts the Quay Gelée, and behind the Pont Royal, and immorously as a little mouse seeking a fresh hole, and, diving down the Rue du Bac, was glad to lose herself in the mazes of Left Bank Paris.

She found out, perhaps, the dimmest little cabinet de lecture, or reading-room, that ever existed in the whole of Paris—perhaps the very dimmest portion of old Paris. It seemed to Lily not much bigger in size than the cage of the godolphin Arabian. It was very old and very gloomy, and so suited her admirably. The old maiden lady who kept this abode of literature was the most venerable, the most time-worn blind with bad powels, and was so deeply immersed in the study of the memoirs of Monsieur Barbier, St. Aubin, that, when Lily entered, she could barely find time to extend her hand for five centimes—the current price of admission to the Cabinet of the Muses.

All the people who frequented the reading-room were old—as old as the visitors whom Madame de Kergolay received, but of a shabbier and more dilapidated type. They seemed to be unwilling to part with their ancient vanity, both in their bodies and their garments, and to be only kept together by means of stays, and braces, and pins, and strings, and bandages, and false spectacles, the springs of false teeth, and the elastic bands of wigs. There never was such a dreary congregation of dusty, purgling, neuralgia, and sciatica, seemed to have gotten hold of the furniture as well as the patrons of the establishment: for every thing sputtered and shook and trembled and creaked. As Lily walked up the room, and chose the darkest corner, the very boards yielded beneath her tread and sent up little clouds of dust, giving to her ankles a wreathed appearance, as though she had been a young Mercury.

There was a tall old gentleman who came to the Cabinet, not to read, but to sleep. It could not be said precisely that he snored, but the air about him seemed to be haunted by the spirit of a defunct trombone. And it was a spirit seemingly in pain.

There was a little old lady who represented a religious order of some kind, for she wore a red plaid shawl, and nothing else. Her face was left a P.P.C. card over the spectacles, on which some one had sketched the lineaments of a death's head; but sketched them very faintly. And most of the time even this was shrouded in her nose, not enabled to ascertain with any degree of certainty, as the little old lady usually kept a copy of the Gazette de France before her, never turning over the pages: and under these circumstances she was only so much newspaper, and so much shawl.

Over against Lily there sat an ancient personage of the male sex, lean and long as Don Quixote, and wearing a night-cap under his hat. He had a huge green cloak with a velvet skin collar; and under this cloak he fondled and cherished a diminutive dog of, apparently, the turnspit breed. There was a very strong probabilation against the introduction of dogs to the Cabinet in a notice hung up at the entrance. But the old gentleman had very probably been offending against the regulations for the last fifty years. He was the senior, the doyen of the customers. Those who surrounded him were too old and feeble to resent his malfeasance, and the lady at the counter was too much engrossed by Monsieur Horace St. Aubin to take notice of any thing outside her book. Still the old man in the cloak was not exempt from occasional twinges of conscience. The little dog was generally very quiet, but, from time to time, feeling himself hot, he would poke his nose from beneath the folds of the mantle with a sharp yap, or a plaintive whine. And then the old would look down at the old man whispering in great trepidation to the refractory animal: "Hush, for Heaven's sake, Lindor! De le sagesse, mon ancien, mon petit Lindor: remember what a risk I am running for thee. Je t'implore, Lindor, de ne pas me compromettre. I implore thee, Lindor, not to compromise me." Once the lean old man caught Lily looking at him. The turnspit had been very restless. The old man regarded her very puzzle with both his white trembling hands, and cast toward Lily a look at once so piteous and so supplicating that the girl felt half inclined to laugh and half to cry.

She staid here, reading newspapers out of date and dog's-eared romances, which excited, for two reasons, her special wonder: first, as to whoever could have written them; and next, whoever could have found readers for them. That they had been diligently conned, however, and to some purpose, was evident; for the edges were yellow and shiny with much thumbing, and many pages were blistered with long dried-up tears.

They were all full of love; but it was not the kind of love that Lily was personally versed in, with which she could sympathize, or from which she could derive any consolation. Silly girl, she was quite raw and ignorant, and had not yet learned to take her heart to pieces and put it together again, like a map puzzle. She had not acquired the art of pressing out the passion, and boiling it down, and putting plenty of sugar to it, and spreading it on paper, as pan is spread upon bread. Lamentable blind creature! She was yet at the A B C of the great alphabet, which, being learned, the learner usually wallows ages on ages, only teaches us to spell the words Disappointment and Despair. She was quite a novice in the grammar of the Rue de Tendre. Had Lily been asked to write a love-letter it would have begun with "I love," and it would have ended with "I love," and there would have been nothing else, except blots, which are the blushes of manuscript. I have known people who pronounced their protestations of affection. They must have been very much in love indeed:

Here she lingered until the day was declining. She went out at last (the maiden lady in the place never heeding her), and she left the old folks there, doddering and coughing feebly in their sleep. Doubtless, who are alive to-day, and the oldest folks always seem to last the longest, may be there, doddering and choking to this day.

Into the crowded streets, not in the broader quay, and over another bridge; but this time it was the Pont de la Concorde, and they were beginning to light the lamps on the balustrade of the Chamber of Deputies. Then she was in the vast Place, by the side of the Luxor obelisk. She could come no longer. Her limbs were beyond the control of reason. She was bewildered—fascinated. Come what may, she must see the fete.

So she sped by the sputting fountains, and entered upon the enormous avenue of the Elysian Fields. The sight almost took away her breath. It was wonderful. Two huge open-air theatres, within whose vast preconcentrive whole regiments of red-legged soldiers were engaged in deadly combat with white-burnoosed Arabs. Here fired cannon and muskets and pistols. Real horses galloped on to the stage, not at all alarmed by the noise, whereas the very smell of the powder almost frightened Lily out of her wits.

But the theatres were only a drop of water in the sea. Here were crowds in every scene. There were Marionettes. There were greasy poles up which adventurous gymnasts climbed, intent on reaching the silver watches, spoons, and mugs—no vulgar legs of mutton here!—suspended to a hoop at the summit. What shouting and clapping there was as each climber, his strained fingers within an inch of the coveted prize, found the treacherous surface beneath, at length too much for him, and so slid down to the bottom again, defeated and fat-begrimed.

There were merry-go-rounds. There were targets at which you could fire as blanc, and if you struck the bull's-eye found a plaster figure of the Emperor Napoleon arise, like a jack-in-a-box. Ninepins; spring top; roulette playing per maccaroons; jugglers; conjurers; ventriloquers; dancing dogs and monkeys; a camel; a bear that beat a tambourine; a goat that danced at the bidding of a gipsy woman dressed up as Esmeralda; a dog that, being desired to name the greatest rogue in company, walked straight up to his master, wagged his tail, and barked an unmistakable "This is he!" several other dogs, with cocked-hats tied under their chins, military coats, and frilled pantaloons, who performed gavottes, looking most mournful the while; a camel, on whose head a little boy executed a sarabend; every thing, in short, that was wonderful, and strange, and delightful.

Booths where gingerbread was sold—brown, sticky-looking, shiny gingerbread, like Moorish faces on a hot day, and with gilded and silvered oval almonds in them, like eyes; booths where sweetmeats were dispensed; where fruit and fried potatoes, and pie-crust—the "delicate little"—and gauffre cakes were to be had—all these abounded. And shrilly sounded above the myriad noises of the throng, and was audible even in the intervals of blank cartridge firing, the voice of the man who sold cocoa. "A la fraîche! A la fraîche!" he cried. A little round tower, with crenelated top bristling with many-colored flags, and hung with gay tinkling bells, was arranged to his back. Beneath him a urn passed the brass pipe and tap from which he frothed his cool but mawkish beverage. Around his body was slung a wooden cestus, and thick hanging from it a store of goblets of burnished tin that shone as bright as silver. Still cried he, "A la fraîche! A la fraîche!" his bells tinkling and his flags waving through the jostling mass.

There were no dandies here, no fan-twirlers. You might look around in vain for gold watch-chains, for varnished boots, for kid gloves, even for robes of silk. This was the People's festival; and they, the People, pure and simple, were here in force. This was one of the great days in the year when Jacques Bonhomme was in his glory, and had the best of it. He might come in a clean blouse, or in a dirty one, or even in his shirt-sleeves; but he was welcome to the show for nothing. So many hundred thousands of francs were set aside every year for his behalf by him, and to buy toys, and to make him forget his rights. He forgot them for the nonce; but the paternal government which considers man on Jacques's behalf found it impossible to make of the whole year one long July, and to have a festival every day. The result of which solution of continuity was, that when it wasn't July, and there were no fire-works, dancing dogs, and open-air theatres, and work was to earn bread dear, Jacques Bonhomme would turn on the paternal government, suddenly remember his rights, and trouble his rulers in person.

Lily thought it very kind indeed of the good gentlemen, whoever they were, who had provided this gay spectacle, and she longed to say something to do with this grand mercy-making. He must be a very good man, she thought. Perhaps it was his birthday.

She had eaten and drunk nothing since breakfast; so, calling to mind that she had money in the district, bought on two sous' worth of gingerbread and an apple. She had even the hardihood to stop one of the men who were carrying trowels strapped on their backs, and, accosting him as "Monsieur," asked him for a glass of cocoa.

The particular merchant she chanced to patronize displayed considerable splendor in the fittings of his establishment. His round tower was covered with crimson cotton velvet, hooped with gilt foil paper, and embowered in his flags was a little bower of bells with cuttenwork of tin.

He frothed up the cocoa so for Lily that the beading bubbles on the rim sparkled in the evening sun like diamonds, and presented her the goblet with an air.

"Drink," he said, "belle dame. It is the nectar of the gods."

It wasn't any thing of the sort. It was merely so much Spanish liquorice boiled down with a little sugar and milk; but the merchant had made a winning way with him that had he asservated that the Nabob of Arcot's diamond was dissolved in the cocoa he might have found those to believe him.

"How much, monsieur?" asked Lily, when she had drunk.

"To you," the merchant replied, with a bow and a flourish, "one sou. A pint of cocoa and a quart of cold air for five centimes."

Lily paid him. Straightway he whisked out a napkin which hung from his centre, rubbed a goblet out with extra polishing, frothed it again, and handed it to Lily.

"Drink again, belle dame," he said. "For this I charge nothing. It is my humble offering to youth and beauty. And I declare that had not my humility, through unfortunate circumstance, stopped deeply of misery, and were not my old grandmother, bis-bas, down yonder in la Sologne in misery, or lack in pails, I would have made you pay nothing for the first."

Although the girl's thirst was assuaged she did not like to offend the hospitable merchant; and so half emptied the goblet he offered her. Then she thanked him and courtesied, and turned, and was soon lost in the crowd.

"I salute you," cried he of the round tower, looking after her retreating figure. "Belle dame, I am at your feet. Pauvre petite," he continued, polishing up his cups, "she is too young and too pretty to be wandering in this tohubohu quite alone. But, bah! she is safer here than on the Boulevard of the Italiens. The blouses will do her no harm. A la fraîche! faites-vous servir! A la fraîche!" and he went on his way, jangling his cups and tinkling his bells.

It was nearly eight o'clock, but bright and fine day indeed yet. Lily had been struggling against temptation for a long time, but she could now resist it no longer. She had never seen one before in her life. She must go inside and see one—a show.

No, not the educated seal, the pictured resemblance of the monster on the cartoon outside the booth, whereof she resided, terrified her. Not the Oriental-menagerie either; the roaring she could hear through the canvas, the squeals and yelps as the keeper plied his switch, and the color peculiar to wild beasts' dens which pulled better than the terrific paintings, much larger than life, of the panther of Java, the gigantic baboon of Senegal, the hyena of Abyssinia, the crocodile of the Nile, and the boa constrictor of Seringapatam, by means of which the enterprising proprietor of the animal menagerie strove to attract patronage. The grand concourse of the combat of animals, where a wretched old white horse was to be baited by snarky mastiffs, she likewise avoided.

But the wax-work show! the royal and imperial exhibition of wax-work of Signor Ventimiglioni (from Milan), she must see that. It cost ten sous to see this show, but Lily paid them.

Signor Ventimiglioni himself took her half franc. He was a tall, sallow man, with a cold-black beard, and wore a velvet waistcoat of scotch plaid. He was evidently very much of the man emperor. He stared very long and very impudently at Lily. What was there about the child that every one stared at so much?

She drew aside a curtain that veiled the entrance and entered. She started back with a shriek at the first object she saw. It was a colossal gendarme in a monstrous cocked-hat and jack-boots. His face, fringed with huge peaked mustaches and whiskers, was that of a fiend. His eyes glared horribly with a fixed and stony gaze. In one gauntleted hand he brandished a flaming sabre, in the other he held the most ominous officers of the Convention Lily had seen in pictures, who came to conduct Marie Antoinette to the scaffold. He would come at last to take her, she thought, shrinking in her inmost soul. She was to be arrested for running away, and trying to sell her clothes.

"You little imbecile," cried a fat cattle-dealer from Poissy, who had followed close at her heels, and giving her a box on the ear, a slight push with his umbrella, "you foolish child, don't you see that ce cuisine à ceinture jaune is only wax?"

The cattle-dealer had paid his ten sous before, and often, and knew the ways of more than one show.

Wax show. He was chuckling at his penetration, when the voice of Signor Ventimiglioni was heard in a shrill treble, issuing from behind him.

"Les armes et les parapluies sont déposés à la porte—weapons and umbrellas must be left in the door. Advance, messieurs et mesdames. Advance, I supplicate you."

The cattle-dealer turned back, grumbling, to give his umbrella. Then he and Lily advanced. The show soon made her feel very faint. It smelt oppressively of lukewarm wax, and saw-dust, and oil-cloths. Apart from the colossal gendarme the Fourth, Monsieur de Voltaire, Napoleon Bonaparte, and Sir Hudson Lowe (who was godly represented in a wig of red wool with leopard's skin, the well-known uniform of general officers in the British army), the collection was mainly composed of historical murderers. Louvet was there, holding, of course, the identical poniard with which he slew the Duke of Berry. Next him Lafarge, and Madame Lafarge with a bottle of Chamberlin before him was representated as absorbed in the composition of a sonnet. Fieschi with his new invention in full play, and dabbled with blood; the personages in the Affair Fualdès, playing boston at a gory card-table; Charlotte de Corday stabbing Marat in a red, red, night-cap of a Toulon galley-slave; the Berghe d'Ivry—for there were victims here as well as murderesses—with her throat cut; and Mr. Courtis of Lyons with a bullet through his head. Horror!

"Call that Madame Lafarge!" the cattle-dealer from Poissy was heard to murmur as he halted before the effigy of a fashionably-dressed lady wearing a white chip bonnet and a black lace veil. "It is not like her. I remember. I do recognais, coquine. Thou hast not been to the fair of Poissy for nothing. Two years since that was Charlotte Corday; last July thou wert the Duchess of Berry previous to her betrayal by the Jew Deutz, and his affaire de cœur with Mademoiselle Stylite, and this gimcrack bonnet on thy head, thou must pass, forsooth, for the Grève Lafarge, ma foi! Nonsense. Let me supercherie course. I demand my money back. I have a great mind to beat thy waxen head off, fraudulent puppet." It was plain that the confiscation of his umbrella still rankled in the cattle-dealer's mind.

Forth again into the Babel of money-making went Lily. She had had enough of shows for the time. Where was she to pass the night? Have shadowy thoughts of sleeping in the open air? How recklessly she had been squandering her slender stock of money! But she could not muster up courage enough to ask the benighted ground. It had a strange and deadly fascination for her, and, like a moth round a candle, she felt she must continue to hover about it; even to her destruction.

She absolutely, before it was quite dark, went to see another show. It is true that this was a humble spectacle, and only cost five sous. The attraction was a solitary one: there was but a wild woman to be seen.

"La femme sauvage—la femme sauvage!—the wild woman!" cried, with stentorian lungs, the orator, in a full suit of armor and a bonnet-à bustle, from the platform in front of the booth. "The wild woman from Madagascar, the horror of the group known as the Inexorable Islands. Her name is Annanovira Zoralde. The idolatrous practices of her ancestors she has abjured, and is a good Christian, wearing three medals blessed by le Saint Père the Pope, who sent to Rome for her expressly to bestow his patronage and benediction upon her; but she lives entirely on raw meat, and neither threats nor persuasion can induce her to wear stays. The wild woman! Ladies and gentlemen! This is her last appearance in France. Reconciled to her illustrious family, she leaves to-morrow morning for Madagascar by the Messageries Royales of Messrs. Lafitte and Caillard, stopping only at Lisbon, in order to take in boat stores for turtle and infantas of the House of Braganza. The wild woman, messieurs les amateurs! Her disposition is amiable, and her tastes are artistic. She can lift a weight of one hundred and fifty kilogrammes with the little finger of her right hand, and suffer a pistille to burn to charcoal on the tip of her tongue. En avant for the wild woman! Admission only five sous, a reduction of eighty-three per cent. in consequence of la chere des cendres—the high price of provisions. Nobody can enter without paying, but paying without entering is permitted by the civil and military authorities."

The crowd, who had been listening to this balderdash with a grin of bewildered complacency, burst into a roar of laughter at the concluding witticism. There was a press of eight-cent pieces at the tax-collector. That prodigal little Lily, after gazing for a while at the violently chromatic portraits of the wild Woman ravaging a Tiger; the Wild Woman riding three wilder horses at once; the Wild Woman in the wilds of Madagascar, taking refuge in the branches of a banian tree from the pursuit of the hunters; the Wild Woman seizing the bull by the tail, and, with the most portderous weights, firing off pistols, and defeating the celebrated Monsieur Grisier in a fencingmatch—after gazing at these more astounding works of art, the desolate little girl wandered into the show, which was now lit by a hooped flaring oil-lamp suspended from the centre pole of the tent, and took her seat with some twenty others on the last of a row of planks placed on trestles.

There was a little proscenium and a rude scenescene supposed to represent Madagascar. On the proper side, in front, was a screen, and on the O. P. sat a hump-backed man with a flageolet and a kettle-drum, the which he thumped and blew alternately.

But he tooted on this pipe and whanged the parchment so long that the audience grew impatient. It was some three hours late for the show to begin. Murmurs of "La femme sauvage! La femme sauvage!" began to be heard.

Is human nature ever so very fickle? was the next expression of the popular wish. The orator in full armor pushed his way through the auditory, jumped on the stage, and disappeared behind the screen. Voices were now heard in angry contention; but still the Wild Woman failed to put appearance.

There was the voice of a man, seemingly endeavoring to pacify an infuriated woman. The man's voice presently ceased at once as that of the orator in chivalric panoply whom she had heard haranguing outside. The voice of the woman—Madame Zoralde, where had she heard those angry tones before? and why did they sound like a death-knell on her ear, and send a cold shiver through her heart?

At this conjuncture a gentleman in a blouse, affected perchance by the heat of the weather, or by inordinate potations of cocoa, and stung to desperation by the prolonged absence of the Wild Woman and the monotonous performance of the flageolet and kettle-drum, cried out, "Attrape, Mayeux!" and flung a roasted apple at the orchestrant. The missile, unfortunately, missed its aim, the man, the hunchback uttered an unearthly yell, and rushed from the stage, shrieking, "Il la garde! Il la garde!"

The sound of something breaking—glass seemingly—was next heard, and a black bottle became visible, flying in the footlights. The gentleman who had flung the pomme cuite, and who occupied a front row, picked the bottle out of the stage, and put it in his pocket.

"Cognac! The Wild Woman must be an ivrhotte."

But the words had scarcely left his lips before the screen was violently dashed down, and a woman, thinly clad in a tawdry and absurd costume, made her appearance in the effulgent company of the orator in armor. I say enforced; for, by one hand she held him by the hair of the head, while in the other she brandished aloft a three-legged stool, with which she was minded, apparently, to brain him.

The astonishment at this to be a part of the performance, and, in fact, the prearranged entrée en scène of the Wild Woman, began to applaud vehemently. But the dolorous expostulations of the armor-clad orator soon undeceived them.

"Help, help!" he cried, in piteous accents; "ladies and gentlemen, I shall be murdered! This woman has taken too much cognac. She is mad. She has killed me!"

Suddenly the Wild Woman relaxed her grasp, flung the showman disdainfully on one side, and stood planted in the middle of the stage, her hands on her sides. Lily looked at her. She was a powerful woman, of Herculean build. It was impossible to discover, through the paint and the sham tattoo-marks with which her face and arms were covered, what the ground-work of her complexion was. A leopard-skin skirt, scandals, a spangled skirt which failed to reach to her knees, and a preposterous head-dress of Dutch metal and feathers.

But anon Lily became conscious that the Wild Woman was looking at her with a fierce, fixed, hungry gaze. There was something in her eyes that struck infinite horror and terror into her. She had just seen them before, when, full of fear advance, as though toward her, Lily started from her seat in affright, and rushed from the booth.

THE FROG.

The head of a turtle, for several days after its separation from the body, retains and exhibits animal life and sensation. An Irishman had decapitated one, and some days afterward was amusing himself by putting sticks in its mouth, which it bit with violence. A lady who saw the proceeding exclaimed:

"Why, Patrick, I thought the turtle was dead?"

"So it was, honey; but the craythur is not sensible of it."

A grammarian complained the increasing hast in somewhat the following style: "Hes, hetter, hottest; hotsen, hot, hotsenor, hotsenest; hotsenation, hotsenable; hotsenism; hot as an oven, not as two ovens, hot as four ovens, hot as seven ovens!" How comfortable to contemplate, this weather!

The following NOTICE, on the marriage of Reuben Wise with Martha Cheeny, is worthy of Reuben Wise's great witty:

For matrimony made her Wise—
Before she was Miss Cheeny."

ETIQUETTE.

When your host's carriage is in waiting someone dinner jump up from your chair, cry out in a hearty manner, "Off we go!" and rush down stairs.

On entering the dining-room lift up the different covers and examine your dish.

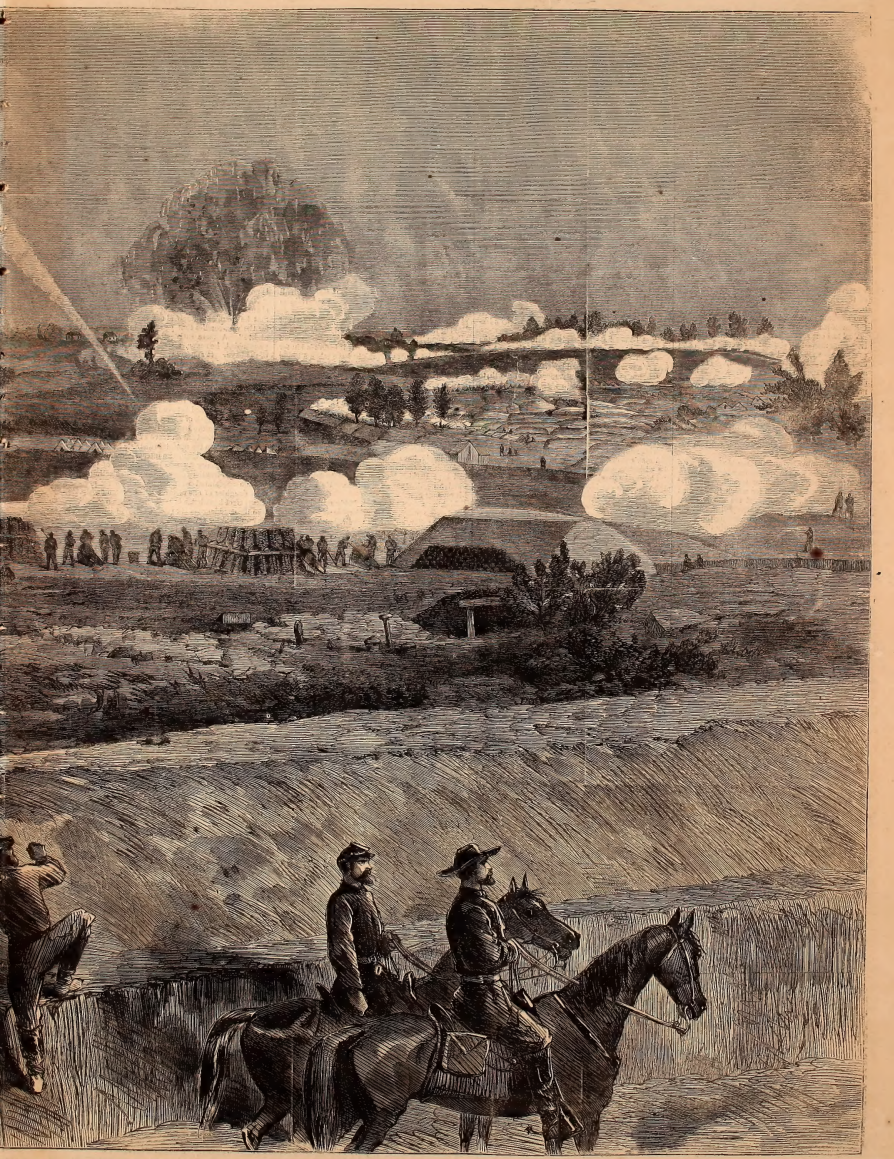
GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN—THE EXPLOSION OF THE MINE AND ASSAULT ON CEM



ETERY HILL, BEFORE PETERSBURG, JULY 30, 1864.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 542.]

A DIRGE.

WILL the dead Hours come again,
From the arms of the buried Years?
Though we call, we call in vain,
And they will not heed our tears.
Why, O why were they slain
By thy fears?

Will the dead Love e'er return
For all thy late desire?
Can thy grief unclose Love's urn,
Or make of the ashes fire,
Though the cinders yet may burn
Round the pyre?

Alas and alas for the Gone!
We mourn, and we mourn in vain,
Like a ghost, or the dreamy tone
Of some long-forgotten strain,
Their memory haunts the Lone
But with pain.

PROFESSOR HALSTEAD'S GIRL.

A CROTCHETY and contrary old chap was Joel Shellenbarger, a rich old farmer, as mulish as the donkeys in his team. He had made his way in the world by the doggedest obstinacy—seizing hold of whatever came in his way, and retaining that hold as though life depended upon it. Joel's multitudeness had literally been the making of him, though you mightn't have considered the little pale, bald, thick-skulled old man as much of a make after all.

Joel had one son—a handsome, clear-headed, active young man—tall, straight as a young larch, and as set in his ways, when he chose to have one, as old Joel himself. This son, as he grew up, had proved a great assistance to his father in working the farm, and his services had been made the most of, the old man managing to keep him at home with him some time after he ought to have been doing for himself. Not an acre of the father's possessions was ever called the son's; he owned nothing in the world save a horse which some uncle had given him when it was a sickly colt, and some sheep obtained in much the same manner; and the old man grudged him the keeping of those.

Joel Shellenbarger and his son Anson differed often, but there were two points on which the difference amounted to something serious. These two point concerned education, for which the old man had a profound contempt—and the son had not. There was a school some dozen miles from the Shellenbarger farm, and thither—having thoroughly prepared himself, in spite of fatherly thwarting and opposition—Anson betook himself, in spite of the same continued opposition, and by one contrivance and another, and helped out by his mother's small pocket-piece, kept himself there till he graduated. Joel Shellenbarger contested the ground inch by inch, but afraid, in his selfishness, to do any thing rash lest he should be obliged to do without, he could leave him. That was the first point of difference and that was how Anson settled it. The second was not likely to be of so easy an arrangement.

At college Anson had found something besides graduating honors. He had chanced upon a very charming combination of brown curls and saucy eyes—a red-lipped, dimple-cheeked fairy, daughter of one of the professors, who, instead of carving her destiny in the honorable suit which his poverty and his father's niggardliness compelled him to wear, never seemed to be conscious of any thing of any body else when he was by.

In short, Anson had found some one to love, somebody he wanted to marry, as he soon informed his father. You should have seen the old man's eyes; it was a mercy they were fast in their sockets. That was gratitude! This Anson, who was already defrauded his old father of so much of his time, was going now to set the seal upon his absurdity and recklessness by marrying a "town girl!" Bad enough to marry any one, seeing his father wasn't through with him yet—but a town girl! Joel Shellenbarger was honest, and expected larger acre should go to strangers before Anson should have one, if he persisted in an idea so ridiculous!

"And pray what harm is there in being a town girl?" questioned Barbie Halstead, when Anson told her, half-laughingly, half-vexed, and altogether dreadful—for without assistance from his father he could not marry Barbie for a long time yet.

Anson laughed, too, but with some embarrassment, saying, "Why father is afraid that a daughter of Professor Halstead would not make a very good farmer's wife."

"Does he think—?" Barbie hesitated, looking with smiling curiosity at her little white hands.

"That these pretty hands don't know much about hewing and baking, etc.? Exactly; I believe he thinks just that."

"Then he thinks wrong," said Barbie, reddening, and looking up at her lover with a comical little pout. "I'll have you see you say you needn't a servant at home? I've a mind to go down and offer for the place."

Anson laughed again, enjoyingly.

"We need one badly enough, but my father will not suffer one inside the house."

"Why, how do you live then? Who cooks for you, now that your mother is ill?"

"We do our own cooking," Anson said, with a return of the half-smiling half-embarrassed expression. "We cook for ourselves, or do without."

The very day succeeding the one which witnessed this conversation Anson was at home busying himself over some culinary operation when the outside door, which stood ajar, was noiselessly pushed wide, and a singularly-attired form presented itself on the threshold. It wore a red and green plaid dress, the checks now bulging, now sharp-lined, and a very frowzy and tumbled-looking white bonnet, the strings of which, nearly as long as Anson's arm, streamed from one side, and within the bonnet the form flopped the inane fell of a cap which clung close around the face of the stranger. The face—what could be seen of it—was a very curious one to be inside of such a bonnet and cap. Just now, as she surveyed the kitchen and Anson—herself still unseen—the muscles about her mouth twitched nervously, and her eyes twinkled with roguish brightness.

Presently Anson looked that way.

Instantly the face took lugubrious length; and coming into the room the girl said, insinuatingly, but without looking at him,

"An' would ye be aither hirin' a servant the day?" and stood fidgeting with the fringe of her shawl.

"I believe not," said Anson, coloring with some annoyance, perhaps, at the nature of his employment.

"Shure, Sir, an' the lady that sint me—God bless her sowl—said you'd be wantin' to take me on her riccommendation, which I has in me pocket—and here 'tis now."

She gave him a little note, which proved to be from Barbie Halstead. Anson read it with very lover-like carefulness, but shook his head.

"I am sorry, very, very sorry, good girl, but we do not wish to hire a servant."

"Bliks your father mayn't object while he sees me," the girl persisted.

Anson looked at the solled white bonnet and the red flannel, and repressed a laugh, considering what his father would say. But he was of too kindly a nature to be willing to expose even this servant to the ridicule of encountering the old man, and so he had said before, assuring her that it would be of no use to see his father.

The girl stood a moment—"If ye plaze, Sur, I'll just see him a monint. Belike he may take a likin' to the look o' me."

And before Anson could reply she had crossed the room, and stood upon the threshold of the next.

Anson followed presently, curious to see what sort of a reception the girl would get.

"Shure an' I'll do plinty more'n I'm worth to yees," she was saying with innocent emphasis as Anson entered.

She talked rapidly, pouring out such a torrent of words that the old man could not by any possibility slip one in edgewise, and so, regarding her with an expression of the most ludicrous astonishment.

The remarkable volubility completely baffled the old man's slowness. He could not say a word if he wished to, and when she concluded at last with "I is make bigood bread, and I is make pies, and the very eyes out iv yer head, and make ye swally yer tongue with delightsomeness" (if he had a weakness it was for pastry—Anson knew that well), he could only twirl his thumbs in a sort of delicious awe, and ask her with a cunning smile how much she expected "to git for all that?" then thought.

"Seventy-five cents a week," was the prompt reply.

With a still more cunning laugh Joel offered her half the money.

Greatly to his amazement she agreed at once, and he found himself, to use his own expression, "in for it." To add to his chagrin, Anson stood by laughing with intense enjoyment.

But the girl, without further ado, proceeded to disencumber herself of bonnet and shawl, and vanished in the direction of the kitchen before any thing more could be said.

As she shut the door she stole a glance at Anson from between the curls of her hip, and then, watched, he strolled kitchenward also. She was already at work, handling the broom like an adept, and grumbling in her brogue at the dust that disturbed and mutated in the corners; for the extent of Anson's and his father's sweeping had been to brush the dirt out of the room, somewhat to the disadvantage of the rest.

She did not look up as Anson entered; but he sat down, and deliberately lighted his pipe, watched her. For some time she seemed unconscious of his scrutiny; but presently she turned, and clasping both hands upon the top of the broom-handle, looked, with a mixture of bravado and archness too natural to be mistaken,

"Well, Anson, what do you think?"

The young man laughed and looked annoyed in the same breath.

"That it is you, Barbie?" he said. "I was suspecting something of the sort."

"Not till I looked at you," said the girl, roguishly, retreating to her occupation.

"Do you think this is quite the thing, Barbie?" Anson said, when his ears told the thing for a poor girl to be gittin' her living decently and honestly?"

And that was all he could get out of her. Having determined upon her course, she was not for an instant she was a most unapproachable "Biddy" the next, and would have nothing to say to him save in that character.

"Does your father know of this, Barbie?—what would he say?" persevered Anson, anxiously.

Anson and his father dined at noon, and Barbie, in her character of waiting-girl, was present. Anson was in a most unhappy state when they left them—had undergone such a remarkably renovating process that old Joel drew back at first, thinking he had set foot in somebody else's house instead of his own. Supper was smoking on the table—such a supper as old Joel, at least, had not seen since his wife was ill. Barbie, in her character, was sitting, propped with pillows, in a great easy-chair, and looking wondrously contented, and with reason: the poor lady had not had a woman's hand about her before since her illness. They lived in such an isolated, inhospitable manner that very few of their neighbors even knew that Mrs. Shellenbarger was not as well as usual. Biddy—as she called herself—had tidied the poor lady up in a wonderful manner.

Joel Shellenbarger sat down to the daintily-spread table, and made a most hearty and keenly-relished meal, glancing askance at Biddy meanwhile.

Anson, strange to say, ate very little, and he watched Biddy askance too.

That was only the beginning of the reforms this daring girl instituted.

First, however, as much, perhaps, for her own peace of mind as Anson's—knowing that mother and son were fast friends and always of one opinion—she told her secret to Mrs. Shellenbarger, and finely wheedled the good lady into approval.

It is true that she shook her head at first, and looked wonderously shocked. But it was to charming purpose. Those little soft hands fluttering about her, and to see such brightness and comfort springing up around, that she could not, for ever see sake, keep remonstrating; so much as silence could, Biddy's mysterious presence.

Then, to excuse her to give you all particulars, but having made so good a beginning, with true Irish facility, Biddy established herself in a very short time completely in the confidence of the old man.

He had a lurking liking for neatness and order, and Mrs. Shellenbarger—poor lady!—wasn't a very good housewife, and had for a long reign allowed cobwebs out of chaos; the house seemed in holiday garb all the time, and an atmosphere of social cheerfulness pervaded every room.

One morning—Biddy had said something about leaving the day before—the old man ended a grumbling complaint with the words, "I never see so good come of edification yet. If it hadn't a bin for that college business you might have taken a liking to a sensible girl like her to you."

He glanced at Biddy as he spoke. She turned scarlet, and came near dropping the dish she was holding. It was the first time Anson had heard such insinuations, and he rather enjoyed Biddy's confusion.

"See here, father," he said, roguishly: "just you pick me out a wife, and see what will come of it."

"The only girl I know of worth having wouldn't have you," said the old man, loud, Biddy" Joel said, grumblingly, but suddenly turning to the girl.

Anson was smiling maliciously. Bridget O'Flynn had kept Barbie's secret—at least Anson had not unrelenting distance all this time. He was taking his revenge now.

But with desperate effort, Biddy rallied her confused senses to say, with considerable self-possession,

"Shure, Sur, an' it isn't meself that 'll be after havin' any one to go for me."

"Biddy, will you marry me?" said Anson, gravely, extending his hand.

"I will," said Biddy, promptly putting her hand in his, while old Joel came near choking with amazement.

It was too late to recede, however, whether he had really wished such a thing or not, as they soon made him understand. He went out of doors presently and privately pinched himself to ascertain if he were in his senses or not. Seeing the two standing in the window in close conversation soon after, he crept with the same laudable intention toward them, under cover of the bushes that grew by the house.

"Now, Barbie," Anson was saying, laughingly, "What is to be done next? I must say you've managed wonderfully well, but what do you suppose he'll say when he knows you're not Biddy at all?"

"Not Biddy at all!" screamed Joel Shellenbarger, struck with a sudden suspicion of he knew not what, as he started out of his covert.

I have said that Joel's sight was quite full of her close cap as immense as ever. She laughed, though, when she saw him, and deliberately taking off her cap shook her bright curls all about her face, and reaching toward him her little hand, said, archly, "Shure, Sir, an' ye won't be aither hatin' a poor girl because her name's Barbie Halstead instead of Biddy O'Flynn!"

"You—you Professor Halstead's girl?"

"Professor Halstead's my father, Sir," said Barbie, in her natural tones.

"What's that?"

Barbie repeated it.

"And you're not Irish?"

"Niver a bit!"

The old man stood a moment, clouds gathering in his face.

"Well, Anson," he said, rather surlily, "you've outwitted me again—much good may it do you. You'd better get out the horses now, and take Halstead's girl home. He must want to see her by this time."

"Yes, Sir." And Anson colored with mingled anger and amusement.

Barbie did not change countenance, however. Extending that pretty hand of hers again, she said, cheerily, "You'll be friends with me, Sir?"

Joel Shellenbarger turned back and gave his hand awkwardly. The girl took it in both hers, looking her bright arch face upward him, and saying, "I shall come back some time, Sir. Will you be glad to see me?"

Joel loosened and waved, and stammered out at last, "Yes, yes; come back, Biddy—I mean Miss O'Flynn—I mean Miss—"

"Barbie," interrupted the girl, quietly.

"Yes, come back; and the sooner the better. There, Anson, make the most on't!"

Barbie did come back, in a very few weeks, too, and nobody was gladder to see her than old Joel, though he was a little shy at first of Professor Halstead's girl. She soon made him forget, however, every thing save that she was Anson's wife; and the way he hummed the sly puss to sundry grants of money and other favors, before she left, I couldn't begin to tell you. But I'll like you to see the Shellenbarger place since Barbie has come there to live.

THE DEATH-LIGHT.

THERE is a bird of the grosebeak tribe, called the baya, of which many curious stories are related by travelers in the East Indies, in some districts of which it is common.

The baya is about the size of the rosate grosebeak of this country, a bird which it also resembles in form. Its plumage is brown, tinged here and there with lemon yellow, and its beak, which is remarkably thick and strong, is of the color and grain of ivory. Hence, among some of the aboriginal tribes it is called by a name which signifies the "elephant bird."

Of all the feathered species none perhaps is so susceptible of education as the baya. It can be taught to fetch and carry like a dog; to hold a silken thread in its beak and fly with it to a distance, until desired to stop, when it alights, and advances slowly along the ground toward its mistress, keeping the line of the proper state of tension while she winds it upon a reel; to feign death when aimed at with a toy pistol; to go through a variety of military evolutions, and to do a hundred other things which would make the fortune of a French poodle of average intellect. The strangest circumstance related about the baya, however, is that it lights up its nest with fire-flies. A traveler, incredulous with respect to what he alleged fact, asked an aged inhabitant of the mountains why the baya—the bird of the day, should thus illuminate its residence at night? To this the hill-chief replied that it is not for man to question the mysteries of nature. "The baya," said he, "beholds you as you move about in the light of the sun, but not to suppose that he troubles himself about the price you pay for the wax-candles that you burn in your tent at night?" No satisfactory solution has been propounded, however, respecting the night-lamps of the baya. It appears that the nest of this bird is partially composed of a great deal of glutinous fibre, to which the fire-flies are attracted, and by which they are caught as it with bird-lime, thus offering a natural repast to the young nestlings.

About the close of the last century, when peace had been proclaimed between the East India Company and the Mahratta chief of Mysore, a Scottish officer, serving in the army of the former, was about proceeding to England on leave of absence. During his service in the mountain districts he had been employed for some time as an interpreter, and finally as a Commissioner for negotiating terms of peace with certain hill-chiefs and tribes. While acting he became acquainted with a beautiful young princess, daughter of one of the rajahs of these people. This prefect blood-type of the Indian princess gained him the confidence of the rajah's family, with whom he remained for several weeks; and the result was that he fell desperately in love with the dark-eyed daughter of his host—a passion which was reciprocated by her with all the ardor of the glowing Oriental temperament.

The blood of the native tribes was yet red upon the hands of the conquerors, and it was the motive of policy alone that the rajah entertained his English guest, the disclosure of any designs on the part of whom with regard to the language of the house would in all probability have led to the death of both. The day had arrived for the departure of the young Englishman. He had a long, farewell interview with his affiancée—for such the rajah's daughter now was—and it was arranged between them that she was to elope with him under the cover of darkness. She was to meet him, soon after nightfall, in a certain grove of mango-trees, whence they were to be conveyed in palanquin to the military station nearest to the frontier.

It was already dusk as the young princess, taking with her all the most valuable ornaments and other jewelry, went stealthily forth from the house, and bent her steps toward the designated rendezvous. She turned down the lane that led from the corner end of the garden to take a last look at the lovely spot in which she had passed the seventeen years of her happy, innocent life. She felt a strong sentiment, but love prevailed, and she opened the garden wicket and went out into the field beyond. As she followed the path that wound through the tall maize her eye fell upon the nest of a baya, which she had observed there the evening before as she walked with her lover. But now the nest had already flown from the nest, around the edge of which a few fireflies still flickered with their pale, uncertain light. Led by a sudden impulse, the young girl took the nest from the branch of the beautiful shrub to which it was attached, and wove it jauntily into the heavy mass of her raven hair. She had made an appropriate present for her lover, who had collected many curious things to take with him to Europe, and had not provided himself with a baya's nest. It wanted yet half an hour of the appointed time of rendezvous when the rajah's daughter entered the mango-tope. Night had fallen, and she seated herself upon one of the stones of a ruined temple and waited for her lover.

That day a leopard had been reported in the neighborhood, and an old shikar, or hunter, lay in wait for it at night on the edge of the cultivated land that it had first been seen. A rustling in the bushes attracted his attention as he lay half dozing in his hammock. "If I could but see the glare of the beast's eyes," said he to himself, "I would soon plant my bullet between them. Something is glimmering among the tall stems yonder now," and he penetrated the gloom with his eagle eye.

Presently the glimmer became more distinct. It moved a little, then sparks of greenish light were plainly discernible through the night, and, taking a steady aim between these, the hunter discharged his matchlock.

No words can describe his horror when, on running to secure his prey, he saw, by the pale moonlight that now began to silver the stems of the mangoes, the dead body of the rajah's daughter, through whose head he had sent the fatal bullet, mistaking the gleaming of the baya's nest in her fair locks for a couching leopard. The time of his agony was brief, however. Now the hour of the rendezvous was passed, and the lover approached, attended by some of his bearers. For a moment he was speechless with horror at the scene that met his view. Then, hardly yet comprehending the situation, a feeling of vengeance took possession of him, and, drawing a pistol from his belt, he shot the old hunter dead upon the spot.

By this time the rajah's people were aroused, for the princess had been missed from the household, and the lamentations of the old shikar, heard from the mango tope, directed the search to that quarter. The wretched lover made no attempt to escape. Paralyzed with horror, he was led before the rajah, whose first impulse was to behead him with his sword. But he reserved him for a more cruel fate.

Years after, when the walls of the rajah's fortress were battered down by the cannon sent against his successor, a human skeleton was found standing upright in a niche that had been laid open. To the skeleton there was chained a plate of gold, an inscription upon which, in the native language, briefly set forth the story narrated above.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT.

"WHAT is the reason you object to live in the old family house, Alfred? The man who drove me from the station told me it was haunted; but you surely do not believe in such nonsense?"

"Certainly not. You must have a bad memory, however, if you can not understand the reason why no earthly inducement would bring me to occupy it."

"Well, my memory is bad enough, I allow; but when I left the country, seventeen years ago, your father and mother occupied it; and I have heard either you or your sister find any fault with it."

"Ah! I had forgotten. You have not heard of the dreadful event which cut us up root and branch for I am the only survivor of the family left, except my poor sister, and I shall never marry."

"Dread it, eh? If you had come out to me in South America when it happened you would have forgotten it long ago, and have seen homes as fully determined to marry and settle down as I am. But tell me all about it, my dear old boy! Let me see—when I left college you had just entered on your first term."

"Just so. Our parting was the first sorrow of my life. How well I remember my mother, sister Fanny, and myself walking with you to the station! Fanny was not much to look at then; but if you had seen her when she was two years older, you would have thought her, as I did, one of the most beautiful girls the sun ever shone upon.

"I understand that sunken Fanny was the rock on which the happiness of your life was wrecked, as novelists say."

"For Heaven's sake, Tom, do not speak another word in that jeering tone! I will tell you what has happened since, on condition that you do not speak of it again. We had a few months together to remain at college when I was sent for, in consequence of the serious illness of my mother. On reaching home I found that Fanny was staying there, and during this time we were necessarily a great deal together. My sister was occupied in attendance on our mother, and could not often accompany us in our walks. Under other circumstances I might have seen so many different faces, have had so many visits to make, and have found so much amusement in field-sports and in talking with my father respecting alterations and improvements about the estate, that I should have had comparatively few opportunities of associating with my cousin. As it was, we were in each other's society for hours daily. The result of this constant association was that I became passionately attached to her; and when my mother had recovered so far as to be out of danger, and I was about to return to college, I obtained from her the acknowledgment that my love was returned, and a full fee with the understanding that when I had taken my degree the day of our marriage should be fixed. If ever there was a man in the world who looked forward with undoubting confidence to a life of happiness I was that man. My father and mother were both favorable to our marriage, and there was no conceivable obstacle to oppose our wishes. The only person whom Fanny had to consult was her aunt, and there was nothing to fear from any objections on her part.

"I do not suppose you remember, even if you ever heard, that this aunt of hers was very rich. She had adopted Fanny and her brother when they were mere children, their father and mother having been drowned in a boat, when their ship was cast down in the Bay of Biscay. Fanny's brother I had never seen. His conduct was so bad at school that he was expelled, and disgusted his aunt so much that she refused to allow him to live with her, and he was sent from home. The frequency with which he wrote to her and his unfilled her feelings with such a dread so far as to induce her to increase his allowance, but she said she had vowed that her whole fortune should go to Fanny alone on her death, and nothing would induce her to break this solemn resolution.

"As I was leaving the college chapel one morning a fresh-man came and said 'Good-morning, Mr. Alfred,' and a man was held before me with a letter. I was so surprised that before I took the letter I looked at the fellow, and a chill came over me when I saw that it was the groom who waited upon me when I was at home. Telling him to go to my rooms, I went into the chapel, which was now empty, and opened the letter. It was written by my father in a hand that echoing me to bear the painful news he had to give me like a man, he told me briefly that Fanny had disappeared on the previous morning, and that they had been seeking her all night in vain. On reading this letter I rushed to my rooms, threw off my cap and gown, and without a quarter of an hour was driving homeward. My first question as I jumped out of the gig and took my father's hand was, 'Have you found her?' His answer was in the negative. He told me she had gone out alone before breakfast, as usual, and had not been seen since, though she had been sought for in every place.

"It may have been a year or more before this that I had taken a great interest in photography, and there was not a picturesque spot about the estate or near it I had not photographed. During my mother's illness it was my chief amusement; and, accompanied by my cousin and a man to carry the apparatus, I had spent whole days in practicing an art which, to me, had all the charm of novelty. I remembered well all the spots which had most pleased her, and where we had afterward walked most frequently. Too impatient to regulate my pace by my father's, I called to my groom to come with me, and set off to search those places beyond the limits of the estate which we had liked most. I had searched several of these without success, and had got as far as The Beeches, when I suddenly recollected that there was a place called 'Clay Hollow,' about two miles distant. This was a very lonely spot, but possessed a beautiful view, and had been a favorite walk of ours since we had discovered it. Wondering why I had not thought of it before, I set out for this place. The pathway which led into the hollow, wound through furze and broom, and came out behind a cottage. Here I called, but had no need to look further. Beneath this oak lay the dead body of the woman with whom I had expected to share my life's happiness.

"If this had happened but an hour ago I should not have had a vivid recollection of what I felt as I looked at the widely-open, glassy eyes and the distorted features which I had last seen full of life and animation. The body was carried home and laid in the servants' hall, and a surgeon was sent for, who, after a brief examination, told us, what I had seen already, that she had been strangled.

"No other motive for the deed except robbery could be suspected; but whether she had been robbed or not nobody could tell, as at that early hour of the morning the cottage was the only house in which any thing about her which any body could steal. There was indeed a brooch missing from her shawl, which was afterward found not among the grass. The necessary legal formalities were gone through the next day, and a verdict of 'Wilful Murder' returned against some person unknown was returned. Perfect love excludes every other feeling. I felt no shrinking horror at the sight of the dead body of my betrothed. All I felt and did I had remained beside the corpse; and it was while looking at the eyes, so changed since the mind had ceased to look out of them, that a thought occurred to me which I had immediately determined to put in execution as soon as the official investigation was over. The idea had been suggested by the retina of the eye might be magnified so as to present a distinct image of the last object depicted upon it. Every object depicted upon the retina of the eye endures for a time, and is succeeded and effaced by another. The duration of the image on the retina is, however, influenced by circumstances, and the eye is directed toward a very brightly-illuminated object the impression made upon the retina is so strong that when the eye is closed the image is not destroyed. The duration of the image is also affected by the condition of the nervous centers, and in the case of death is caused by strangulation the eye becomes charged with a vicious secretion, which is not without, but contained within the eyeball, in which vitality is expelled, and the last image impressed upon it is retained precisely as the picture is retained on the photographic plate, and can be printed off with the most delicate gradations of tone. These and similar reflections induced me to determine to put the conclusion I had arrived at to the test. With this view I requested the surgeon to remove one of the eyes from its socket. From this I took a great interest in photography, and had also got a camera, which I had used so frequently that I could give it back to him that he might restore it to its place. These pictures were of course very much smaller than the eye itself, but it was considered necessary to devise a method of enlarging them. No very profound knowledge of the effects produced by a combination of lenses was required to carry out the means of accomplishing this. I caused one of the rooms to be made totally dark, and an opening to be made in the window shutter, which was over the windows just large enough to admit a single ray of light. This ray was made to pass through a combination of lenses, and through the glass on which the photographic image was printed, a sheet of prepared paper being fixed to receive the magnified image, and record it in ineffaceable characters.

"Conceive, if you can, the intense anxiety with which I waited for the development of the hidden secret. The day was unusually dull and wet, both circumstances favorable for retaining distinctness of the image. Hour after hour dragged along till the day ended, and the result was just sufficiently evident to prove to me that I had not been on a false scent. I heard persons knocking at the door, but I took no heed of them. I felt neither hunger nor the want of sleep; but remained in the room through the long, long night, which seemed as if it would never come to an end, till I was half maddened by my impatience and the fear that the servants would have time to escape beyond the reach of discovery. I thanked God with all my soul when the first faint indication came of returning daylight. With the morning sun shone full on the window, and I saw with inexpressible satisfaction that the light was far more powerful than it had been during the previous very slow degrees—for it is not with these enlarged representations as with small ones—the latter require the most delicate defining. What mixed feelings of horror, rage, and grief filled my mind while this likeness of the murderer crept slowly but steadily from darkness into light!

"At last I had before me the portrait of the last human being on whom her eyes had rested. It was that of a man, young, with good features; but with an indescribable expression of mingled terror and ferocity in his face. This to some extent served as a disguise; but the features were too strongly marked for it to prevent any person who knew the original from recognizing him. I showed it to my father, and he had a vague impression that he had seen a person resembling it somewhere, but that was all. I then rode with it to the police-station, and put it into the hands of the superintendent. All the constables were called in, but they all declared that they had never seen a person about the country resembling the portrait. Leaving this in his possession, I took another likeness, which I myself showed to every individual, old and young, for miles round.

"All our researches were fruitless. Nobody had seen a person resembling the portrait—circumstance the more mysterious that it was not that of a person who would be likely to pass unnoticed. The only information we received was one that was made by the superintendent, namely, that the man, whoever he was, had come across the fields from the railway-station, and returned in the same way; but inquiries made at the station failed to confirm this idea.

"The constant sight of the effigy of the murderer almost drove me out of my senses. My brain was so far affected that I was incapable of applying myself to any thing. I believe nothing saved me from going raving mad but the conviction that I should one day discover the murderer. To search for him was my sole occupation. In theatres, on the race-course, at railway-stations—every where where men congregated I sought him. I saw nearly the amusements nor the business; nothing but faces. The death of my mother, which at any other time would have affected me deeply, came so soon after the other event that I hardly felt it.

"Month after month I wandered up and down the streets from morning to night, avoiding no place, however disreputable, in my search. I went to Vienna, and from that city to Venice, having been drawn to the latter place by a paragraph in a paper stating that the city was thronged with foreigners. I was always well supplied with letters of introduction to persons in every place I visited. The first I presented on the morning after my arrival in Venice was to Count Frasini, who, having called on me, sent an invitation for me to come off in the evening. The Count occupied a palace facing the square of St. Mark, a very large building, which on the evening was crowded with visitors. I had seated myself on a balcony outside the ball-room, from whence I could see all who approached the house by the principal entrance. I can say it was close upon midnight when I saw two gentlemen making their way toward the spot where I was sitting, and recognized among the young Archduke Maximilian and the commander of the Austrian troops. The taller of the two bent his head for the latter to pass under a low door-way. I then viewed his face; but the partial glimpse I got of it from time to time convinced me that I had at last found the object of my long pursuit. I entered the room; but just as I did so he seemed to think it would be hopeless to attempt to reach the Countess, for he suddenly left the room, and passed through a doorway, and disappeared. Little as I heeded it, I thrust aside in crossing the room, for I knew the only way through which, through the crowd of visitors that when I reached the staircase the man of whom I was in pursuit had reached the street. I descended the stairs, and found that they led me to a small door, which likewise opened into the square; but it was not that by which the man had left the room. Some distance and surrounded by servants and boatmen. I looked eagerly about the square, uncertain which way to proceed, and right I grasped a handful of his clothes. I could not speak for the moment, so great was my excitement; but I was not afraid to raise my voice to help I felt a sharp pain, and a decent through the air, followed by a sensation of extreme cold. After a time I recovered, and a cry that was not human was in the water, and then I seemed to fall asleep. A long sleep it must have been, for it was five weeks before I knew that I had been taken from the canal, from whence I had been taken by some boatmen who were close to me with their gondolas when I fired. Fortunately I had recovered sufficiently to move about my room (for the wound I had received was more painful than dangerous) I was told that I must continue my stay in custody, the boatmen who gave me over to the police officials having told them that I was pursuing a murderer. The robbery on a gentleman, when his two servants seized me, and in the scuffle wounded me, was a fabrication of my own.

"I sent for Count Frasini, and told him of what had happened. He soon settled the matter with the police, but he politely showed him to understand his guest he was unable to identify the original.

"I did not lose courage even under this disappointment; on the contrary, the conviction that I must find the object of my murderer grew stronger than ever. The first use I made of my renewed strength was to resume my search in Venice, but to no purpose; and when all hope of finding him here was gone I travelled to Rome. At this city I had letters of introduction to gentlemen of the highest distinction. Among these was one to Cardinal Antonelli, who received from Fanny's brother, who had returned to England and become reconciled to his aunt. I answered her letter, telling her that if she liked to accept him as her husband I could have no reason for objecting to him; that she had better act in the way most agreeable to her inclinations, subject to her aunt's approval, and that I would endeavor to reach England in time to be present at her wedding. Having written thus I dismissed the matter from my mind, and continued my wanderings. I shall not weary you by specifying any more of the cities I visited. I had heard that my sister was married and was very happy; and in many apartments and almost despair of succeeding in again meeting with Fanny's murderer I resolved to come back here for a time.

"I had not taken the trouble to write to my sister to say on what day I should come; so, as I was not expected, I walked across to the old oak tree beneath which the body had been found. I sat here buried in thought for a long time, and, on looking around into the lane on my way to the house, I met a woodman with whom I had spent many days in felling trees. He was so anxious that I should go to his cottage to see his wife, who had been nurse-maid in our family when I was a child, that I walked with him there. I staid there some time listening to what they had to say of changes about the estate, and of persons I had once known, but whose names I had then almost forgotten. On leaving them I found it was so late that I pushed my way through a hedge to get to the house by a shorter way than by following the carriage road. By going this way I had to pass through a wood; and directly I stepped out from beneath the trees I saw crossing the field, about a hundred paces distant from me, a man carrying a gun. I stepped out briskly to overtake him. The land had been newly plowed, so that he did not observe that my step was till I was close to him, when he turned round, and we stood face to face. The sun was going down, and he had to look full into it to see me; which was because of the rays which shone directly into his eyes. My heart for an instant ceased to beat. There before me—the original—unmistakably as in the photograph—stood the murderer I had been seeking for so many years. He, no doubt, recognized me, for he turned as white as chalk, and he had been suddenly turned to stone. As soon as the shock had passed I rushed at him and seized him with both hands. 'Fanny!' I said, 'you do not escape as at Venice.' He offered no resistance at first, and I looked around to see if there was any people near I could send to the constabulary for but the constables come to fetch him away. He may have understood why I withdrew my eyes from him, for he suddenly threw himself violently upon me, and seized me by the throat. He was far stronger than I, and I felt myself tossed hither and thither; but I clung to him with desperation. At last, as I wrestled with him, to throw him, but I could get no foothold on the uneven ground; and it was he who succeeded in throwing me. I fell, but rose again. Still I held him, but he could now press my throat with full force; and it was I now who had to struggle to keep my eyes open. My head seemed to be swelling to a monstrous size, and this was the last thing I remember.

"I lay in the field all that night. In the morning I was seen by the man who came to finish the plowing, and he, with the help of others, carried me home. I was quite unable to move; but I had a dreadful consciousness of what was being done. By the time I was laid on the bed I had recovered so far as to be able to speak, and the first words I spoke was an order to a man to ride as hard as he could go to the superintendent and bring back with him the superintendent.

"My sister came to my bedside as the man left the room. We were always excellent friends to each other; but I was surprised to see her so agitated by, as I supposed, the attack made on me. Her eyes were red and swollen, as if she had cried so worn and pale that I feared she was ill. After answering her questions with respect to myself, I said,

"'You were with our aunt when I took those photographs of poor Fanny's murderer, and have never seen one, have you? I thought not,' I continued; 'but if you open that desk which is in the breast-pocket of my coat you will see it.'

"She opened it, took out the portrait, and, looking at it, said, 'This is not the face in my husband's portrait. Where did you get it?'

"'Your husband! Fanny's brother!—her murderer!' I exclaimed. The truth flashed upon our minds at the same instant.

"For several hours she remained totally insensible; and when at last she became conscious she talked incoherently, and has not since recovered the use of her reason.

"I was detained, when I was told that the superintendent had arrived, that I had not had time or opportunity to mention to any body but my sister the cause of my having found insensible. Leaving it to be inferred that it was due to sudden illness, I gave the superintendent to understand that I had sent for him to direct a search after my brother-in-law, who had not been seen since the preceding evening. After he had left the room among the servants he came back to tell me that he would send over a constable to follow up the matter. As he was leaving the room, I said, carelessly,

"'Have you still got the portrait I gave you several years ago?'

"'No,' he replied. 'I kept it about two years; but it had then faded almost entirely away, and then I threw it into the fire.'

"I made him no answer; but I was thankful that the copy I had given him had been less durable than my own.

"It was found that my sister's husband had gone to London; and that is the last I heard concerning him.

"Do I think he was his sister's murderer? you ask. Is it possible to doubt it? I have no hesitation whatever in saying that in all cases where death occurs in broad daylight, and especially when it is caused by similar means, the last object on which the eye rests will be found depicted on the retina after death, and from Darkness may be brought into Light.

OFF MOBILE.

Now that FARRAGUT's fleet has attacked Mobile, the illustrations which we furnish of the blockade off that port and of the rebel fleet must prove doubly interesting to our readers. Fort Morgan is the principal defense of the city, at the entrance of Mobile Bay. The city itself is thirty miles distant, even after Forts Morgan and Gaines have been passed. Fort Morgan is so completely embanked with earthworks that only the ramparts are visible. At the left of one of the sketches may be seen the pits which obstruct the main passage into the bay. The lower sketch represents the Metacomet, the Monongahela, and the Seminole shelling a blockade-runner, supposed to be the *Owl*eigh, which into running she is trying lately to get out to sea. The Metacomet is a double-ender. Our fleet at Mobile now consists of the following vessels:

FLAG-SHIP—Hartford, screw sloop, 20 guns.

IRON-CLADS.

Winnebago, 2 turret Monitor	4 guns.
Chickasaw, 2 turret Monitor	4 guns.
Tecumseh, 1 turret Monitor	2 guns.
Manhattan, 1 turret Monitor	4 guns.
Four Mississippi River iron-clads	16 guns.

SCREW SLOOPS.

Richmond, first class	18 guns.
Brooklyn, first class	24 guns.
Monongahela, second class	12 guns.
Lackawanna, second class	11 guns.
Oneida, second class	10 guns.
Quinipe, second class	10 guns.
Galena, second class	14 guns.
Seminole, second class	8 guns.

DOUBLE-ENDERS.

Metacomet, side-wheel	10 guns.
Sebago, side-wheel	4 guns.
Port Royal, side-wheel	8 guns.
Cornmaugh, side-wheel	9 guns.

SCREW GUN-BOATS.

Kennebec	4 guns.
Pamola	4 guns.
Itasca	4 guns.
Penobsca	4 guns.
Pesquia	4 guns.
Tennessee	4 guns.

Besides these, there are five tugs, carrying two guns each.

BURNING OF CHAMBERSBURG.

WE illustrate on page 541 the BURNING OF CHAMBERSBURG by the rebels, July 30. A large rebel force was near at hand, but only a few hundred cavalry were employed in the work of conflagration. The burned district covers all the business portion of the town and some of the finest private residences. Not a store escaped; hotels, mills, manufactories—all were consumed. The view of Main Street, given in one of the sketches, will suggest to the reader the completeness of the work. The rebel General presiding over this carnival of destruction was MCCAUSLAND. He demanded $100,000, the alternative of this outrage, knowing well enough that it could not be raised. The rebel soldiers added insult to injury, thus interpreting their military duty to defenseless women and helpless children. Bedridden old women even did not elicit any compassion in the breasts of these rebels. Uncoffined corpses had to be buried hastily in gardens to save them from the flames. In all the roads leading toward Harrisburg were multitudes of men, women, and children flying from the flames, with no clothing except that on their persons, and no provision against hunger and roofless exposure.

Much blame has been thrown upon General COOPER. But it is clearly impossible that he or any other General could protect Pennsylvania from being at some point infested, and if infested by an army regardless of the amenities of civilized warfare the result was inevitably such as we have described.

THE EXPLOSION OF THE MINE BEFORE PETERSBURG.

THE explosion of the mine before Petersburg August 30, and the assault which followed it, form the subject of our illustration on pages 536 and 537. Our artist furnishes the following graphic description:

The picture is from a sketch made upon the Fifth Corps line at the time when the concussion opened along the entire front, just before sunrise. The crest of Cemetery Hill, above which is visible the steeples of Petersburg City, is the nearest line of light to term it, was the goal the army had in view. It being the key of the whole position. Upon and in front of this ridge rise the rebel forts and their intrenchments. Of what is on the top of it but little is visible. In front, however, in a line of works for infantry and artillery, rendered so strong by nature and the art of the engineer as to be extremely hard to penetrate. It was on a portion of this line that the mine was exploded, not in a few yards of redoubt, which could have been held with greater prospect of success, but in a re-entering angle or indentation of the general line, entirely enfiladed on its flank, and open to a fire in the rear. The "three tiers" of fortifications spoke of by correspondents do not exist except in their imaginations, inflated by the stories of stragglers and coffee-boilers. Our lines can be seen from the smoke of the artillery fire, representing a portion of the Fifth and Ninth Corps. In the fore-ground is a battery of 10-inch mortars, under the personal supervision of Colonel ABBOTT, in chief of artillery. The assistant chief, Major FITZGERALD, a gallant officer, was wounded during the engagement.

Coming upon this line soon after daylight of the 30th ult., a calm and clear morning, the rebels were plainly visible sitting about, and strolling upon and in front of their parapets, looking at the progress we had made, and enjoying the cool air, apparently unsuspicious. On our side no unusual number of men was visible, the works and covered ways giving ample concealment. Nevertheless many anxious eyes were directed to the point of the expected explosion, speculating upon the cause of its delay. The fuse had failed, and it was but a short time before sunrise that the mine was sprung. With a muffled roar it came, and as from the eruption of a volcano—which it much resembled—upward shot masses of earth, momently illuminated from beneath by the lurid flame. For a few seconds huge blocks of earth and other débris, mingled with dust, was seen in a column perhaps 150 feet in height, and then the heavy volume of smoke, which spread out in billowy waves on every side, enveloped all, like a shabby pall, for the two hundred souls that rushed into eternity. As if for breath after the short pause, the rebels regarding the grand demolition as though spellbound, and then one hundred and fifty guns opened in one great volley from the rebel lines. The storming columns could be seen springing forward to the doomed work: the air rapid commands soon hid that portion of the line in smoke, though the savage discharges of musketry showed plainly the enemy did not propose giving up without a struggle. Their artillery withered under the terrible accuracy of the fire directed against them, and the infantry firing, after a time became almost silent before the Fifth Corps. The Petersburg Express made regular trips into the city; the mortar shells, like huge birds of passage, creaked through the air and formed beautiful rings and spirals; while the sun, struggling through the heavy vapors of battle, revealed the assault's loss:

"'Tis morn. But scarce yon level sun
Can pierce the war-clouds rolling dun."

On the parapets of the works they had erected, the engineers and their chief, Major DUANE, carefully watched the counter. The hours sped along, and 4 P.M. arrived without the rebels firing, when a long column of the Ninth Corps became visible in the crater of the explosion, huddled in masses, but with their colors flying, and moving rapidly, scattering the enemy's fire with musketry and the rebel cannon, which they had turned upon its former owners. It was not long before the works were covered with the dead and wounded. Many ran to the rear, not a few being shot down before reaching cover. Others could be seen running up the gentle slope toward Petersburg, voluntary prisoners. The rebels in their turn charged our men, yelling as they came up. It was a desperate struggle, fiercely, during some back and capturing others, in spite of the staggering volleys they received; and it then became evident that the assault had failed, and that we must lose what we had been if they had pushed on and taken the crest of the hill.

BLUE-BELLE.

A CHILDISH face, too smooth and soft, you would have thought, for suffering; with a little forehead into waves around it; dimples in the cheeks; red, coy lips, pouting a little; a round, pliant chin; and curls falling in Joshua's where the little head was on the full, white throat; a character without force enough, you would have said, to be bad or good—a passive, plastic nature, upon which other stronger souls could stamp themselves, and coin saint or sinner as fate ordered. Looking out of the window with a vague dreamy expression, and half longing for some one to do something—for a sensation.

That was Belle Lansing—Blue-belle they all called her, by reason of liking to wear blue dresses which she almost always wore to match them.

What had Colonel Eustace thought when he gave her heart and hand into those little hands? He loved for her was unaccountable, people said; but people say that of almost all love affairs. Lookers-on never understand the game of others. Only the players can call trumps and honors are very common cards to them. At any rate Colonel Eustace was not a common man. He was handsome, and though Belle Lansing was not worthy to unloose would have been proud of his love. He was past his youth, but in the rich prime of his manhood. He had learned the lessons thirty-five years of life held for him, gained strength, courage, and patience in his battle with fate, and stood now in the summit he had gained a hero. Only one thing he had missed "in in his life's full scope," they said. And what uncanny fate was it that introduced him to Blue-belle?

He had seen as little of women. They might have souls and minds for all he knew; doubtless they had; but he only looked in them for two things —hearts and faces. The face must be fair, and the heart—of course were best reflections of hearts, and through many eyes what could shine like sunny nature?

So as Blue-belle walking under the elm-trees that arched like the roof of a temple over the straight village street. The sunset rayed in places the trees like golden arrows, and flooded with a scintillant radiance her yellow hair. Blushes—childish, innocent-looking blushes—came and went over the cheeks. Blue eyes, very much resembling the form, light-grass —surely here was Nature's master-piece. Like so many men of his age he fell straight into love. He did not pause to analyze or consider. That he was a good, simple girl—as men of thirty-five believe all girls of seventeen to be good and simple—he never doubted. He did not ask for any thing more for the highest part of his nature to mate with. That had sufficed for itself hitherto. He wanted something to get, to caress, to be fond of; some one who would make home for him by-and-by.

Blue-belle was flattered. If she had a heart she had never found it out; but something pink-and-innocent-looking little creature as she was—these were not wanting. Colonel Eustace, of the regular army, was a great personage in her eyes. She felt herself distinguished by his attentions, and she accepted them with an eagerness which he thought was simplicity.

Of course he made love deservedly, as is the nature of men, and considering also that he had but three weeks wherein to secure what appeared to him just then to be the chiefest treasure the earth held. Blue-belle was eminently receptive—receptive rather than demonstrative—for her nature was not large or intense enough to have very much need of expression. She wore his flowers, rode with him, walked with him, sang to him, and let him love her just as much as he pleased.

The night he bade her good-by she was a little startled at his emotion. The spirit she had raised frightened her. She did not know what such strong words meant. She wished he would not hold her hands so tight, or look so much about them. She would have liked a cheerful parting better—some pretty speeches about winning laurels to lay at her feet—some protestations—some gallant compliments. Eustace was too much in earnest then for any such light wooing. He believed that he was parting with the woman whom the earth held for him, the woman who loved as he loved—who would crown his life if he lived, and be faithful to his memory till the next world if he died. So he talked to her, not of love merely, but of death and heaven. She gave him a soft tress of her hair, and kissed him, and he folded it away as something sacred. He looked at her—a long, silent look—a gaze that would hold in memory forever every line of her loveliness; and then, with a passionate "God bless you!" he went away.

And now it was only a week after said pretty Blue-belle sat at the window looking for some new excitement—something to put a little savor into the life which had grown more monotonous than ever when Colonel Eustace left with his regiment. Her head dropped out of it. For Blue-belle was neither strong-hearted nor strong-minded. She was not sufficient unto herself, and had not enough imagination to solace herself with memory and anticipation. She wanted something tangible and present—something to enjoy.

Behind her, sitting thus at the window and murmuring vague discontents, came Madge, her sister. Madge Lansing was a year older than the other, and home, called by the same family name—sisters in so far; but in every thing else, in looks as well as in nature, almost as far apart as dark and dim; but without her own claims to beauty, but beauty of a very different kind from Belle's. It was beauty that didn't catch the eye, lacking in fullness and of shape or tint, though her features were clearly cut and noble, and the long dusky hair matched in shade the great dark eyes. But it was only now and then that her eyes told you any thing, or any one came into the clear olive of her cheek. Usually her face looked dull, and her life had been lived resolutely over all that her heart felt. Now and then, though, her eyes flashed with scorn, or softened with a tenderness which was mightier than mastery. But Blue-belle's cool ever fathom. Just now, as she came up to the window, she looked contemptuously in her face. You could see in a certain kind of love for the weak, pretty child she looked at, but a love touched with pity and vexation. Madge's voice was earnest and honest, and her words might have seemed ungentle if some unexpressed tenderness had not softened them.

"Belle, you vex me. You are not worth one of Colonel Eustace's thoughts. Sitting here sighing for excitement—sighing for scarcely a week gone. He ought to despise you!"

"See if you could make him!" and even Madge was not proof against the charm of the soft and sonorous mouth—the rebellious, provoking blue eyes. She spoke more gently.

"But, Belle, you're not a child any longer; for the sake of your own womanhood put away childish things. If Colonel Eustace loves you, why are you not content? Is it a compliment of honor could he mean ask? Why are you not satisfied to think of him, to live for him? This craving for new excitement is unworthy of you both. Have you no heart?"

"If I have not whose fault is it? I did not make my own nature," with tears magnifying the pretty blue eyes. "Neither you nor John Eustace has a right to ask me to be any thing but myself. If you don't like me as I am, leave me. I never could have great professions to Colonel Eustace, or gave him any reason to think I could love in the exclusive, self-sacrificing way. High-and-mighty manner you and he talk about."

"No, but he saw himself reflected in you, and you let him go on believing that you loved him—you know you did. As for the kind of love he had no idea of any kind but one. To him love is love."

"And to me Colonel Eustace is a bore."

The words were saucy, but the glance which accompanied them was arch, and a kiss upon Madge's cool swelling lip was tenderness.

After that came a visitor, another military hero—Captain Denham. Recruiting in the village, and riding by, he saw at the window the two girls under the primrose face with its yellow hair framing it, and dismounted and asked admittance. He was a "Sanitary Fair" which gave him a right to call, so he entered in at the gate. He, too, was there for only a few weeks, and had been ordered to the west, Colonel of Volunteers. He was quite of Blue-belle's kind; young, merry, handsome, and a little thoughtless. He was not quite so much so as to be sure, for he had not wasted it on so many flirtations.

He, too, felt straightway in love, and began with all his ability to wear Blue-belle's fetters. Of course she did not mean to care for him. She considered herself betrothed to Colonel Eustace, and she meant to be true to him, and shed small tears at parting over her bridegroom. If she had not been so fettered Denham would have suited her well. Of good family, rich, and the handsomest and most agreeable man at once noble and undisciplined, he was ten times more to her taste than her graver lover had ever been. He was not afraid to show that, and persuaded herself that she was devoted to Eustace. Captain Denham, she would have said, amused her—supplied the missing excitement for which she had been longing. So she went over again with him the same paths she had trodden at John Eustace's side—Madge wondered the very stones at her feet did not cry out against her. She rode with this new-comer, sang to him, and let him put summer roses in her yellow hair, a look of which he only close to a heart far away—a heart too noble for her to understand. And Ralph Denham loved her too; loved her with a selfish, frantic, craving love—a young man's love.

What evil spell was on her when he told her of this love? It was not too late then. She might have said to him that she belonged to Eustace—instead she put him off with vague denials, once that had no emphasis in them, and in spite of which he believed that he held her heart. Even when he cast off for himself, without her permission, a loose tress of her flowing hair, she did not take it away from him. The tress was, she came a great deal nearer to loving him than she had ever done to loving Eustace—he was nearer her age, more of her kind.

When he went away she began to realize what she had done, and to be, not remorseful—her nature was not deep enough for that—but frightened over it. She went to Madge, of course, and told her all. It was her wont to pile all her burdens on some other person's shoulders. But she got no comfort. Madge could not understand her state of mind. That a woman should not know which of two men she loved, and should encourage both, was a state of things she could neither pity nor comprehend. So Blue-belle had to console herself as she best could. She found a crumb of comfort in thinking that her two lovers were true friends, and knew each other, though both were with the Army of the Potomac. She thought there would be little probability of intimacy or acquaintance between a Colonel of regulars and a Captain of volunteers, though, as she said to Madge, it was an even chance that they would both be killed, and ten chances to one that one or the other would be.

"And you would marry the survivor, whichever he might be?" Madge questioned, with a wrathful blaze in her eyes, and an intensity of scorn in her tone that made Blue-belle quake a little.

After a while both of them wrote to her, and as it never rain but it pours, both letters came on the same day, and were both from male Belle Lansing loves more comfortable than she had known in her life. She saw how both depended on her and loved her—how each would be her slave if she chose his wife. To see how true and honest they had been did at last rouse some late remorse in her heart; but presently, as she read a half dozen pages of Denham's letter, all contrition was swallowed up in one agony of fear. He spoke of Colonel Eustace as his best friend. A friendly connection, of which she had not heard before, was the explanation; but Denham said the kindness he had received from the Colonel was something more than that for his own right to expect. He wrote of him with a frank enthusiasm, a warmth of attachment, which filled Belle with terror. Of course, she thought, he would tell the Colonel about her. Judging him, as women are apt to judge men, by herself, she thought it would be impossible for him to keep so dear a friend a secret which lay so near his heart.

Her dismay was intense. If there had not been something flattering in it it would have been pathetic. They would talk her over together, and they would both hate her. "Wouldn't they?" She questioned Madge, who had been looking at her bewailings in unsympathetic silence.

"No!" Madge did not think Colonel Eustace would hate her. She thought he would be sorry he would have for a woman who was too weak to know her own mind except in the selfish manner described by another that hate. As for the Captain, he was young and in love—besides, he was the latest comer—perhaps he would overlook all.

But even this view of the subject was scarcely consolatory to Blue-belle. The higher grasps hang the sweeter they are to the hand when he shall have all it would help him to an understanding of himself and his own needs, which would insure him against heart-break. Indeed such a word as heart-break be permissible in remotest connection with six feet of heroic flesh and blood under the uniform of the United States.

The next letter was from Colonel Eustace, and came for Madge. While in her neighborhood the Colonel had scarcely observed Blue-belle's dark and quiet elder sister. It was singular how clearly her image came back to him when an emergency arrived where strength was needed.

Strong as Madge was her heart was pierced a little when she held his letter in them. Why had he written to her? Was it not after a great battle —was there something he feared to say to Belle? Was any one wounded—ill, dying, or dead, and was Captain Denham dead? She was thankful that Blue-belle was out, and she could read the letter with no questioning, and time for writing for its tidings. She opened it, and it seemed scarcely a moment before she understood all.

The night before the battle Captain Denham had come to him with a letter to be forwarded, in case he died, to Miss Belle Lansing. Then, with the narrow's desperate chance before him, the young man's heart had opened to his friend, and Colonel Eustace had listened to the whole story of his love and that letter. He had told nothing, but he thought the latest lover must have been the dearest to that fickle girl-heart. If Denham must die, let him die believing himself beloved—if he lived, why not believe himself beloved also, and be happy. For his own part, of course, he had no disposition to contest such a delusion—his entire life had not loved him, whatever she might have felt for Denham. In any event his dream was over. If the wound was sore, he uttered, writing to Madge, no word of complaint.

He passed from his account of this interview in his tent the night before the battle to his story of the morrow's strife. Denham had distinguished himself, he had been severely wounded. There was some hope for his life, but he lay now in hospital, delirious, and calling constantly for Belle,

He had need of better nursing than the regular attendants could give, in this time of hurry and confusion—if there had been any truth in that love in which Captain Denham had certainly the firmest faith, did not Miss Lansing think her sister could, and ought to, come to the hospital at once?

As Madge raised her eyes she met Belle's. She had come in from walking, and Madge had been too much absorbed to notice her footsteps. She stood there, her face white with a desperate terror, looking at the handwriting she knew so well on the cover of the letter her sister was reading.

Madge knew not how to soften her tidings. She felt her helplessness. She put handed the letter to Belle, and kept silence until the girl had read it all through. Then she asked, simply,

"How can you be ready?"

"Oh, Madge, I can not, can not go! How could I ever see Colonel Eustace? I should die of shame."

Madge looked at her sternly.

"Belle," she said, in a tone as relentless as an avenging conscience, "which of those men did you love? It is no time for folly or self-deception when death is waiting for one of your victims."

Belle trembled. For the first time in her life, she looked resolutely into her own soul and sounded its depths. Then she answered as solemnly as if she were speaking at the Judgment,

"I dearly love Denham. Colonel Eustace only dazzled me. I thought his attentions were a great honor, and I did not know what love was. But I did not know either that I loved Denham until this new cause. If he dies it will be God's punishment for my sin."

"Do you love him, and hesitate about going to him for fear of Colonel Eustace's scorn? Child, you will ruin all your life if you falter now. You must go to-day."

They had no one to ask. They were orphans, the two girls, and the aunt who lived with them and was indebted to them for home and comfort never thought of criticising their proceedings. Madge was the ruling spirit in all emergencies. She got Belle ready, and packed the things they would both need. Belle noticed nothing, but when they were at the door she said, appealingly,

"If you were only going, Madge!"

"Of course I am. You did not think I should send you alone?"

After that Belle said no more. She performed the journey mechanically. At its close Colonel Eustace met them. He had made sure that they would come. He bowed to Belle gravely and respectfully, and answered Madge's inquiry for Captain Denham with as few words as possible.

"Yes, he is alive still. Are you able to go at once to the hospital?"

They found the patient very ill. Belle's eyes filled with bitter tears as she heard him ask for her, in pleading, helpless tones. She lost her pride and unfounded shame when Colonel Eustace's eyes, and pressed her lips to his face.

"I am here, Denham. I will not leave you."

Strength seemed to go out from her: courage to breathe from her lips. She seemed to infuse something of her own vitality into the man she loved. He began to improve from the very night of her coming. She watched him week after week, as he clinked slowly upward from the valley and shadow of death, the darkness in which he had seemed to stand. During those weeks she grew into womanhood. The careless, selfish child was gone forever. A woman-nature looked out of her blue eyes, which many tears had softened. There would be no danger now of her scorching again who she loved.

When at last Captain Denham rose from his bed of pain, thin, pale, lame, and disabled for evermore from fighting for his country's wars, he made her humble confession to him—told him the whole story of her acquaintance with Colonel Eustace—her uncertainty, even after she knew him, what was her heart, until the sharp blade of anguish had probed it and revealed its secret.

"Can you ever forgive me?" was her concluding sentence.

He looked at her sadly.

"Is my forgiveness worth any thing, Blue-belle? Could you ever marry me, but from esteem, pity?"

Her eyes answered him; her cheeks, where the blushes came and went as of old; the tone of all the trembling lips, which he closed with his kisses.

That day, too, Colonel Eustace stole an hour to talk with Madge.

"If I only dared to say I love you; but how can I hope you will believe me when you know all I felt for Belle—when I saw you at the same time I saw her, and did not choose you—did not recognize you? And, Madge, if you only could not believe that I offer you no second place in a worn-out heart, but first love, best love, of which the other was only a prefiguring dream, you could be all the world to me."

To him, her first lover, Madge Lansing raised her eyes—those great, dark eyes, full now of light and splendor, uttering her soul as no words could; and he, from henceforth to be her other self, understood her, knew that there could be no more doubt between them.

So once in this world of tangles all came out right, and four hearts were happy, in spite of a girl's fickleness and a man's pride.

A Word to our Fair Readers. — It with the loss of a single hair, I could restore a head as bald as Absalom's or Cæsar's, I would not lift my pencil to do so. Such a process is not to be thought of. It is equally an external evidence of health—with us Baldness, is noble, and all endeavors to suppress or to hide it, is a further evidence of the diseased condition. Upon these grounds the famous specific and tonic known as HALL'S HAIR RENEWER, we seriously condemn, and in calling upon mankind in Medical Science, shall the Christian prepare the vestal of their skin, and impress a high duty and to create it as that delicate envelope. All who value health and beauty should beware of tampering with so subtle a, as they are not only pernicious but highly dangerous to health.

Songs of the Army.

By PRIVATE MILES O'REILLY.

I.

THE TROOPER TO HIS MARE.

Old girl that hast borne me far and fast
On pawing hoofs that were never loth,
Our gallop to-day may be the last
For thee, or for me, or perchance for both!
As I tighten your girth do you nothing daunt?
Do you catch the hint of our farming fun?
And now the artillery move to the front,
Have you never a qualm, Bay Bess of mine?

It is dainty to see you sidle and start
As you move to the battle's cloudy marge,
And to feel the swells of your wakening heart
When our sonorous bugles sound a charge;
At the scream of the shell and the roll of the drum
You feign to be frightened with roguish glance;
But up the green slopes where the bullets hum,
Coquettishly, darling, I've known you dance.

Your skin is satin, your nostrils red,
Your ears are a bird's or a loving girl's;
And from delicate fetlock to stately head
A throbbing vein-cordage around you curls.
Oh, joy of my heart! if you there slay,
For triumph or rout I little care;
For there isn't in all the wide valley to-day
Such a dear little, bridle-wise, thorough-bred mare!

II.

HOW THE SOLDIERS TALK.

We have heard the rebel yell,
We have heard the Union shout,
We have weighed the matter very well
And mean to fight it out;
In victory's happy glow,
In the gloom of utter rout,
We have pledged ourselves—"Come weal or woe,
By Heaven! we fight it out!"

'Tis now too late to question
What brought the war about;
'Tis a thing of pride and passion
And we mean to fight it out.
Let the "big wigs" use the pen,
Let them caucus, let them spout,
We are half a million weaponed men
And mean to fight it out.

Our dead, our loved, are crying
From many a stormet redoubt,
In the wreathed trenches lying—
"Oh, comrades, fight it out!
'Twas our comfort as we fell
To hear the clattering shout,
Rolling back the rebels' weaker yell—
God-speed you, fight it out!"

The negro—free or slave—
We care no pin about,
But for the flag our fathers gave
We mean to fight it out;
And while that banner lives
One rebel rag shall flout,
With volleying arm and flashing glaive
By Heaven! we fight it out!

Oh, we've heard the rebel yell,
We have heard the Union shout,
We have weighed the matter very well,
And mean to fight it out:
In the flush of perfect triumph,
And the gloom of utter rout,
We have sworn on many a bloody field
"We mean to fight it out!"

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 27, 1864.

THE SITUATION.

IF we would all only bear in mind the chances and conditions of every war, we should be less disposed to grumble over our misfortunes, reason too confidently from our successes. That the campaign of this summer was to be fierce, bloody, and long, that all campaigns, uncertain, every thoughtful man was aware. That LEE, if too sorely pressed to risk a battle in the open field, could fall back, and with a trained army, behind the defences of Richmond, hold GRANT long at bay, was as evident a possibility as it is now a plain fact. That some one or many of the accessory movements of GRANT might fail, and so delay and embarrass his own operations, was as probable in May as it is proved in August. That SHERMAN'S campaign was as dangerous as it was daring; that to penetrate an enemy's country in the face of his army and through a most difficult region where nature was his most efficient ally, to advance further and further from your base, exposing your supplies to the flying assaults of guerrilla hordes hovering upon your flanks and rear, was a movement full of constant peril whose failure would be as unfortunate as its triumph would be magnificent and vital, and that necessarily, oath in Virginia and Georgia, the progress of events could not be other than gradual, since only very foolish people believed in a sudden "collapse" of the rebellion, or "breaking its back-bone" at a stroke—all these things we ought to have known if we did not; and we shall individually not plume ourselves very much upon having suggested last April and May, because the consideration was so obvious, to those who wished to wait until August before nominating a President that there was no reason to suppose the campaign would end by August. But because the campaign is not yet decided, because GRANT is still before Richmond and SHERMAN not yet in possession of Atlanta, we are regaled with the ancient taunt of the enemy, "You can't conquer the South;" and with the old whine of the friend, "Oh dear! the North is rent in all and wishes to be humiliated."

Now the whole question of this war is a question of character. That the Government—or, in other words, the people—have the power to subdue the rebels and restore the Union, is undeniable. The only inquiry is, will they exert the power, or have they become indifferent? We confess that we are not of it. The vile excitement and enthusiasm of the opening war have of course passed away. The apparent unanimity has disappeared; and the party divisions which in every country, at every period, and in every war, have been developed, are evident among ourselves. The enormous expense, the inevitable civil, military, and naval blunders, which also accompany every great war, have appeared, and with them the bitter partisan appeals to political and party based upon systematic misrepresentation, and sustained by secret sympathy with the enemy. The foolish prophecies and deceits of the press, which are by no means always willful, but often the result of enthusiasm and imperfect information, have also fitfully exalted and depressed the sensitive national heart, until now, in the fourth year of the war, with a Presidential election coming on, the fury of party difference is so hot that many a doubtful observer wonders whether patriotism is not altogether lost and the country ruined.

No; the time for that question is passed. The enemies of this country never had so fair a chance as in the winter of 1860–61, and that chance is lost forever. Those enemies were united, ready, firm, and every advantage, moral and physical was theirs. The North—to use a convenient term—was sure neither of its cause nor of its purpose; it doubted not only whether it had a right to fight, but whether it wanted it or whether it could. Its traditions and habits were all those of peace: it was a trader, and war ruined trade; for slavery it cared very little; the first thing it feared, and had always avoided at any cost, was attempted disunion; the second thing was interruption of its trade: it felt itself declining, dwindling, half disorganized: it saw that it had nine hundred soldiers in its army, four ships in its navy, and five hundred thousand dollars in its treasury; it heard many of the trained leaders of "Northern" sentiment loudly crying, "Let them go!" "Let them go!" it was sure of nothing whatever but its own doubt. It seemed a peaceful, commercial, and huge mummy, apparently erect, but which the slightest touch would bring down in dust. That was the most horrible, the most humiliating hour that any state has ever known. And just as the appalled spectator listened to hear the death-rattle from these shriveled lips they suddenly swelled with the red blood from the heart, and the battle-cry of life burst from them exultingly.

Into the struggle we went. Every thing was to do, and nothing was done: money was to be raised and trained; a navy to be built: a treasury to be filled; every kind of treachery and plotted disaster to be encountered and endured; selfishness, incapacity, lying, swindling, upon the most colossal scale and in every department, civil and military; the shame of defeats; the scorn and hostility of Europe; the most prominent financial convulsion and universal ruin—all these difficulties, in every form and in all degrees, we clustered with in one year. Slowly, the patriotism, of the American people has had to encounter and resolve, and it has not failed.

It has maintained tranquility in the loyal States and steadily resisted disunion. It has raised such an army and fought such battles as no American had conceived; it has built a navy which has successfully blockaded half the Atlantic coast of the continent; it has supplied an adequate currency and averted serious financial panic; it has occupied New Orleans and opened the Mississippi; advanced from the Ohio to Chattanooga, from Chattanooga to Atlanta; it beleaguers the chief rebel host in its capital; it liberates under arms a great state, Missouri; it has steadily compressed and reduced the area of the rebellion until now it is striking at its vital centres; while every source of the rebel strength is strained, every man, woman, and child that a despotism of terror can drag into the service is arrayed against us, stimulated by every frantic appeal, and assured that they are defending their hearths and their honor. Meanwhile the Government, so patient and forbearing as to alienate some of its most loyal friends who denounce it as weak and vacillating and stupid, yet so resolute and prompt as to be cursed by its factious enemies as an intolerable tyranny, stands ready to hear and consider every authorized offer of peace which may be made by the rebels. No man whose opinion is free from factious bias believes that the Government wishes another shot fired in this war, or has any other desire than the restoration and permanent security of the Union.

If these things are so—and who will deny it—is there any reason for shaking and shuddering? Is all mere a great many loud Copperheads and faint-hearted patriots every day; but in all wars the grumblers, and doubters, and opponents are always vigorously more numerous than the devoted and energetic friends, unless—as in France in '93, and in the slave States now—the opposition is suppressed by terror. There are not half so many Copperheads and faint-hearted patriots among us now as there were in the Revolution. Every difficulty we encounter was ten-fold greater in our fathers' time. Sometimes the clouds of discontent and opposition were so thick that WASHINGTON himself was almost discouraged. But he knew that a people which had been willing to try the struggle with the great British empire could not fail. It was a question of character, and the quality of character could best be shown by undertaking the contest. So with us, the odds against the Government at the opening of this war were enormous. But they have been baffled. The enemies, the gunboats, the blockade, the treasury, the armies, all the doleful prophecies, the shouts of enemies, the dismal quakings of friends, do not and can not avail against a clear, steady, resolute purpose which carries the nation along. The Cowboys of the Revolution tinkled their dolorous bells like the Copperhead Conservatives of the rebellion. But the bells were neither cows nor cowards; and they made a nation. Their children have already shown themselves worthy of their sires. Be of good cheer, O ye of little faith! the soul of the American people is marching on.

THE ADMINISTRATION AND THE GOVERNMENT.

THAT the Administration is not the Government is a very favorite proposition of those who refuse the slightest sympathy or aid to the war. It is certainly not a very original proposition, but it is urged with all the ardor of a new discovery and the excitement of a profound truth. A man, for instance, opposes at every point of the Administration; embarrasses in every way the raising of men and money; misrepresents every loyal act, and is unending in his praises of the rebel resources, strength, and resources, and in his censure of the outrageous conduct of the North in exasperating the Southern gentlemen to revolt; in short, does all the moral aid and comfort in his power to the men who are trying to destroy the Union. If you tell him that he is not a very strong friend of the Government, he replies with the air of a man who is making an excellent reparee, "Sir, the Administration is not the Government."

Very true: neither is the body the soul. But when a Government is assailed a man can pursue but one of two courses; he must either help save the Government by aiding those who administer it, or he must help to aid them he must co-operate with the enemy.

For instance, if a Government is attacked by force, it must have men to defend itself; and to such call the Administration sees them sent through the Administration. But if you go about denouncing the Administration as tyrannical, oppressive, and wicked, and insist that its purposes are selfish and base, do all you can to overthrow the Government, because you endeavor to prevent the raising of men by the Administration, by that means and only can the Government be defended. So with the loan: if you decry the credit of the nation, prophesy inevitable financial ruin, extol the desperate determination of the rebels, and intimidate rather than to submit, and promise every poor man death instead of a chicken in his pot, you hinder the Administration from raising money and you consequently do all you can to destroy the Government, which can not be maintained without it.

The Government is visible and practicable, and operative only in the Administration. Our Government is the administration of the power of the people by the people, and sustained by the Constitution. If the people elect a Congress which passes laws which the Administration executes, and any citizen, saying that the laws are unconstitutional, refuses to obey, he is forced to yield or to pay the penalty of disobedience. If he can persuade a great body of others to join him, they may exclude the Administration; but they have also overthrown the Government, because the fundamental law prescribes a course of action, in case of dissent, which they have not regarded.

Therefore for a party to say that they will support an administration so far as it acts constitutionally is folly. For does the Constitution make them or any citizen the judge of what is constitutional? Does a measure or policy become unconstitutional because a party caucus or convention denounces it as such? Besides, if a party is honestly persuaded that an administration is unconstitutional in its general policy, how can it support it in raising an army, for instance, by which it may enforce its unconstitutional measures? The Opposition say that they are in favor of the Government which is endangered by the Administration. How, then, can they conscientiously strengthen an administration which threatens the Government?

This is the point upon which the logic of Mr. FERNANDO WOOD is stronger than that of those who declare their hostility to the Administration, and yet insist upon supporting the Government by men and money. The truth is, the Government of the United States is to be attacked and defended only in the Administration. Elect a peace Administration, and you overthrow that Government. Elect a war Administration, and evidently you can maintain the Government only by supporting the Administration; which is, in other words, supporting its policy. Therefore, if any man believed, what a great many men say, that the Administration is trying to overthrow the Government, it would be his patriotic duty to save it by depriving the Administration of men and money. But to do that is to secure the triumph of the rebellion. What then? Its is of opinion that the Administration is as rebellious as the rebellion.

It was a great political blunder of the Opposition not to see and avoid the danger of the cry that the Administration is not the Government, and that the Administration is unconstitutional—because that led them to justify those who refuse to support the Administration, which a man with one eye could see was surrendering the Government, and so placed them by the side of the rebels. The true point of attack should have been the attempt to show what they would denounce as the folly, the weakness, the blunders, the extravagance of the Administration, while they stoutly supported its calls for men and money: showing as artfully as possible that the Administration with all its faults must be endured because it was constitutionally elected, and the alternative of its overthrow was anarchy; while the war should be prosecuted more vigorously and more economically under another administration. This is what DOUGLAS would have done—what any great party leader would have done.

Instead of this they denounce the Administration as treacherous to the Government, and thereby commend themselves to Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Does any sane American suppose that that following leads to national union, liberty, or honor? This war is to be prosecuted to the victory of the Union, or it is to be stopped upon terms that rebels may prescribe. Is there any possible candidate among those who have opposed the war from whose election we would be a guarantee of greater vigor in conducting the war? And if not, is not the defeat of the Administration a step toward the overthrow of the Government?

DAWSON'S "FEDERALIST."

SOME months since appeared a large and handsome edition of the Federalist, edited by Mr. HENRY B. DAWSON. The publication was presently followed by a highly animated correspondence in the papers between that gentleman, Mr. DAWSON, and Messrs. JAMES A. HAMILTON and JOHN JAY, mainly touching the aid and approbation the latter gentlemen were accused of implied to have given to the new edition. So far as the controversy was personal we believe it is ended; but in "Mr. JAY'S Second Letter on Mr. DAWSON'S Introduction to the Federalist" there are points of profound public concern.

We have more than once alluded to the attempt now made to pervert sentiments of Union in the popular mind. The friends and political allies of the rebel leaders, under the cry of State Rights and State Sovereignty, are following Mr. CALHOUN in his effort to establish as the popular conviction that the Union is a League of sovereign and independent States, and that the Constitution is a treaty of mutual compact, as of the scope of his allegiance to it, each sovereign is the judge. This doctrine, of course, is the end of the Union, of the Government, and of the Nation; and is the complete triumph of the rebellion. The Federalist has been always considered the impregnable defense of the doctrine of American nationality in the Union. It was therefore a skillful plan of the enemies of the Union to attempt to undermine that defense. This plan, according to Mr. JAY, has been successful, and the object of his Second Letter is to show that SCHERER'S covely criticism of the Federalist is and is to be edited by Mr. DAWSON, for a second volume is yet to come, to shake the fundamental faith of the American people in the truth that their fathers in forming the Union practically founded a nation.

It seems that our old friends of the Society for the Diffusion of Political Knowledge, headed by Mr. S. F. B. MORSE, issued, some time during the last year, a work called "Citizenship Sovereignty, by J. S. Wright, assisted by Professor J. Holmes Agnew, D.D., Chicago. Published for American citizens, the true maintainers of State Sovereignty"—no name of printer or publisher appearing. The burden of this work, as the reader may suspect, is the loveliness of human slavery, and the doctrine that "a sovereign State should be unaccountable to all else but Deity." CALHOUN and the session philosophers, Bishop HOPKINS and the slavery apologists, are of course duly eulogized, and Europe is called upon to recognize the Confederacy that has so nobly maintained itself: this, it appears, being the kind of political information which the members of the society are so anxious to diffuse.

In the course of the work Mr. WRIGHT censures Mr. MOTLEY's letter to the London Times at the opening of our war; but adds, by way of comfort to the enemies of the American cause, that "Mr. Henry B. Dawson has a rod in pickle that will be sufficient to whip him [Mr. MOTLEY] into the traces." The contest between Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. DAWSON is a contest of Mr. DAWSON's views. "The chief point of difference between us is that he [Mr. HENRY B. DAWSON] considers the word 'nation' should never be used in connection with the United States, each State being the only 'nation,' whereas it appears to the writer [Mr. WRIGHT] that, with clear conceptions that each State is the real nation, the United States may properly be called a 'nation' of nations. Mr. DAWSON's edition of the Federalist has been alluded to, and his valuable notes will be found coincident with the views herein taken, and will be followed with the publication of other debates connected with the adoption of our Constitution, and, fortunate, and furnishing important information of which few have knowledge.....His extensive historical explorations convinced him years ago that we were all wrong about the theory of our Government."

This is the useful political knowledge which is diffused in the "Society's" work on the grammar, of the new edition of the Federalist; namely, that it is edited by (as Mr. JAY informs us) an Englishman, Mr. HENRY B. DAWSON, who has already, in print, charged, without proving, General PUTNAM with complicity in ARNOLD's treason; and who now undertakes, as Mr. JAY expresses it, to shake the national reverence for the men who exposed the essential folly of the doctrine of State sovereignty; to show that the evils of the old Confederacy did not spring from the nature of the bond; and that the Constitution was foisted upon the nation by false pretenses and political trickery.

Every one who reads Mr. DAWSON's introduction can judge from its tone whether his editorial intention was to strengthen or to weaken public respect for the authors of the Federalist, and to confirm or destroy the conviction, essential to the maintenance of the Union, that we are a nation and not a Confederacy. But while this may be a matter of inference from the introduction, the quotations from the work of Mr. WRIGHT's, which Mr. JAY publishes in his "Second Letter," leave little doubt that the intention of Mr. DAWSON's edition of the Federalist is to show us that "we are all wrong about the theory of our Government;" that sovereignty belongs to the States, not to the nation; that, consequently, secession is a reserved right; the war against secession wicked, and the Union at an end.

TO UNION MEN.

THE rebel papers, considering that they are printed in what they call another country, are curiously interested in the political movements of this country. They print long columns of anxious speculation, and then assure us that they have no shadow of interest in the matter and that their contempt for us and our affairs exceeds expression. A recent performance of this kind in the Richmond Examiner is particularly amusing. It thinks it sees signs that the Administration is to be defeated, and it can not conceal its joy. The rebellion is as unreasonable as in the days that followed Sumter, when it was full of fervid longings that the Yankees would all only come down and be soundly flogged by the chivalry—when Southern gentlemen disdained the dirty business of whipping them with their own hands. Since then, however, at Vicksburg, before Orleans, at Gettysburg, and in Virginia and Georgia the Southern gentlemen were not disinclined to try their hands; and it is a curious and interesting fact that they have whipped the Yankees all the way from Gettysburg to Petersburg, and from the Ohio to Atlanta, and will probably not be satisfied until they have driven the scoundrels into the sea.

The Richmond Examiner says with solemn exultation, in words that are the just indentation of the dignity of the rebel cause and the honorable spirit in which it is conducted: "The obscene ape of Illinois is about to be deposed from the Washington purple.....He was in the eyes of all mankind an unanswerable argument for our secession; he stood there a living justification, seven feet high, of the steadfast resolution of these States to hold no more political union with a race capable not only of electing such a being, but of making it a ruler and king."

There is a great deal more in this strain, which is peculiar to a baby-selling chivalry—a strain in which JEFFERSON DAVIS showed himself an accomplished adept when he called his fellow-citizens against whom he has drawn the sword "hyenas."

But such articles show, what is not sufficiently apprehended by ourselves, the moral value of the nomination of the Administration. Contemporary with this Administration, the war for the Union is necessarily identified with it. The rebels and their friends the Copperheads have constantly denounced it as "LINCOLN's war;" while our own foreign friends and enemies have always regarded the President as the accepted representative of the war. The rebels undoubtedly mean, therefore, to show a brave front until after the election. They know if, by holding on, they can only fatigue or dishearten loyal men to the point of declaring that they must have a change merely for the sake of change, that the defeat of Mr. LINCOLN will be accepted by their own population as a sign of desire to compromise and yield, while it will be understood by foreign powers in the same way, and assure them that the hour has come for successful mediation, recognition, or interference.

The one thing which, under the circumstances, would be the most valuable to the rebels is the defeat of Mr. LINCOLN. On the other hand, his re-election would be the most shattering blow to them. For it would say plainly to the whole world that the loyal people of the United States, after every difficulty upon many points of policy, were heartily agreed upon the one great essential aim of the maintenance of the Union by whatever means; that the war is their own work; that failures of many kinds were inseparable from all human enterprises; that, as they had begun, they meant to finish; and that while there were many faithful and devoted patriots in their ranks, there was no one more faithful or more devoted than the President, who had borne so patiently the heat and burden of the day, and who, perhaps, wherever shows some kind of dissatisfaction with the war and its policy. But the re-election of the President reveals a great and unconquerable resolution, the earnest of absolute victory.

AN ARMISTICE.

A CRY for an armistice is sometimes heard. Let us stop fighting for six months, shouts some newspaper or orator, and call a Convention of the United States and South, and they have had enough of it, and on what conditions they will come back.

It might be replied to this suggestion that the rebels began this war by firing upon Fort Sumter, have maintained it ever since, and do not ask for an armistice. The Government is merely maintaining its authority, and has no idea of fighting the moment its enemies retire from the contest. Can it honorably expose itself to the insults as well as to the blows of rebels? But it is answered that the rejection of so grave a to be settled upon points of etiquette, and that the Government can postpone its dignity until it ascertains whether the rebels refuse offers of conciliation.

But no Government can postpone its dignity without fatal harm. If a Convention should be offered and spurned the moment it met, the union of the North, as prophesied—it would be loyal indignation with the weakness of the Government, and Copperheadism declare that it was the fault of the Government that the project failed. Whatever the issue of the proposition the Government must lose. If it were refused, the whole responsibility would be thrown upon it by its enemies. If it were accepted, who would guarantee that the rebels would abide by the result of the Convention? They believe absolutely in State rights; are they likely to relinquish that faith upon our summons, who have been fighting them upon their very point for three years? If the rebels, as they probably it, does any body propose to believe them?

Or again, are any better terms of union possible than the Constitution and Union? Upon which the rebels repudiate? The rebellion is not a new thing in intention. They plead total incompatibility of political conviction and moral principle with the North. Are we accused of fighting men among them has been carefully educated in that belief. They think that the supremacy of the country under the Constitution is to the destruction of those convictions and principles. In the midst of a war in which they yet have great armies in the field, are they likely to change their views at the invitation of those whom they regard as enemies?

They would use the armistice to strengthen their lines; their allies in the Copperhead ranks at home would be encouraged to persist in their opposition to the war, and the whole world would say that the Government was unable to maintain its own cause. The scoundrels into the sea.

The Richmond Examiner says with solemn exultation, in words that are the just indentation of the dignity of the rebel cause and the honorable spirit in which it is conducted: "The obscene ape of Illinois is about to be deposed from the Washington purple.....He was in the eyes of all mankind an unanswerable argument for our secession; he stood there a living justification, seven feet high, of the steadfast resolution of these States to hold no more political union with a race capable not only of electing such a being, but of making it a ruler and king."

There is a great deal more in this strain, which is peculiar to a baby-selling chivalry—a strain in which JEFFERSON DAVIS showed himself an accomplished adept when he called his fellow-citizens against whom he has drawn the sword "hyenas."

But such articles show, what is not sufficient-

FARRAGUT.

THE part of the navy in the summer's campaign, if it begins late, begins gloriously. FARRAGUT has already joined his name to those most cherished, in our naval history, and no such history is more sprinkled than the American. Our children will speak of FARRAGUT as we speak of PERRY and DECATUR, of LAWRENCE and PREBLE. The action at the mouth of Mobile Bay reminds us of the remark made by the traitor Commodore BARRON, who was captured at Hampton Roads by the Congress in FOX'S History, and heard the recital from a newspaper of FARRAGUT's victorious entry at New Orleans. Profoundly interested, and forgetting his treason, and remembering only the glory of the service with which his own name had been honorably associated, BARRON exclaimed, vehemently, "Yes, yes; I tell you nothing can stand against our navy."

There is not a loyal man or boy, not a true woman or girl, in the land who does not rejoice in the victories of the army and his gallant men, or grieve in sympathy with the hearts that bleed for CRAVEN and his honored crew. The duty of the navy in this war has been unusually difficult, but how bravely it has been done! Its victories have been, in a sense, more impressive than any others. The bathing of the Merrimac, ship passing like the destroying angel, and the huge rebel ram the Mississippi and the reduction of New Orleans, PORTER's exploits upon the Western waters, the sinking of the Alabama, and now the occupation of Mobile Bay, are all single events that shine with signal lustre in the story of the war.

We do not enter into the Monitor quarrel. That they are totally useless no one who remembers the day in Hampton Roads is likely to believe, while the fact that they are of extraordinary great confidence in them as the only valuable vessels. FARRAGUT's feeling about "fighting in an iron kettle" is very intelligible, not less so the long and general use of iron in all such. Certainly the oaken ribs of a certain flag-ship Hartford will not soon be despised or forgotten. Its operations, like many incidents of the war, and in view may be already accomplished by the possession of the bay. But whatever follows, the sailors of the Union stand side by side with its soldiers, and the hands of each finish the same old flag. In the hearts of each burns the same invincible purpose—Union and Liberty!

"The army and navy forever,
Three cheers for the red, white, and blue."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE MILITARY SITUATION.

GENERAL GRANT has resumed operations on the James River. On Saturday, August 13, General BIRNEY moved his corps to Deep Bottom, near Dutch Gap. A few days previously the rebels were entrenched, at the same place, on the river down the river. Instead of going to oppose, he moved west up, and landed at Aiken's Landing. The Second Corps was reinforced by a great portion of the Tenth, and the whole command of Lieutenant-General HILL, threatening a strong position of the enemy in that neighborhood. The rebels were soon driven from their entrenchments, with six pieces of cannon and two mortars. General BIRNEY then moved to the south of Petersburg, but soon being transferred to General WILCOX. Butler at last reports was digging a canal at Dutch Gap, by which we can run the vessels along the James. The rebels have been trying to disturb the work by their shells.

Sheridan has advanced against the rebel force in Shenandoah. He has reported to have been reinforced by twenty thousand men. From a dispatch of Sheridan's, dated August 14, we learn that he had been able to take away from Maryland or Pennsylvania the infantry which he had traveled along the valley.

General Sherman's lines on August 8 reached from the Chattahoochee River to within four miles of the Atlanta road, Schofield holding the extreme right. These lines are very strong, and it has been impossible to learn the works of defense about Atlanta. On the 9th there was a battle, in which the rebels were badly repulsed. Hood has been strongly reinforced since he assumed command. All the militia of Georgia has joined him, and it is given out in rebel journals that he has been reinforced by ten thousand men from Lee's army.

The following dispatch to Secretary Welles from Admiral FARRAGUT, dated August 9, tells the story of his report to the Admiral's late success in Mobile Bay:

"SIR: I have the honor to report to the Department that this morning I entered Mobile Bay, passing between Fort Morgan and the enemy's gunboats and the ram Tennessee and gun-boats of the enemy, viz., Selma, Morgan, and Gaines, and anchored to the westward of Fort Morgan. The following order I issued to the fleet on the preceding day, which was carried into effect in the most gallant manner:

"'The Brooklyn will lead the attack, followed by the Hartford, Richmond, Port Royal, Lackawanna, Monongahela, Ossipee, Oneida, Seminole, Metacomet, Kennebec, Port Hudson, Winnebago, Octorara, and Galena, with the Metacomet on the starboard and the Galena on the port side of the Hartford. The vessels composing the second division will follow in the same order, with the Brooklyn, MOUNTAIN FLOWERS.

The lonely wooden village
Lies far beneath our eyes,
The cattle bells are tinkling
Where rocky hills arise;
There are no fertile meadows,
Nor forests wild and free;
We climb the rugged pathway
And watch the distant sea.

But 'mid the stony mountains
Grow flowers fair and sweet,
And tufts of fragrant heart's-ease
Are smiling at our feet.
Do they grow in dear New England?
I never looked before;
With oaks and silver beeches,
I cared for nothing more.

But now I stoop and gather
The loveliness I see,
And sending tiny blossom
Brings happiness to me.
I forget the noble forests,
The oaks and hazel bowers,
And then the rocky mountains
For the beauty of their flowers.

When in the lard of sorrow
We climb the weary hill,
We leave the rich green meadows
That wave so calm and still;
The rocks close in around us,
The air is sharp and cold,
We can not help regretting
The summer days of old.

But though the great are taken,
Small pleasures still are left:
Stoop down, and we shall gather
A blossom in each cleft;
And though our thoughts may wander
To lost and lovely bowers,
We bless the rocky mountains
For the beauty of their flowers!

BEFORE PETERSBURG.

On our first page and on page 548 we give sketches illustrating GRANT'S campaign before Petersburg. The scene of the EXPLOSION AT CITY POINT, which occurred August 9, and which is illustrated on our first page, was along the new government warehouse, also of pine, nearly coextensive in length with the wharf, and answering as a dépôt for the railroad which conveys supplies to the army. Across the railroad, and at the foot of the hill on which the small town is situated, was a new row of buildings, accommodating the Post-office, Admiral's Express office, and the Quarter-master's office. Upon the hill, besides about a dozen houses, were numerous tents for soldiers. On the morning of the explosion three barges, the Major-General Meade, the J. E. Kendrick, and the J. C. Dunphill lay close to the wharf. The J. E. Kendrick was loaded with ammunition, and it was on this boat that the mischief was developed from a too careless handling of the ammunition. The 11.30 A.M. train was just about to start out when a stunning shock was heard, and the men were piled thickly with the noxious fragments which in their fall rained down upon the tents and houses on the hill, and upon the heads of passengers on board the train, scattering the ground for a mile around with muskets, shells, bolt-heads, and the ribs of exploded barges. The Kendrick was blown to atoms with the loss of all on board—a dozen or more of souls. The captain was absent. The General Meade and the Campbell were destroyed and sank with little if any loss of life. The wharf was torn up, the warehouse was destroyed, and the railroad cars shattered, though not destroyed, by the concussion. The row of buildings the other side of the railroad was crushed. The entire loss of property was about two millions. The loss of life was not so large as might have been expected. Upward of 50 were killed, 32 of whom were colored laborers. Many others, nearly a hundred were wounded, a great proportion slightly. It was altogether a melancholy and heartsickening scene.

The illustration on page 548 represents the charge which followed the explosion in front of Petersburg, July 30. The sketch gives also a more detailed outline of the scene of the exploded mine. The heights shown in the picture are those of Cemetery Ridge, and the ground ascends ahead at by our troops. In the fore-ground is the crater formed in the rebel works by the explosion. Here it was that our soldiers were sent for further efforts, when at the present time troops are hurrying up for support. This was the ground also of the flag of truce, and was literally covered with the fallen.

THE FEDERAL OFFICERS' QUARTERS IN CHARLESTON.

We give on page 549 an illustration representing the quarters allotted to the fifty Union prisoners lately imprisoned and held under fire in Charleston. The principal circumstance connected with this is the disclosure which it makes of the ravaging desolation brought by our fleet upon the city. As many as fifty shells a day are lodged in the city. Buildings on all sides are torn to pieces. General SICKLES, one of the officers confined in these quarters, was one of General ANDERSON'S garrison at Fort Sumter when that fort was assaulted by the rebels. He had, therefore, many interesting reminiscences there, and in this way became the recipient of many courtesies. On their way to Charleston the Federal prisoners were treated with great indignity; the food given them was poor, and barely sufficient to sustain life. The quarters in which they were confined were at the corner of Broad and Rutledge streets. The sketch is by one of the officers confined. It mean that, although nominally under fire, only one shell came near them, and that not sufficiently near to do any harm.

DISCIPLINED.

I.

I WAS as unreasonable and undisciplined a girl at twenty as I had been two years before; and yet I had seen some trouble in those two years, that ought to have schooled my rebellious nature to a quieter opinion of life which, after all, did not fill my life to more bitter repletion than many another.

Brought up in affluence, I found myself, by the death of my only surviving parent—my father—reduced suddenly to utter penury.

Nobody knew how ill-tempered, and I never tried to understand. I was too wicked and rebellious, too impatient of the pain and grief so unusual to me, to care to know why I was poor.

I was poor. I, with my luxurious tastes, my dainty fancies, my intolerance of labor, I had become poor. And when they told me that, at the end of all the grief that I had been through in those days after my father's death, I said, simply, that there was to be none of me God only knew. I had one of those natures that rebel at pain, that resent its approach, as a man a gun-shot, and that, instead of meeting it to meet it with a passionate and unreasoning resistance. The lady principal of the school at which I was when these troubles broke fell—the death of my father and the loss of fortune—offered me a situation as teacher of music and drawing in her establishment. I said, half laughing—scorn of the pride that was strong within me, and which such a position—there among my whilom artistocratic associates—could not but wound, I recognized the situation, and retained it, through what rack of pain and defiance only my own soul knew, and it is no matter to tell here.

My salary was a stinted one, and my duties, from my very ignorance of what was due me, were made almost unendurably exacting. I had been the haughtiest young chit of them all in my palmy days, and in my lowered estate I received, unstinted for many months, what I had meted out to others; though I must say for myself that my pride and hauteur had never vented itself in such helpless ferocities of ill-usage as was now. I had never taunted the fallen—me, thank God! never that. My scorn had been for those who were equal or above me in station. For them I evinced my preference or dislikes in a reckless way that made me enemies, who operated to the injury of my wages as much as possible.

I have no wish to dwell upon particulars. School-girl troubles have a bitterness of their own, and school-girls are not always as much to be blamed as peculiar fashion, as those old Pagans were who tortured the martyrs. Never mind; the end of it all was, that when Philip Warburton came, he took me away from all that pain and humiliation, and placed me with a lady friend to rest and recover my jaded spirits, he said. He commanded me to her with many charges that I was to be well taken care of; and at the last, ere he left me, he told me, with a severe kindness that touched me deeply, that I was to be happy and learn to love him. He saw very plainly that I did not yet do so.

Mrs. Lawrence was a widow lady with one son—he away in the army.

I was not grateful in those days. I was bitter at the need that had tempted me to accept the charity of Philip Warburton—for so I named it in my heart—and I was thankful for nothing, for the only feeling any grateful tenderness toward this man, who was so patient with my waywardness, so kind to my need, so delicate in the chivalry of his thought of him only as one who had taken advantage of my position to make himself my tyrant. I constantly contemplated my fetters, and was there galled by lasting them.

Mr. Warburton made a great mistake in supposing that he could win the love of a spirit like mine by loading it with favors. I said gloomily where he had left me, that I was grateful for, and my interests he sent me, I never spent any of the money he so lavishly supplied me with. I repaired and altered old clothes, and I made economies in my expenses auay as much out of my sight as possible, and tried to choke myself on the crust I was eating at his expense.

In the end I wrote to Madame A——— asking to be taken back. But she did not want me now, and nobody else wanted me that I could discover—nobody that I asked; so I staid sullenly at Mrs. Lawrence's, eating the bread that Philip Warburton paid for, and accepting her and his impatient letters for weeks wore on till—till Robert Lawrence came suddenly and unexpectedly home from the army on furlough. The pale, handsome, kind young soldier!

At first I avoided him, as I avoided every body; though won, in spite of me, by a nameless charm of speech, or look, or manner, I used to watch him secretly with a kind of wonder at his helplessness, and a secret admiration of his handsome face.

One day he caught one of these looks, and laughed, coloring though. I colored too, and left his vicinity at once.

I tried to be more careful after that, but the same curious fascination drew my eyes toward him when I thought they could with any safety venture that way.

The long hours of convalescence must have dragged heavily to him, but his face never lost its serenity; I could but notice what a contrast he was to me in my sullen discontent.

Gradually he drew me somewhat out of my pride and reserve, and I talked with him. Sometimes I read to him; and then as he got able to go out in the garden and walk, my mother being busy with indoor duties, I went with him.

Mrs. Lawrence seemed at first pleased we were both unmarried; and I was sure it was a relief to her to see any softer expression take the place of the gloom and discontent that had so long answered to my face to all her efforts after my comfort and happiness.

Robert Lawrence did for me what no one else ever had done—he found my heart, and in some manner peculiar to himself made it for the first time conscious of its own ingratitude. We were very happy together for a while—happy as two children, and as innocent in our pleasure in each other. He knew of Philip, and I was the promised wife of Philip Warburton.

In my present strangely-descended happiness I rarely thought of him now, and he—I think he never thought of them unpleasantly either.

But gradually I noticed a strange discomposure in Mrs. Lawrence's manner when I was with Robert. She was a nervous, excitable woman, with a fancy for small, transparent schemings that any body could see through, and I soon hung in understanding what her strange uneasiness about Robert and myself meant.

I think he understood first, long first; for he began, or I fancied it, to somehow avoid me a little. In some inexplicable way our walks and chats, our readings, were strangely broken in upon.

In my impatience and wonder I finally asked him what it meant.

We were sitting, for the first time in many days, alone in the summer-house in the lower part of the garden. He gave me a strange look when I asked him that—a strange, startled look, before which my eyelids drooped, and I felt the startled blood glow in my cheek, and something that was near to pain in feeling, yet not quite, thrilled every pulse of my being.

He had not spoken, he had not answered my question; he did not need. But presently he said, in a low voice,

"Shall we go up to the house, Frances?"

I scarcely understood him, but when he rose I rose also, and we went slowly up to the house, my head downcast, and his—sometimes—sanctimon upon my face.

He went in, or I supposed he did. I remained outside, irritated, and yet something should jar upon the fond sweetness of the thoughts that were moving me, and which were to sew, to tender, and I shrank unfortunately from meeting Mrs. Lawrence's uneasy eyes.

She had seen us, however, come in from the garden, and she watched us instantly, and stood beside me. Preoccupied as I was, I could but see that she was agitated—very much so.

Presently she put her arm round me and drew me to her.

"My dear child," she said, abruptly, "Robert likes you very much. Do you like her?"

"Yes, I think he does." I said, my heart sinking indefinably, as it always did when she spoke of him in that tone of affectionate familiarity.

"And you like him?"

"Yes, I like him."

"Very much?"

"Very much."

She strained me closer and kissed me. "Don't look, dear, don't look so much. I don't want you to—don't, don't dear," and taking her arms from round me, she wrung her hands together in a strange, excited fashion.

"Why not? why may I not like him? What do you mean?" I asked, cold chills creeping over me.

"There, don't be angry, don't be vexed with me, I don't want to vex any body, but I don't want you to like Robert too much."

"Why not?"

She sighed, long and heavily, "He might die, you know."

I felt like choking; I clung to the pillar by me. I understood her in part—Robert must die to me. She meant that—no matter why; he was not for me, nothing was for me.

"Don't, don't look so," Mrs. Lawrence said, anxiously, putting out her hand and holding my dress. I pulled away from her, nervously.

"Don't talk to me," I said, "I'm not angry; you are right, quite right; I don't blame you, but don't talk to me."

She turned partly away from me, in a vague, uncertain way. "I mean right, I mean right," she said, piteously.

"Yes, yes, I know," I said; "go in, please, let me be alone; you are quite right, but I want to be alone."

"You won't tell Robert I have said any thing, will you?" and she was clinging to my dress again.

With a sudden impetuous movement I tore it from her hand, and ran down the walk into the garden. I did not stop or look behind me till I reached the summer-house, and darting within threw myself upon my knees before the seat upon which I had sat in such strange happiness with Robert only a little before. How happy we had been! How kind he had always been to me, shrinking away from me of late, but he loved me, and I loved him!

I knew it then. I stood face to face with the fact —the holy, tender, cruel fact—for what was I that I should dare to love him or suffer him to love me, what but the promised wife of another man? A man whom I hated, but whose promised wife I was all the same.

"Frances!"

I shivered from head to foot, but bent my face lower.

"Frances!"

It was Robert. He sat down upon the seat and put his hand upon my bowed head, not speaking for some moments, but I could feel his hand trembling.

"Won't you talk to me, Frances?" he said, finally. "I want to talk to you."

I did not move, I did not answer him, I could not. It seemed to me I could not lift my face to him, the shamed face that would tell him so much, and to tell him in vain, for I was the promised wife of a man whose fetters his very charity to me and I set my teeth as I thought of it) had bound in such a manner that I could not loose them without utter degradation.

"Frances," he said again, and his voice smote me with its pain, "you must talk to me, or at least hear me, since it has come to this—since I know—yes I do—that you love me. You start—I feel you tremble under my hand—but you do not, you can not deny it. It is true, then?"

He paused, and I could hear him breathe, the panting breath of strong excitement.

"If you had not, if my own pain had been all, I would have gone away and never spoken. But now I must. There is no law in heaven or earth that ought to make you the wife of any other man than me. I will not be childish, Frances, that I will not submit to any such law; I will not suffer you to do so. Promise me that you will not suffer yourself."

I did not answer him—I could not. Scornfully as I had promised myself to Philip Warburton, I had done so solemnly, and with the full intention of abiding by my promise. I had never thought of swerving from it. Even when I had contemplated running away from him, I had called his charity, I had not thought of recalling my promise to marry him. I had considered myself indeed as much bound to him as though the marriage vows had been spoken, and God knows how innocently I had come to give another the love that belonged of right to him alone.

I trembled then, kneeling under the pressure of Robert's hand, in the agony of my knowledge of calling him all this. I felt that the mood in which he was would burst stormily upon me if I told him that.

"Frances, child, how you have frightened me!" It was Mrs. Lawrence, with a quiver of anxiety in her tone—quickly beyond what her words expressed. She stepped quickly toward, and took hold of me. I had risen instantly at sound of her voice. Robert's hand had fallen from my head to my hand. He held my fingers in a firm, close clasp, not yielding me even to his mother.

"Let her go, Robert. She is ill, I am sure," Mrs. Lawrence said.

"I do not hinder her, mother. She can go if she chooses."

But he did not loose my hand.

"You will come in with me, won't you?" Mrs. Lawrence said wheedlingly. "Come, like a dear."

"Will you go or stay?" Robert said, bending to look at me, and his hand clasped mine almost fiercely.

I made a faint effort to release my hand. I could not speak. He resisted the movement an instant, then his clasp fell heavily away from mine, and scarce knowing what I did, I suffered his mother to lead me away toward the house.

She took me to her own room, seated me, and closed the door.

"Do you want to know," she said, speaking rapidly and excitedly, "why you can not, why you must not love Robert?"

I did not like one in a dream without answering. I was so full of other thoughts, so haunted by those tones, those looks of Robert's stern yet loving eyes.

"This is why," she went on: "long ago Philip Warburton loved me—me—do you hear? and more truly, I think, than he ever loved any one now. I wronged him, as woman can most wrong man, and he never forgave me till the day he brought you to me. Then he said to me, 'I keep you safe for him—if I taught you to love him, he could forgive me the wound that twenty-two years had not yet healed. Do you think then that I will ever suffer son of mine to defraud him of his second love as I did of his first? Ah, woe is me! Why did Robert come home?

I understood her; but it had not needed that.

"Be at peace, Mrs. Lawrence," I said, in a low voice; "I have promised to marry Mr. Warburton."

"Do you expect to keep that promise?" she asked, in a milder tone.

"I do."

"Did I tell Robert so?"

I hesitated. But what matter? Why should I shrink? I had brought this fate upon myself. I owed no way of escape from it. Why should she not tell Robert?

"Tell him any thing you like, Mrs. Lawrence," I said, quite passionately. "An old, revengeful rebelliousness against pain was rising within me.

"May I tell him that you did not wish him to address you again on this subject? May I tell him from you that it would be quite useless to do so?"

"Tell him what you like," I said, impatiently. "Why do you torture me with it?"

She was a strange woman. Whether to kill any ever so faint hope that I might have, or to try me, I do not know; but she said, looking steadily at me, and smoothing the folds of her silk dress with her white hand,

"You remember that beautiful girl who was here last week—Rose Gilbert? Robert liked her once. I think, when he finds he can not hope for you, he will like her still. She adores him, any one can see. I shall advise him to marry Rose Gilbert if she will have him, and the sooner the better?"

She went and left me.

Did she think he would marry Rose Gilbert because she advised him to do so?

I went from Mrs. Lawrence's room to my own. I did not go out to tea that night, and Mrs. Lawrence brought it to me with her own fair hands, saying, as she set it down,

"I have told him, my dear, what you said, and he bore it very well. Indeed I begin to think my alarm on account was needless. He was quite merry at tea—quite, indeed—so much so that I ventured to speak about Rose. He has always liked and admired her, I think, and I gather that, you know, the rest is easy. It'll all come out right yet. Don't you think so? You and he were having a most comfortable little flirtation; but it was really time to put a stop to it, as I told him."

"And what did he say to that?" I demanded, suddenly interrupting her volubility.

"He laughed, and said, 'Yes, mother.' And she went away.

Sitting there, in the twilighted room, I repeated slowly and faithfully to myself all that Robert had ever said to me. I put back, which might mean any thing, out of the question. I found it was not much. Bereft of the manner which had, I imagined, so emphasized it, and said far more than the words had, I found it was not much.

With my usual haste I concluded that what his mother said was true. On his part, all that summer hours in which he had taught me to love him he had only been amusing himself with me—flirting, in short. I was a sensible girl to spend my regrets on him.

I said that to myself; but my cheeks glowed, and my heart throbbed impatiently.

"I threw back the blind of my window, finally, and went out of doors. I thought if I could once see Robert's face, once meet his eyes, I should know. Why did I want to know? What right had I to want to know? None. And I finally resolved that I would know. I lingered about outside till it was quite dark, but I saw nothing of Robert. Finally I went in without encountering him.

I met him at breakfast the following morning; but his face told me nothing. His eye met mine calmly, unruffled, neither seeking nor avoiding one.

My heart, which owed its every throb to Philip Warburton, sank heavily. If I could only speak with him, I thought, and I lingered about all the morning even feverishly watching an opportunity, and reproaching myself—for what? I knew not. Sure-ly what I had said to Mrs. Lawrence was all that I had meant it at the time? Yes, alas! and I dared not do other than mean it now.

Mrs. Lawrence had told me that Robert had replied favorably to her proposal that he should marry Rose. I did not believe her, but I was heavy of heart, and dealing all the heavier blow with an anxiety that I did not conceal from myself, for a glimpse of Robert.

Mrs. Lawrence watched me with evident uneasiness, bustling about very energetically for her, and making for herself always some occupation in my vicinity. Inoffensive as she looked, I knew that if Robert had come near me she would have prevented, in her quiet way, all private speech for us. And why should we have speech of each other? Alas! I know not; but I longed for it nevertheless. I made errands every where in search of Robert or of Mrs. Lawrence. But whether I went into the garden, or to the orchard, or to the current-bushes, Mrs. Lawrence made it convenient to accompany me.

Half an hour before dinner-time some more than usually urgent call took Mrs. Lawrence from my side a few moments, and looking up I saw Robert slowly passing down the walk near me. Now was my time; but I seemed suddenly stricken dumb. I stood still, waiting for him to speak, which I knew very well he would not do after the word I had sent him the night before. I knew it, and yet I took no step toward him. In another moment Robert was before me, and I was, in my keen, self-reproach, about to go after him when Mrs. Lawrence joined me again, talking volubly, and casting apprehensive glances from me to Robert.

At last I was dinner-time; and now I thought I should certainly be able to get an opportunity of speaking to Robert. But he was not at dinner, and a little before the conclusion of my meal Mrs. Lawrence remarked, carelessly, that she thought "Robert would have a pleasant ride after all," glancing at the sky, which, cloudy all the morning, was clearing now.

I felt that she watched me furtively as she said it, and the vague uneasiness I asked suddenly, "Where has Robert gone?"

"Oh, only to Boone!"

Rose lived at Boone. I could almost see myself the darkness that swept over my face at this announcement.

Mrs. Lawrence was relentless. "My dear," she said, as she was leaving the table, "Lawrence has gone to ask Rose to marry him; at least I infer so from what he said."

I could not, I would not believe her. She was silent enough after that. She had said her "say," and perhaps thought she could afford to be generous now of silence.

That was a long afternoon to me. The unsolicited nature that was still mine, despite all the tutoring of adversity, rose up now and grappled me fiercely. I set myself tasks, and these, by vengeful willfulness, refused to do them; smote them aside with angry and scornful vehemence, and walked my room bitterly and impotently rebellious against the fate that chained me still—a log—while the man I loved was wrecking his own peace and mine.

Mine! My peace was nothing to his—less than that; but his—I knew what misery it would be to his eagle spirit to find itself irretrievably tied to the mere dull Robert Gilbert was!

I wore the afternoon away as best I might, and I went out to tea, swallowing two cups of Mrs. Lawrence's bitterest tea with a queer kind of pleasure in its bitterness. Then I went into the garden, deaf to Mrs. Lawrence's call after me that the evening was damp, and I'd better take a shawl with me.

I went energetically away, stamping my feet up and down the walks, and watching with devouring eyes the various avenues to the house. The night was damp; and though I was scarcely conscious of it, its coolness stilled my bodily fever, and lowered the irate tone of my spirits to their stillest despondency. I stood among the rose-bushes by the gate, and watched and waited. I knew I was waiting with a sick heart for Robert to come. I dare say I shivered more than once, but I was scarcely conscious of it.

I saw, as it grew late, Mrs. Lawrence come out and look—I doubted not for me. She went in, and after half an hour came out again—this time down the walk toward me. I shrunk farther and farther back in the shadow, and finally down the walk by the fence. The sound of horse's hoofs suddenly quickened my steps.

Robert had come at last, and was taking his way round by the stables.

"Now I will see him!" I said to myself, desperately, and hid myself among the lilacs.

Mrs. Lawrence passed me while I crouched there. Would she go on and meet Robert, and not leave him a moment alone? Should I never be able to speak to him again? This night I must and would!

Straining my eyes I fancied I saw Mrs. Lawrence retracing her steps before toward the house, and presently distinguished Robert's slow, firm step about to pass me.

I had never myself, I stepped out from my concealment, I was about to speak, when a form flitted past me—Mrs. Lawrence—and, fastening upon his arm, went chattering with him. God helping him, he could never—talk for a wife a woman who loved another. The pain was for his consent to win you if I could. Can you forgive me, Frances, a noble gentleman. I will bless his name as long as I live. I told him every thing. I talked very rashly and excitedly. I said some things that it would have been better not to have said. But he was patient with me, and not only forgave my hasty words, but loved me. God helping him, he would never take for a wife a woman who loved another. The pain was for his consent to win you if I could. Can you forgive me, Frances, for my selfishness?

"Will I? Oh, Robert!" I said, holding my hands to him and crying. He kissed me then. He had never touched lips to hand or cheek before.

"Robert," I said a little, "why didn't you tell me last night? What made you let me think that about you and Rose?"

"I didn't tell you because I had promised Mr. Warburton I would not till to-day. And as to Rose"—he colored a little—"I hoped you would be so jealous of her as I was of Philip Warburton. Were you?"

"Yes, I believe I was."

Robert let me hear a little to Mr. Warburton. I could not speak for tears; but I gave him my hand, and he held it a moment kindly, understanding all I felt, and then we went back to where I had spoken it. Perhaps, too, he read in my face something of my questioning anxiety concerning him; for he said, quite softly, to me:

"It is better so, my child. I did not love you as a man should the woman he marries. But I was a better husband for it. I was prouder of the could love me, if I could make you happy, I should get some of the reward in my own heart. God bless you, Frances. Be sure I blame you, child. Never have a regret on my account!"

His voice was sad. Involuntarily, as it were, he glanced toward Mrs. Lawrence. There were tears in her eyes. She looked at him imploringly.

"I have asked her to stay also, dy," she pleaded. "I tried indeed. Forgive me that I so failed in the trust you imposed upon me."

I saw another look of pain flit over Philip Warburton's face, and taking a step toward her, he said:

"I forgive you on one condition, Emma. My heart is unbroken, and these years will—"

I drew Robert away. I saw how it was going to end.

They are married now. I am staying with Mr. and Mrs. Warburton for a little. Robert—my Robert—is not patient. Yet, Father, in Thy mercy bring my Robert safely back to me! I believe He will.

IN THE VAN.

On, as he lived he died,
His life burned not to ashes, white with death;
But like a meteor in Burke's breach went out,
His young blood pulsing years in a wild rout,
Then halting at high tide.

In the loud trumpet-blast—
In the great rush of tilted banners met,
With his cheeks flushing and his sabre wet,
His young eyes flashing and his young lips set,
He had died gladly.

Just when the fight was won—
When the clouds broke from off the hard-won height
And the pierced flag leaped out upon our sight,
In Victory's triumphant cry
His brave young soul went on.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"Gardening for ladies" is all very well, but the dears are more inclined to agriculture than horticulture, on account of a plentiful supply of hoes.

A rascally old bachelor says the most difficult surgical operation in the world is to take the cut of a woman.

A stupid tried to annoy a popular preacher by asking him whether the text in the Bible or the Bible was made of the mule. "Female, to be sure," was the reply; "for I see the snake, Satan, the Lucifer fall in the face, "and alive in the flesh before me."

One day, at a farm-house, a wag saw an old gobbler trying to eat the stings of some night-caps that lay on the grass to bleach. "That," said he, "is what I call an attempt to introduce cotton into Turkey."

"Ma," said a little boy, "why is a postage stamp like a bad scholar?" "I can't tell, my son; why is it?" "Because it gets licked and put in a corner." "Susan, put that boy to bed."

THE BAR SINISTER.—The toll-bar.

CONJUGAL TURNSCRIPTURE.—The Nain Jaune (Paris) relates the following anecdote: "At the commencement of the winter two journalists were in conversation at the opera. The one, M. de X., is a bachelor; the other, M. de Y., just married. 'Well,' said the one to the other, 'how do you get along in your new condition?' 'Ah, my dear X., there is nothing like being married. You can not imagine how happy I am. When I am at work my wife is at my side, and at the conclusion of each paragraph I embrace her. That is charming!' 'Now I understand,' said M. de X., 'why it is that your articles are so short.' This conversation quickly spread through Paris. It reached the ears of the wife of M. Y., who consoled by the public as the thermometer or of his conjugal felicity. Some days after, in the house of M. Y., we were told this epigrammatic, in shorter periods than are to be found in the earlier editions of Lindley Murray, by a well-known gossip jealous of Madame Y. But gradually the periods lengthened, and at last the following was published and edited by M. Y., and casting a rapid glance over the article, he exclaimed, with a sigh, 'What! but a single paragraph in the whole article! Poor woman, a divorce will soon accompany it!'"

In the course of an examination for the degree of B. A. under an examiner whose name was Payne, one of the questions was, "Give a definition of happiness;" to which a candidate returned the following laconic answer: "An exemption from Payne."

"I think I now see a new feature in this case," as the lawyer said, when his client informed him that he had plenty of money.

"Madam," said a gentleman to his wife, "let me tell you facts are very disagreeable things." "What! but a single paragraph in the whole article! Poor woman, a divorce will soon accompany it!"

Two persons of satiric turn met a neighbor and said, "Friend, we have been disputing whether you are most of a fool or a knave." "Gentlemen, you must refer to the arm, so that he was in the middle. "Truth," said he, "is often found between two."

A few years ago, when Billy Burton was ill his "trouble," a young lawyer was examining him as to how much property he was worth. He mentioned several thousand pounds unencumbered, when the attorney put on a serious look, closed his face, and exclaimed, with self-complacency, "Now, Sir, I want you to tell this court and jury, facts are very disagreeable things, remember." Burton put on one of his facetio-comic faces, winked at the audience, and answered, "I'll remember that, Sir." The effect on the audience were convulsed with laughter. The counselor was glad to let the witness off.

Talk as you will of the "sovereignty of the white race," there are no sovereigns like the yellow ones.

AN ODD MISTAKE.—A lady asked a pupil at a public school, "What was she an example of?" "Please, mum, a camel, mam," quickly replied the child. She had read that the Pharisees "strained at gnats and swallowed camels."

It has been beautifully said that "the veil which covers the face of futurity is woven by the hand of mercy."

Dr. Macknight, who was a better commentator than preacher, having been sought to a church in a small town, entered the vestry seated with wet. As the time drew on for divine service he became anxious for the appearance of the sexton and over, "Oh, I wish that I was dry in!" Do you think I'd be so foolish as to make my grammar?" "Yes," said this his goose colleague, Dr. Henry, the historian, replied, "I'll bet you a hundred pounds, and you're dry search when you get into the pulpit."

WHAT IS A THROUGHFARE?—Well, a watch-ye-may-call-it.

THE PROPER SIDE TO VOTE FOR.—The sea-side.

Why are Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli like two gentlemen engaged in joint literary work?—Because they are trying to make a Pen-ny-worth.

Why are widows like smokers?—Because they often find relief in their cesses.

A young fellow once offered to kiss a Quakeress. "Friend," said she, "thou must not do it." "Oh, by your leave, but I must." "Friend," said she, "if thou dost thou hast sworn, thee may do it, but thee must not make a practice of it."

The folly of betting is well satirized in one of Walpole's letters: "Sept. 1st, 1726—They have put in the papers a most ridiculous bet that a man has laid that Gore shall be dead at the race, and was carried in; the club immediately sent to him to know if he would choose to ride for it, which were going to bleed him the surgeons for his death intending, and all to the great diversion of the town."

A farmer, having lost some ducks, was asked by the counsel for the prisoner accused of stealing them to describe the appearance of the birds he had done so, the counsel remarked, "They can't be such a rare breed, as I have come like them in any farm-yard." "Ah, but you have not got them, farmer," there are not the only ducks of the same sort who had stolen them."

A regular physician being sent for by a quack, expressed his surprise at being called in on an occasion apparently nothing. "Oh, no," replied the quack, "nothing is quacky; for, to tell you the truth, I have, by mistake, taken some of my own drugs."

If you visit a young woman, and you are won, and she is won, you will both be one.

"You have only yourself to please," said a married friend to an old bachelor, who had just applied he, "but you can not tell what a difficult task I find it."

A very considerate hotel-keeper, advertising his "Burton XXXX," concludes the advertisement—"N. B. Parties drinking at present at the sign of this paper will be served gratis, one sitting, carefully and some fizzing grain in a wheel-barrow, if required."

Sydney Smith being ill, his physician advised him to "take a walk upon an empty stomach." "Upon whose?" said he.

Jerrold and a company of literary friends were out in the country. In the course of the day they came to a notice that a cow was for sale. A very sentimental poet present vowed that he could not see the cow for sale without a sensation in the throat. "Do," Jerrold replied, "and tie a piece of paper round the neck, bearing this word—'Wild!' We see, remember, the idea."

Mr. Phillip Thicknesse, father of the late Lord Audley, being in want of money, applied to his son for assistance. Thicknesse, who had been extravagant in his youth, and, directly opposite his lordship's house, and got up a board, with the following inscribed, in large letters, "Wanted immediately in the best and cheapest manner, by Phillip Thicknesse, a son." His lordship took the hint, and the board was removed.

After giving Sandy certain directions about kirk matters, the minister walked once or twice, and remarked, "Saunders, I fear you have been 'tasting' this morning." "Deed, Sir," replied Sandy, with the coolest effrontery, set off with a droll glance of his brown eyes; "Deed, Sir, I was just gaein' to observe I thocht there was a smell o' speerits amang us this mornin'!"

Mr. Querry wonders if, when Night falls, she doesn't hurt herself? The desire of the Querry for "useful knowledge" and things is only equaled by his humanity.

WHERE the orange bee on the purple flower
Of the roadside thistle dozes;
Where the flying down blows, flimsy white,
And the azure air-hell poises light;
And where the mole, deep out of sight,
After his work reposes—
Alone I would lie,
Without company,
And dream my old dreams o'er again.

Where the plovers whirl, and circle, and scream,
Over the loneliest places;
Where the sand clouds roll heavy and slow,
And the glad winds race, and flutter, and blow;
Where the golden corn is all of a glow,
And so are the reapers' faces—
Alone I would be,
Without company,
And dream my old dreams o'er again.

Where the furrow is moist and evergreen,
Raises its dripping cones,
And the squirrel, sailor-like, climbs the tree;
And the wind is breathing its lullaby,
Fond, and soft, and ceaselessly,
The songs of distant zones—
Alone I would be,
Without company,
And dream my old dreams o'er again.

CHAPTER XLII.

LILY IS SEIZED.

LILY was in haste now to leave those Elysian Fields, which had exercised so strange a fascination over her. She was haunted by the eyes of that pallid woman. She wandered about for full an hour she knew not whither; dazed by the colored lamps, the crowds, the shouts, the braying of bands; the hoarse rhetoric of the mountebanks, the roaring of the cannon, which were to usher in the fire-works. She sought vainly for one of those from the saturnals; but the crowd compassed her about and hemmed her in, and on its remotest borders there seemed to be more shows and more crowds.

She was almost in despair when, thinking to gain the Place de la Concorde, and in view even of the open obelisk, which from base to apex was one blaze of light, she found herself wedged in a mass of sight-seers who were gathered round the carriage of a quack doctor. Lily had never seen the Elixir d'Amore, but there, as large as life, was Doctor Dulcamara. He had deviated a little from the costume on which the late admirable Labiche conferred well-merited fame, inasmuch as over his well-powdered periwig he wore a Roman helmet of brass, with a tremendous plume of crimson horse-hair; but the scarlet cloak, the frills, the ruffles, the topboots, the buckskin, the watch and pendulous seals, the snuff-box, the signet-ring, and the gold-headed cane, all belonged to the opera. He was an impudent vagabond at best; but had the flow of flashy verbiage common to his tribe, and scores of hands were speedily extended from the crowd beneath him, holding francs and half francs to be exchanged for the worthless nostrums he retailed in light.

His calèche, and the white horse that drew it, to boot, were quite a bower of Chinese lanterns; and in the rumble sat his servant, who had figured as a drum-major in the Imperial Guard, whose business it was to be the butt of his master's jokes, and of the hurdy-gurdy men whom caravans was out of breath. The under quack was a fellow of cadaverous traits and discontented mien, and appeared heartily ashamed of his position. He had reason to be. He was the real doctor. His diploma and license to practice were duly certified by the Faculty of Paris, and without them Dulcamara would have been hauled to prison as a swindler; but the genuine physician being poor and idle, and dissolute and drunken, the quack was content to pay him so much a year to use his diploma; and he filled up his leisure time by grinding the barrel-organ. "On demande un médecin pour voyager." I have never seen that advertisement in Les Petites Affiches? It means that Dulcamara the quack is in want of an organ-grinder with a diploma.

"Approach, my children," the mountebank was bawling. "Approach, lose no time. I have but a few nostrums to bestow upon you. I am wanted elsewhere. Kings and princesses sigh for my presence. Spanish hidalgos, who have eaten too much olla podrida,—English milords, agonized by the spleen—refuse to be comforted without me. Grand Birbi—(this to the melancholy man with the diploma)—strike up the chanson à boire from Robert le Diable. After that we shall have something to say about the Imperial Soporific and Atomic Tincture of Honolulu."

An hour ago, in her recklessness, Lily might have been for a moment detained by the loquacity of this homastic humbug. But it was too late now. The awful consciousness of her miserable position had come upon her: and some inward voice kept thundering in her ears that she was in danger—from she knew not what; and that she must fly—she knew not where.

Exerting more strength than she had imagined she possessed, she contrived at last to disengage herself from the throng, and to reach a space which was less encumbered. She leaned up against a tree sick and faint. Her poor eyes were blinded with tears. Her strength had broken down. Her enterprise seemed to her now impossible of accomplishment. That dreadful fever was racking her head again. Heaven be merciful to her—what had she done, and what was she to do?

"Pretty little demoiselle, you seem ill," said a voice behind her.

She had heard the voice before. It was that of the man who had declared that all weapons and instruments should be left at the door. She turned her head, trembling, and saw the Italian wax-work showman.

"Ah! you recognize me, then?" continued Signor Ventimilioni. "Do you know that I have been looking for you this half-hour?"

"I do not know you," faltered Lily. "Good night!"

"Not so fast, pricelina mia. We are not to part in such a hurry." And the Italian laid his hand on Lily's arm.

"Let me go! let me go!" cried the terrified girl, "and go home."

"Precisely, that is where I am going to take you. There is a lady of high rank who is expecting you most anxiously. You have kept her waiting a very long time. Whole years. Home indeed. Ahu! your little runaway!"

He tightened his grasp. He passed the other hand round her waist. Lily tried to scream, when, suddenly some loose garment was thrown over her head, and another pair of hands were clasped over her mouth.

"Enough of this trifling," grumbled very hoarsely a man who had been lurking a few paces behind the Italian during his parley with Lily. "Corpo di Bacco! in a public dancing-room, bring the young tool along, or some sergent de ville will be passing by."

"Don't swear, Bec-Jaune," remonstrated the Italian. "Take the cloak off her head, and your hands off her mouth, and let us try to make her listen to reason. Des convenances, mon garçon; n'oublions jamais les convenances."

The second man did, sullkily, as he was bid, but he planted his great hands on Lily's shoulders, and kept them there. The girl was too terrified to struggle. She looked in the grasp of the two ruffians like a captured bird.

"Listen to me, ma mie," went on the Italian, putting his face so close to Lily's that she could feel his beard upon her cheek; "you are coming home with us. You are our prisoner, if you like that tournure de phrase better. Quietly, and no harm will be done you; but dare to call for assistance, and I will put this pretty little bodkin into you."

He drew, as quick as lightning, a long knife that glittered in the moonlight. Lily saw what she was lost. She could hear the distant hum of the crowd, and the clanging of the music; but the spot was solitary, and she was beyond all human help.

"Will you be quiet, then?" the Italian asked, half entreating, half threatening.

Lily murmured a faint affirmative.

"That's right. Now, Demosthène, let us take her between us. Don't forget that little bright bodkin of mine, little one."

The two strong men hooked their arms in those of the girl on either side, and hurried her. They plunged into an alley between the trees, and which seemed entirely deserted. But as though the mockery of the Elysian Fields typified state of bondage, she saw gleaming from behind the tufted trees the first sparkle of the fire-works, those fire-works of which she was to be in a resplendent bonquet, in which Liberty was to have her annual apotheosis, and the twenty-seventieth, twenty-first, twenty-ninth of July to be made glorious forever.

They were now walking by the water-side. That it was the Seine Lily knew, for she could see the lamps on the Pont Louis Seize, and the Chamber of Deputies flaring with lamplons. They stopped before a mean wooden building, having seemingly but one window, through whose dirty panes a light feebly glimmered.

The Italian pushed at the door, which gave way, and they passed in. There was a narrow passage, and at the end of it a swinging cresset Lily could see a woman who was bending forward her—a woman huddled in an old plaid shawl, whose hair was dishevelled, and whose face was painted. It was the Wild Woman of the Egyptian Fields.

CHAPTER XLIII.

THE SULTAN IN LONDON.

WHAT is a year? Pshaw! what are ten? When you are young, a year seems a very long time. That last month before you are twenty-one, or before you leave school, or get your commission, or pass your examination for the civil service, the month it takes for your mustaches to grow, how it lags, how it loiters, how every moment seems to have its feet clogged by leaden weights! Do our best as we may to squander the days in recklessness and prodigality, what a weary time elapses before we are thirty years of age, and fogies cease to tell us that, as young men, we should defer to the opinion of our elders. Never was there, perhaps, a sane woman of twenty-nine who passed herself off as thirty-one; but how often does a young middle-aged man silly add on a year or two? But I—I when the mezzo cammen is reached, how swiftly the years fly! We lose count. Sixty-two melts into sixty-three, and sixty-three into sixty without our special notice. Things pass as in a dream. The day before yesterday, why it was eighteen months ago. One newly-formed acquaintance, why we have known him these eight years. The far-off goal of gray hairs, and toothlessness, and the tomb, why we are close upon it. It was a tedious pull to Tattenham Corner; it is a lightning rush to the judge's stand, even if we come in with the rock.

A year had passed since the events previously narrated. Madame de Kergolay was dead. She passed away very peacefully, leaving the bulk of her wealth to her possessed to her beloved grandnephew, Edgar Greyfaunt. It was not much, but it was a capital to be turned into ready money, and that was what the young man wanted. It is due to the memory of the good old lady in Paris to state that she freely forgave poor little Lily before she died. Her sin, indeed, against the girl had lasted but a very short time. She had been shocked and pained by her disappearance, and had made every effort to gain tidings of her, but in vain. By degrees the vengeful pride which had led her to crush Lily with cruel words, became changed to love for the sultan, her grand-nephew, gave way to her natural kindness and softness of heart. She wept and bewailed the fugitive. She would have sacrificed much to recover her. She acknowledged that Lily's love had been blameless. But she was gone, and would return no more.

The abbé, as in duty bound, informed Madame Beckassin of Lily's flight, and of the unavailing steps he had been taken to discover her hiding-place.

The Parisian did not take the intelligence much to heart.

"I expected it," she remarked, coldly. "I, who am the daughter of sufferer by the absconding of this varnitieune, would not spend three francs ten sous in an advertisement in the Petites Affiches to get her back again. There are cats and cats, whom one is glad to lose, Monsieur l'Abbé. You and your Madame de Kergolay were catiches de cette petite Cyprine. Now she has robbed you as she robbed me, and has doubtless fled to join the swindler, her mother, with whom for years she has played the most correct correspondence. Ah, ces Anglaises, ces Anglaises! c'est de la perfide à en croire à la fin du monde. You had much better, my dear abbé, keep your money her, have put her into a Maison de Discipline where she would have been fed on bread and water and flogged once a week. The Sœurs Grises have an excellent institution at Auteuil. You say that she did not take her clothes with her. Then she has sometimes counted her spoons since the flight of her darling?"

"I don't think the poor little child is dishonest," the abbé said, with a faint remonstrance. He was a good man after all, and much troubled in his mind about Lily.

"Bah! bah!" the inflexible Marcassin said. "You take the whole world to be inhabited by excellents like the Prize of Virtue. Une femme Rosière elle finit mal-elle-là! The trumpery little thing was innately and incorrigibly bad. Indeed, indeed, I tell you, Monsieur l'Abbé, mauvaise herbe."

And Madame de Kergolay died. To her two faithful servants she left a small but adequate provision, much to the distaste of Edgar; but of the rest he was sole legatee. Vieux Salons and Prudhommes are content to die quietly in their mistress from the stage. The old one did not survive madame many months. He expressed, before he died, a wish to be buried in Père la Chaise, in the same grave with his beloved mistress, but crosswise, at her feet, as became an ancient and faithful but humble servitor. The abbé did his best to have his wish fulfilled; but there were difficulties in the way: the administrators of cemeteries, and Vieux Salons had to be buried as many millions of his forerunners had been buried before him. It did not do to make exceptions. He was buried, let us hope, to a country where there is but One Master, in whose eyes superiors and servitors are alike.

Edgar Greyfaunt, after passing a decent period in retirement at Aix-les-Baine—his grenuine and kind affection for the memory of—remembrance will be exceedingly fashionable mourning, but yet studs and wrist-buttons, and the coal-black dress are becoming deservedly admired, came back to Paris, settled accounts with Madame de Kergolay's notary—whom, as appeared, a many pages of long explanations, of robbing him, and who did him the honor to remark, as he handed him the last couple of thousand-franc notes accruing from the dead lady's succession, that with a more heartless young man he had never come in contact—and called in an upholsterer from the Rue St. Louis, to whom, after a parley of ten minutes, he sold en bloc the entire furniture and fittings of the late lamented servitors in the Marais—tapestry, china, pictures, and all. "I do not want this rococo stuff," he said, candidly. "I shall be in a hotel not many months since, and am returning there; and if I require brics-à-brac I can get as many as I need in Warden Street for three-quarters their price."

The upholsterer handed three thousand francs to the Sultan Greyfaunt, and sent a couple of carts to cart away the effects of the poor old lady's parlors, which were worth six thousand at least. Big men in blouses dragged the faded Cupids, and shepherdesses, and long-legged gentlemen with the cross of St. Louis down stairs. Gentil Bernard lay for a time in the gutter, and Babet la Bonguetière was calmly contemplated by a chiffonnier. A part of the furniture went very soon to decorate the rooms of a lorette in the Rue Taitbout. When she had quarrelled with the English milord, through her overweening partiality for the Brazilian coffee-planter, who travelled out to be a swindler from Hamburg, she had a lavage, or sale of her nick-nacks, and some of Madame de Kergolay's treasures were sold to the Jews, and some were bought by painters to increase the "properties" of their studios withal. Then in process of time they got burned or broken up, or pawned and sold and pawned again, or exported to America or Australia. Which is the way of the world, and not at all uncommon.

But the first van-load of goods had scarcely left the house of the deceased before Edgar Greyfaunt was snugly ensconced in the coupé of the diligence on his way to Calais. He began to think his mourning very hot and shabby-looking. He must have an entirely new wardrobe when he reached London. Those French tailors did not know how to fit an English gentleman. Willis or Nugee should be honored with his patronage. He was about to assume his proper position in society. He was destined to be a great man. He was certain. He had an ancient name, a handsome appearance, a fortune. Yes, quite a fortune. In a letter of credit on a London banking firm he was entitled to draw for no less a sum than five thousand pounds sterling. That was his entire capital in hand and ready to be converted into francs. It sounded magnificent. Reduced to English sterling, it had not quite so sonorous a ring, but still with a great deal of splendor in it. In his whole life the sultan had never grasped so much money. His treasure seemed to him inexhaustible. He would live happily, luxuriously, he thought, but then he would be adding to his capital. Was there not the turf? might not he, a young man of fashion and position, make a figure there, and win thousands by betting? How much would it cost to have a stud of race-horses? And play! he knew how to play. Hitherto, certainly, he had but rarely had a run of luck; but Fortune favors the bold, and he would have no need to distress himself about the loss of a few paltry hundreds of francs. And if the worst came to the worst, was he not his own? Had he not a commandite genuine? Most commanding. Certainly, at no very distant date the portals of the English Royal Academy must open for his admission. Yes, there would be plenty of time to take up with painting as a pursuit. It was a noble resource. To tell truth, he felt slightly ashamed of the exact and maulstick, now that he was an independent gentleman, with his pocket full of money. After all, it was but a base mechanical employment this painting. How villainously the turpentine and megilp did smell! How difficult it was to get subjects—what a bore it was to have to make sketches! And those troublesome models—they cost ever so much money, and the most accomplisht was always daunting for his bill. Those envious ill-conditioned fellows the critics, too, who condemned his performances in the past for which, if they got their deserts, they should be caned, and who drew no distinction between a picture painted by the son of a gentleman and one that was the work of a descendant of the barons of old.

Of course Edgar put up at the Ship when he landed at Dover—the Lord Warden not being then built—and although he had the largest suit of apartments next to Queen Victoria's—a duke who had crossed with him, the Ship was several sizes too small for the Sultan Greyfaunt. He would have gone to London by road, but the railway just been opened. He could never have endured a vulgar stage-coach.

At the Ship he met, of friends, and some few distant connections in London. He was known that he was Madame de Kergolay's heir. Nobody knew much about the old lady's circumstances, nor did the sultan feel called upon to enlighten society with any particulars. It was noised abroad that he had inherited a large fortune; nor did he take any special pains to contradict the rumor. If people chose to deceive themselves, why should they not be deceived? A convenient train of reasoning which has been pursued in all countries these five thousand years about.

So where, when the sultan arrived in the British metropolis, should his highness put but at Pomeroy's Hotel in Great Grand Street, Grosvenor Square? He drove there straight from the terminus, and was received with marked distinction. One land need be a distinguished foreigner to be welcomed in Great Grand Street. As a rule, Pomeroy (proprietor, Mr. Pomeroy, sharp Swiss named Jean Baptiste Constant, the successor to the original proprietor; he having retired on a competency) only took princes and, equally as a rule, princes, when they came to town, were taken by their couriers to Pomeroy's hotel. Jean Baptiste Constant was married Monsieur now, and was supposed to be a naturalized British subject, and a stanch Protestant, for which did not prevent his entertaining the Sheik of the Soudan, who was a Mussulman, and who beheaths Mahomet as the false prophet of a pagan, and was with difficulty persuaded from celebrating his "grand custom" over a Scotch ball of black sheep in Grosvenor Square; besides any stray Romanist or Russo-Greek grandees who came that way;—Mr. J. B. Constant owed much of his success to his wife, who had been enjoyed to his extended connection among the useful class of traveling servants known as couriers, who, when out of an engagement, or off duty, were always sure of a hearty reception, a good cigar, and a glass of curaçoa, or other comforting cordial in the bar parlor. Nay, still more. The recommendations of an experienced member of the courier profession, one Franz Stimm by name, had procured for the Sultan Greyfaunt the services of the obsequious Franz, who had been for many years in the same service as Madame de Kergolay's butler lineage, and would own no blue blood but that of the Greyfaustis of Lancashire; but now that she was dead, and he had got her money, he thought there was no harm in hinting that he was the representative of a noble house from beyond the sea. Perhaps he found the Greyfaustis of Lancashire, like many other country families so noble, somewhat at a discount in London society, which, following the usual fashion, interested itself with what was passing on the extreme horizon in preference to that which was going on beneath its very nose. At all events, the lofty Edgar, when he was addressed as Viscount, did not meet the error with any great acrimony. His old companions called him Greyfaust; but many newly-found ones in cosmopolitan and diplomatic circles began to him, and asked him to dinner as De Kergolay. Under that title he was entered in Mr. J. B. Constant's books; and as De Kergolay he was inscribed much more legibly, and indeed, indelibly, in Mr. J. B. Constant's mind.

This, and to inquire of his English face and tongue, being accounted that which imperfectly educated persons are apt to term a "foreign swell," Edgar—you may call him so, if you will call him by either of his surnames indifferently —was naturally introduced to the Pilgrims' Club in Park Lane, at which, as every fashionable man ought to know, the ambassadors, the secretaries of legation, and the attachés accredited to the court of St. James's, mingle on a terribly unsocial footing with sundry illustrious Englishmen, whose qualifications as Pilgrims must be simply these: to have traveled ten thousand miles in a straight direction, and in a given line from the North Pole; to be faultless in the décarté, piquet, and short whist, and to belong to the cream of the cream of English society, both by birth and by right of possession.

There are always a good many candidates up at the Pilgrims' Club—where gentlemen's names are put down when they are infants in arms, with a view to their entering the club at their grand climacteric—but as failures in one of the three grand essential requisites are sometimes unavoidable, the rejection of candidates at the Pilgrims' Club (which is, I think, near the Piccadilly end of Park Lane) is by no means of rare occurrence. Indeed, they say there is more blackballing at the P. (the affectionate diminutive of the club) than at any other club in London: always excepting the Ostrich in Sandys Street, Decrest Square. There, you know, they play at Nameless Quib for Nine Points on the subject of suttee, and all but ostracized brave old Admiral Sindbad, because he was known to maintain that every man was without chunnee than with it. For distinctions mun be, it is plain, to keep society select —which would otherwise degenerate into a mere anarchical Odd Fellows' gathering of the most ungenteel persons, and it is a good and holy thing to be exclusive. Thus, as you see, the Pilgrims had secured the very cream of the cream in their English memberdom.

Well, and the foreigners. One must make allowances for foreigners, of course. If Baron Bunstoff, Minister Plenipotentiary from the Crim Tartary, had formerly been simply a Hebrew money-changer at Frankfort-on-the-Maine (the letters we used to have from him about the Imperial High Dutch tottery, and urging us forthwith to invest in that swindle, and win a seat on the Bourse, the title of Count, and the entire library of the late lamented Puffendorff?); if old Professor Stradivarius from Jena, the distinguished philologist and translator of the poems of Saadi into the Zummerezthire dialect, and the Post-Office London Directory of eighteen hundred and seventy-two into Syro-Chaldaic, was the son of a tripe-dealer at Magdeburg, and had, in early life, followed the humble trade of a tailor; and if the famous traveler, Mynheer Rolopius, Ph.D., R.G.S., etc., etc., had been assistant-waiter at a wild beast show (previously and occasionally varied by the beef-eater business, outside), a dealer in stuffed birds in the vicinity of Gooksecop, and the propagator of a sailors' boarding-house at Gibraltar, before he discovered the site of the lost city of Alesia, brought back the first genealogies of the Antediluvians in the great lawsuit of the ass's shadow, and made it manifest to the entire world that the wild Wawjagandas were the real human race, whom roast hippopotamus is procurable; and that they do knock out their front teeth to be the better able to whistle—if native singers—the savant and the illustrious strangers who were made free of the P., and nearly threw the waiters into fits by spitting on the carpet of the morning-room, were sometimes of mean extraction, and occasionally of coarse manners, and now and then humbug, the great principle of universalness was at least outwardly vindicated. Once a Pilgrim always a Pilgrim; and the gown and scrip and wallet become covered a multitude of sins.

Yes: the Sultan Greyfaust had found his proper groove in life, and became admirably. The groove not mounted with the most delicately-scented unguent: pommade divine, at least. It was a groove beginning very high up indeed in the social scale, and you slid down it, as down that famous One Tree Hill of antiquity, Arcenzo.

After a time Edgar left Pomeroy's Hotel. He did not complain of the costliness of its accommodation—I think a mutton-chop costs a guinea there, and a bottle of soda-water three-and-six-pence, and I know a one-horse brougham is two pounds ten an hour); but, intending to reside permanently in London, it was, of course, idle to remain in a hotel. So Mr. Constant, whom the sultan deigned to patronize in the most benignant manner, found for his illustrious guest a handsome suit of chambers in St. James's Place; supplied him with a perfect outfit of a washer-woman, who enameled shirts, iced white waistcoats, frosted pocket-handkerchiefs, and turned cravats into snow-flakes in the most beautiful manner; and, in addition, recommended him a body-servant—a very jewel of a body-servant—a young man by the name of Hummelbasen, said to be a distant relation of the proprietor of Pomeroy's, who shaved, dressed hair, varnished boots, compounded curious restoratives on the mornings after long dinners, found out the addresses of people whom he had seen but once in his life, and then only on the Serpentine's banks, played the guitar, and was worth his weight in gold generally.

Could there be a more fortunate youth than the Greyfaustis, with his heads, his fingers, his genius, his ready money, his pearl of a laundress, his jewel of a body-servant, and his cronies upon his card? Was there any lady entered at P. He often dined there. His election was considered certain, owing to the influence of Sir Theophrast d'Boy, that great collector of musical instruments, who is said to have nine of Father Schmidt's organ down at his place in Devonshire, and the original shell basket by the Harmonious Blacksmith in his smoking-room in Curzon Street. Some of the best houses in London were open to Edgar. Some of the prettiest faces in London smiled at him from carriage windows. "Oh king! live forever!" cries the Eastern adulator. The Italian Greyfaust would have been but very slightly incensed with any adulatory person, Oriental or otherwise, who informed him that he, the sultan, was destined to live forever.

TWILIGHT IN CAMP.

THE twilight, like a hooded nun
Comes silent-footed o'er the hills;
The vesper-chanting whip-poor-wills
Seem glad the heated day is done.

Glad, for they sing—yet, in their song
There is a sweetly plaintive tone,
As if to birds there could be known
With love regret, or pain, or wrong.

They call and answer from afar;
They fill the silence with a name;
Night after night it is the same,
As is the shining of a star.

'Tis thus to those I love I call
Through days of absence, and I hear
By answering lips my name made dear—
Or think I hear, if that is all.

And when the twilight hour is come,
Whate'er of care the day has brought,
My heart grows patient in the thought
My name is called by those at home.

NEAR PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA, July, 1864.

LITTLE DILVER'S TRUDGE.

AN April breeze was stirring the drifts of bloom on a Western prairie. Away as far as the eye could reach in direct succession the green grass and blossom rolled, and the breeze as it rustled among them caught the fresh breath of their fragrance on its wings. Just upon the verge of the prairie, nestled like some great white bird among the tall locusts and stout black walnuts that shaded its garden, was a house. It was a large house, with a green tracery of vines about its windows and porches, and a perfect wilderness of gay blossoms and creeping plants about it. In the great doorway sat an old lady with soft white hair folded under the newest of muslin caps, and her hands, as a fling her spectacles between them, clasped upon her knee.

A little lower down, seated upon the steps, were four others—two stalwart young men, with brown faces and earnest eyes, a young girl, and a child with a face like daybreak; such innocence, and freshness, and tender beauty. Its flaxen, waving, serious eyes; such a little sensitive scarlet mouth; such gravity just now upon the young features.

"You will remember, then, Dilver," said one of the young men, continuing a lustering conversation with the child, "that just as Aunt Fanny is Mr. Forsyth's wife, you are mine?"

"Dilver is a stubborn name," said with the utmost seriousness, while the young girl, blushing brightly and threatening him with her little hand, exclaimed, "Ike, Ike!"

"I'll leave it to Forsyth if it's not the truth," said the young man roguishly, as he dodged the pretty hand.

"If it's not true it is almost," Forsyth said, lightly: and then, drawing nearer the girl, he added, in a low voice, while his friend pretended oblivious ness,

"I wish it was quite true, Fanny. I wish you would be my wife before I go. It would take away half the pain of parting to know that I left a wife behind me, instead of a pretty girl who will find plenty of beaux to help her forget me."

"If she could do that she wouldn't deserve to be your wife," said the girl, gently, yet with a tender sweetness that thrilled into the listener.

"Aunt Fanny," said little Dilver, "if Mr. Forsyth dits sick, or any body tuts his arm off where he's doing, shall you do and take care of him, and make his arm drow adin?"

The girl's soft eyes filled with tears, and she gave a little sob as she turned partly away from the child.

Forsyth's hand covered hers as it trembled upon her lap, and he answered with a pretty laugh, Fanny, and then if the worst happens you can come to me, I mean," he exclaimed, as he saw how her cheek whitened.—"Hang it, how clumsy I am!" And rising suddenly, "Fanny, won't you come out in the grove with me? I want to see if—"

The remainder of the speech was lost as the girl rose, as much to hide her pale and tearful face, and let him lead her away.

"What was it he wanted to see?" questioned the child, her lip quivering.

"Only if the spring weren't dry," said Warren, tragically.

"Springs don't ever dit dry," said Dilver, reproachfully—"not hardly ever. Aunt Fanny told me so."

Forsyth and Fanny were married the morning before the departure of the two young men for the seat of the war, and while young Forsyth held his sweetly pale bride at home, little Dilver and Sir Warren Hastings, and sobbed out her childish grief at his departure.

The child was very fond of him, and he of her; and when he had gone she refused to be comforted for hours.

Fanny sat in her chamber drenched in tears, or stole about the house with a very pale face and red eyes, and Dilver held herself in the same recess at the head of the table, and cried her warm upon her apron—the very one that had been put on clean to kill Warren good-by in.

The young Hastings's name was mentioned afterward also called herself, with great assumption of dignity, "a little wife."

The family, much amused, humored her in the fancy, and being a singularly bright and engaging little creature, she, when she were fond of a child, found her small talk about it very entertaining.

She was a comical little imitator too, and whatever Fanny said about Sarah, Dilver very gravely repeated concerning Warren.

One day came very sad news. Frank Forsyth had been wounded and was likely to die. A telegram came summoning his young wife. Mrs. Loring was very unwilling that Fanny should go. She was ill and tired, and it seemed to her a terrible thing for a young creature like Fanny to venture upon such a journey alone, for there was no one to go with her.

But Fanny was firm and resolved, and she went. The very day succeeding her departure came very similar news concerning Warren Hastings: though not so directly, or from any reliable source. It was merely a rumor, but chanced to meet Dilver's ears. She heard it—had—not a serious effect, for children often adopt such fancies—had taken upon her to expect that whatever happened to Aunt Fanny was to happen to her also; and even when Aunt Fanny's departure she had asked constantly if no "dood" should come for dear Sir Warren.

Now she assumed at once that she had received her telegram, and (like Aunt Fanny) announced her intention of going to "Rashin'ton" immediately to take care of him.

The family smiled, and found much amusement, as heretofore, in watching and listening to her.

She had a little red morocco cabas that some one had given her. This she "packed" in very womanly fashion, and with much anxious consultation with "dramma."

Her mother—two years dead—had been Fanny's sister and Mrs. Loring's favorite.

"Dramma," with much prideful enjoyment, advised and was consulted to the child's infinite contentment, and the packing was concluded after the most approved fashion. Of course "dramma" and the rest thought no farther till Dilver bade them all "dood-by" very goody-by, and started on her journey toward her sick soldier-boy.

At this point it was found necessary to resort to more stringent measures than something failed. In short, to the mortal offending of her dignity, Miss Dilver had to be returned to the house by force of arms.

She was too proud to cry, though she struggled some, and finally submitted, or seemed to submit, to be taken in silent state.

She was a quiet child always, and nobody missed her thoughtfulness for some days—somewhat, perhaps, they did not see her about, that she had crept out, and was traveling through the tall prairie grass as fast as her little feet could go.

When it really appeared that she was nowhere to be found about the house or grove, and when furthermore the absence of her little shaker and the packed cabas seemed to indicate that she had persisted in her childish resolve, two of her uncles sought out in their teens—were not suspected, where

"SUNSHINE."

"SUNSHINE!" I love darkness best;
Day is hard and darkness tender:
Darkness soothes the aching breast;
Day but mocks it with his splendor.
Wherefore bid me sing of light?
Me, the mournful child of Night.

Ah! my hand upon the string
Wanders vainly pleading:
Echoes of the tragic wake
Lavish bloom and languid grove,
Sharp-cut mountain, dreamy lake,
Glorious azure, glowing love:
Would that I could catch a ray
For my heart and for my lay.

Never here!—This pallid sky
Makes the very soul to shiver.
To my brown South let me fly,
Let me find once more its fever;
Let me bury there my pain.
Live and love and sing again.

GEN. SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN.

WE give on pages 556 and 557 illustrations of General SHERMAN'S campaign in front of Atlanta. The sketch on page 556 represents a portion of the BATTLE OF ERZA'S CHURCH, fought July 28. General LOGAN, after M'PHERSON'S death, assumed temporary command of the Army of the Tennessee. This army was, after the battle of the 22d, transferred from its position on the east side of Atlanta to the extreme right of our army on the west side, threatening the Macon Road. The movement was the most rapid of a campaign which, for the expeditious movements of troops over vast distances, will be celebrated in the history of the war. The Fifteenth (LOGAN'S own) Corps had hardly got in position on the night before it was attacked by 20,000 of the troops under General STEWART and HOOD, the latter commencing shortly after one o'clock, continuing with exceeding fierceness until nearly dark. At the last rout our men had no shelter of any kind, but their keen appreciation of a breast-work was shown by the fact that before the fight ended a rail-work sufficient for considerable shelter had been constructed. The battle was fought entirely by the Fifteenth Corps, and the loss sustained by them is probably the largest that is known—full eight hundred killed and wounded. Over 700 rebel dead were buried by our men, and the reports from the rebels acknowledge a loss of over 5000 men. Among the dead wounded were Generals LOGING, STEWART, S. D. LEE, BROWN, and GIBSON.

The sketch shows especially that part of the battle in which WOOD'S division was engaged, on the left, near the railroad. HARROW'S brigade of this corps, and MORGAN L. SMITH the right. After the assault on WOOD had thus signally failed an attack was made on SMITH with some severity. SMITH was nearly flanked, and several of his batteries were captured; but none of these were taken of the field except two howitzers, as we see from the position occupied by the rebels. At three o'clock WOOD reinforced SMITH, and the line of work taken by the rebels was recaptured. The scene from General SHERMAN'S stand-point was one of exceeding grandeur. The lines were so close together that they seemed to be only separated by the work for which they were battling.

On page 557 we give a picture of EZRA'S CHURCH itself. On the same page is another sketch connected with this battle, giving a view of DEAD BROOK, the scene of a portion of the engagement. A third sketch represents General SHERMAN'S headquarters near Decatur, July 19, before the battles of the 20th, 22d, and 28th. These quarters were at the same time used by Dr. SHIPPEN, surgeon of HASCALL'S division, Twenty-third Corps, for the purposes of a hospital.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR AUGUST.

THE engraving on page 557 gives the Paris fashions for the month of August. Although away of wear, these light costumes are not without their peculiar convenience, and, to be altogether graceful, require care in the selection and arrangement of the colors for ornament. In addition to the ordinary disposition to patronize fashion, elegance, and bargain, great favor is being bestowed upon white muslin dresses of the first quality, trimmed fantastically with bands of silk dipped in the colors—according to the caprices of the modiste. Indeed light dresses generally, ornamented with silk strings attached at just remembered, or with very small passementerie trimmings, enjoy a vogue altogether undisputed, and really merit the patronage they meet with even in the highest quarters.

The head-dresses and bonnets worn at this season are extremely varied in style and shape. The chapeau Watteau (a la Watteau is shown in the illustrations) is one of the most fashionable of the round descriptions, but the Spanish bonnet, of white tulle-small, round, and with or without bavolet—completes, à rarer, the white muslin costume just alluded to. The bavolet is usually replaced by a bow in tulle or by a garland of small flowers gracefully arranged.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Walking Dress.—Rose and palest of gray foulard, with three rows of dark violet silk and passementerie trimming on the skirt: round the edge of the jacket, across the shoulders, and on the cuffs, a single row of similar trimming is adopted with a most pleasing effect. The small round chapeau is in white tulle bouillonné, the border being replaced by a large tulle bow; orange bow and ribbons.

Fig. 2. Evening Dress.—Very pale yellow alpaca robe, ornamented with silk embroidery in several shades of velvet. The skirt especially presents a very pretty and novel appearance, and the dress is completed by the Mediæval vest, and the manifold chemisettes, of which only a small portion is seen above the black silk plastron edged with velvet. The head-dress is the coiffure Rubens, of Valenciennes lace, with black and violet velvet bow in front.

Fig. 3. Walking Dress for a Young Lady.—Light stone-colored tulle, the peplum and robe being of uniform color, but trimmed with pink silk ornaments scattered. The peplum is relatively more abundantly decorated than the skirt. Tuscan chapeau Windsor, almost covered with eagles' feathers and with strings, the latter placed en front.

INTERESTING ITEMS.

THE ancient Greeks and Romans had some very curious modes of taking bees. They imagined that they were sometimes originated from the putrefaction of animals, especially oxen; that the slugs (so they called them) were produced from the brain, or from the soldier part, and the remainder of the swarm—the proficuum populeus—from the flesh. They would actually given a receipt for making a swarm out of a dead ox.

Another dated error was that bees were generated in the blossoms and among the leaves of particular plants, the olive being one—a more ridiculous one than the other, certainly—and that the baby-bees were from thence collected by the old ones.

A still more wonderful story, if possible, is told us by LAURIA CALPURNIUS, in his agricultural treatise. "There is no Russia," written somewhere about the year A. D. 60. He gravely informs us that bees which have been killed for the sake of obtaining their honey may be advantageously kept in spring, and then be placed in the sun among unrolled figs—and this when they will come to life again! This is vitality, and no mistake.

THE New York theatres open for the fall and season for their audiences a new wonder. An optician in Paris has succeeded in producing the effect of living drinking on the stage, with its peculiar blue color, by means of a concave mirror, in the proper position of the two cylinders of a powerful battery nearly in contact. When the light is thrown upon the mirror, reflecting the ghost, according to a brief interval, a dazzling beam of light is thrown upon the stage precisely like a living drinking of blood. It is also succeeded in producing a rainbow, by means of an electric spectrum, which is used with effect in the opera of Moses.

THE Roman female corpses were painted. So are the bodies of the inhabitants of the Sandwich Islands and those of New Zealand. When a New Zealand chieftain dies, says Mr. POLACK, the women cut themselves about the arms with muscle-shells and let blood profusely, because they say the departed ghosts, and especially the ghosts, are exceedingly partial to this beverage. The head is adorned with the most elaborate tattooing. The abdomen, the head is anointed with shark-oil, and tied at the crown with a flax-lace. The face is painted in the most elaborate style with patches of white down from the sea-fowl's breast, and the cheeks are tattooed with the spiral. The corpse is encircled with a garland of pink and white flowers of the country. Last, the body is wrapped in fine mats around the body, which is placed upright. Skulls of enemies slain in battle are suspended in the hut. Relics of ancestors, dug up for the occasion, are placed on platforms in the hall. A number of spears are stacked near by, and the chieftain company. His wives and concubines drown themselves in the river, and are buried with their husbands in state three or four days. The priests flourish round the body, waving fans, to keep off the flies, and the obsequies. The pile, or funeral song, is then chanted, which is the history of the departed chief of the Zealanders, very much resembling the service, or funeral song of the Romans. At last the body is burned, with the favorite mats, muskets, trinkets, etc., of the deceased.

THE language of the eye is very hard to counterfeit. You can read all the eye of your companion while you talk, whether your argument hits him, though his tongue is silent about it. A mind-reader requires no company: he has heard no important remark, but if in sympathy with his subject, he will understand it. He knows it as he has been flowing to him through the eye. There are eyes that are always calculating, always thinking of themselves; others are timid, and deep wells that non mind fall into; over eyes are quick, and others are sleepy. There is much notice. "There are asking eyes and asserting eyes, eyes full of light, eyes—some of great—that reflect none."

M. DANCIN, in a paper read to the Paris Academy of Sciences, has directed attention to the importance of water as a cause of death. He has calculated that a person lying on a lean horse, from whose diet per day 3 pounds of oats were withdrawn, and 3 pounds of hay with abundance of water, into which a pound of bran was put. In the course of seven days this horse had increased 20 pounds in weight. In the same regiment an exceedingly fat mare, that could hardly be led, was fed upon 3 pounds of hay in advance of sixty litres of water per day to fifteen, and in one week lost 30 pounds, without any diarrhœa.

THE spire of Strasburg Cathedral had hitherto secured to FRANCE the distinction of possessing the loftiest structure among church buildings in Europe. But now the Cologne pinnacle is destined to be overtopped by the tower in process of construction at St. Stephen's, Vienna. The latter rests the Austrian spire had only reached an altitude of 420 feet, while the Austrian architect contemplates 500. Even an addition of 75 feet to its rival on the Danube puts an end to the boasted pre-eminence of the Rhine. The scaffold being now, Strasbourg 440, Vienna 454, majority for Vienna 75 feet with a few inches. FRENCH, however, has got Mont Blanc.

A FORMAL but most essential rule makes letters once posted the property of the Postmaster-General, and are delivered as addressed, and they must not be given up to letters on any pretense whatever. Not only is the requests of this kind related to us, we are likely soon to be. We have received numerous communications at our office and expressed a fear that he had inclosed two letters by mistake, and that the mistake had not been published. It appeared, from the account which he reluctantly gave, that he refused to publish the mistake, but his position and prospects depended upon his getting his letters, and he could not do it. Accordingly, he adopted the expedient which he had adopted to serve two mercantile houses in the city of Baltimore, whose business clashed at every point. Another case occurred in which a fast young gentleman was engaged in a most delicate private correspondence with two young ladies at the same time, and by the folly of fortune he got the letters mixed, which he had written at the same sitting. . . . Writing in time, we have not published the mistake, because the master had a letter put into his hand through the office-holder, together with the following message, delivered with great emphasis: "Here's a letter; she wants it to-day, and has set it on. You must get it to her, or I have to have her hear; and she's courted by another fellow that's in the mail, and wants to get another he's going to have her or not."

THE difference between an actor and his manager gave rise to an odd scene the other night at the Théâtre des Variétés, Paris. "Monsieur Bressant, you are a fool!" "Bête, M'. Delsarte, who was playing the chief rôle, addressed himself in his part to the manager. "Monsieur, me to interrupt myself an instant, and tell you something that you know as well as myself. Now, I ask you, have no my engagement for my bread, and as I have not deserved the treatment I expect to receive, I shall leave you in this case locked more to himself than the public. This is my answer. If you agree to it, you will be pleased to applaud me: those who are of a different opinion can hiss." "Monsieur Bressant, you are a fool!" And he went on with his part of the haughty baron.

THE following singular event occurred just after Grant's severe battles north of the James. A sergeant had been engaged playing upon a number of bean-boards the names of members of his regiment who had been killed in the late fight. There was one board in excess, and in a spirited vein he placed with a lead-pencil his own name upon it, and the date of his demise, June 20, as his term of service had then expired and he was about to leave for home. A day or two after, while bidding his companions farewell, he was struck in the breast by a 30-pounder Parrot and instantly killed. The very bean-board he had inscribed his own name upon was found among the others, over his grave, which, with date, correctly marks his resting place.

A DEVICE paper informs us that an English-built yacht, the Pearl, now belonging to a French gentleman, has come into that port, and is expected to be soon fitted out for exhibiting a number of relics from the Alabama, picked up after the sinking of the Pearl was in part also a spectator. Among these objects saved is a brass gun-lock, belonging to one of the steamers, and containing, doubtless for his own interests in the way of preservation, a complete list of the vessels destroyed or captured by the Alabama. This list, begun on the 5th of September, 1862, and closes on the 19th of April, 1864, will, curiously enough, enumerate sixty-six captures, corresponding to the number of Captain SEMMES'S circumnavigations. Seven vessels burned as much as possible, forty-seven so burned, and ten as sold; and the work of destruction is estimated as from eight to ten millions of dollars.

THE LITTLE HERO.

"HERE'S news for ye, Jake, and work to do!" said a tall, rough-looking fellow, who had ridden up a moment before, and throwing himself from his horse came up to the bar, where Jake Forman sat cleaning a shot-gun. Jake looked up lazily.

"What is what is it now?"

"The Colonel's despatches! news that that darned currier 'll pass this way some time to-night. It's most likely he'll come by Rocky Run; but he may some t'other way, as you're to watch and stop him, if you kin afore he gets to the Forks. Take a couple of men with you—Bill Jones and Sam Hall, and make it sure this time. If he carries the news the Colonel thinks he does, it 'll be worth money to you to take him."

"All right, Ben; I'll be sure my eye's back's open for the Colonel's quarters, you may be sure o' that."

A bright-looking boy of some ten years was sitting near by, playing with a bit of pine with a rusty jack-knife. The new-comer looked at him curiously.

"That's not your boy, Jake?"

Jake laughed. "I reckon not, I hain't a Yankee myself."

"And the boy is. I kin see that stickin' out plain'r'n the nose on yer face." "Yes, and he's got more grit'n most of'em. Ef he hadn't held a never been yere. He belonged to one o' them fellers we surprised down at Pleasant Hill. His father was took prisoner and sent off to Richmond, and some of us goin' next day to where the camp'in place had been, he found this yer boy where they had left him. He's as we would get well, and so we let him, and we hes to him, though he's a Yankee as you'll find. I kind o' like him though."

"Gritty, eh?" said the man, stepping toward the boy. "See here, sonny, how you say Hurrah for Jeff Davis, or I'll put this through ye quicker'n lightnin'!" flashing his sword in the boy's face.

The little fellow looked up from his work at this time, and his cheeks were flushing. He looked at the man an instant, perhaps he saw that he was only trying to frighten him. Taking off his ragged hat, he swung it over his head,

"Hurrah for the Stars and Stripes!" he said, in her voice, but clear.

The man's face darkened. He locked as though he were going to strike him, but Remam interposed.

"Don't bother the boy, Bill; come away. We'll

The other man laughed. "I wasn't goin' to touch him," he said, and went down the walk. Jake following him, stopped for some moments to talk with him beyond the boy's hearing.

But Will had heard enough. Some poor fellow was to be waylaid and killed and shot for his despatches. The boy, young as he was, had had already experience in life beyond his years. His father had been living freely with his wife when he was quite out, and of a family of six his father and he had alone escaped alive from the persecution which raged around poor his country. Here before him were two men slain, and his mother had died of grief. He knew what these men meant when they talked about waylaying a courier. "If I wasn't such a little boy," he said to himself, "I could do something: I wonder if I couldn't say way. The man said some time to-night, and I know where the Forks is. I'll do it, I'll do it, if they come to shoot me for it." He wandered about, thinking it over, anxious and unhappy all day.

When night came he complained of a headache, and made it an excuse to go to bed early. Once in the little room where he slept he raised the window softly, and crept out over a shed roof. Once he started off as fast as he could go in the direction of the Forks.

They were all too busy getting Jake ready to miss him; but he feared lest they should discover his absence, and suspect where he had gone. His heart beat like a hammer along the road, and he imagined in every sound that he heard Jake upon his track.

He reached the Forks, however, safely. Beyond this the road—rough and scarcely more than a bridle-path—branched off, and diverged into various nearly undistinguishable ways.

It would not answer for him to remain here, but where to wait and watch for which of these ways perceptible ways would the expected courier come?

Fortunately, about half a mile on the woods were more open and the growth low. There was a high, bright moon. "If only Jake will stay at the Forks and watch," thought the boy, as he ran on toward the more open ground. That reached, he climbed a tree, and began his watch, listening at the same time for Jake and his men.

Not a very easy watch you may imagine that —every young sense on the alert, and so many shadows among the scattering trees to deceive his eye.

Suddenly he heard the trump of a horse, and almost instantly saw him—it must be he, he thought—a man alone on horseback, and riding at that pace.

Almost in the same moment he imagined he heard some one approaching in the opposite direction. The carrier, if it were he, was riding unsuspiciously on, trusting perhaps to the speed of the animal he rode to take him past any danger that lurked.

Will was coming down from his perch as quickly as possible. He was quite sure that Jake and his men were waiting not far away; the courier was riding on unconscious of it—passing directly under the tree in which the boy was, when, calculating the distance with an accuracy born of the emergency, Will swung himself lightly down, and —strange and providential happening—landed upon the very back of the animal the courier rode. The horse plunged a little; the man, too accustomed to danger of all kinds—for these couriers are a very brave and tried set of men—to lose his presence of mind made no sound.

"Turn back quickly," whispered the boy; "there's danger ahead!"

The man did not hesitate a single instant. With an instinct sharpened by long experience he recognized the warning as worthy of notice, strangely as it had come, and wheeling his horse suddenly to the right, he rode at top-speed to a thicker portion of the wood, and, skirting along it, soon distanced Jake and his men, though they followed him. Upon discovering his change of route several shots were fired after him, but ineffectually, and he eventually reached his destination, bearing the boy with him.

Will became the hero of the hour.

News came to him soon after of the death of his father in prison, and the boy was left the sole survivor of his family.

He begged to stay with the army, and the regiment into whose hands he had fallen at first were too fond and proud of him to send him away. So he staid as drummer-boy.

GARIBALDI'S WIFE.

THE cure of a wife and family seemed wholly incompatible with the circumstances surrounding a man like Garibaldi, whose life was devoted to the cause of liberty—of fighting for it, and of oppressed peoples—however successful he might be in his efforts, he would never have the leisure that was required for the father of a family. Fate, however, decided otherwise.

Finding himself completely isolated, and standing alone in the world, and from being at his friends, who were drowned at the wreck of the Rio Pardo, he was one day, while on the lake of Santa Catherina, sitting on the deck of the Rio Pardo Imperio, and looking toward the shore, when suddenly he saw, at a farm-house situated on the neighboring hill of La Barra, a group of four girls busily engaged in domestic duties. They were all remarkable for beauty; but one in particular arrested his attention by her unconscious grace and loveliness.

He was still watching them when he received an order to go on shore. Immediately on landing he directed his steps to the house, and was admitted by the owner, whom he happened to know slightly, having met him once before.

The singular visit which had prompted him to go to the house was to address the girl whom he had so admired. On seeing her he immediately besought her to become his wife. The girl, it seems, conceived an affection as warm and as sudden as he had felt for her; and after the lapse of a few short days they were man and wife.

The surname of this lovely Brazilian girl of the province of Santa Catharina, was Anita, under such peculiarly romantic circumstances, the wife of Garibaldi, has never been revealed. In all the subsequent of her hero she is alone mentioned by her Christian name of Anita.

She seems to have been a brunette of a rich, warm complexion, with black and piercing eyes; of a beautifully rounded figure, and a sort of queenly majesty of deportment; active, daring, high-spirited, and in every respect worthy of being the companion for life of such a man as Garibaldi.

Many anecdotes are told of her courage.

Scarcely had she become the wife of her hero, and had gone to sea with him, than they were threatened with an attack by the enemy, who were far superior in force in numbers. Garibaldi wanted Anita to land, but she steadily refused to accede to his request, and, as from the bottom of his heart he admired her courage and was proud of it, he did not urge his point, but allowed her to do as she pleased.

Not only did Anita remain on board the vessel, but she staid on deck during the whole of the engagement, and even took a part in it, inspiriting the crew to acts of desperate courage by her own example. Snatching a carbine from the hands of a man who had fallen dead close to her feet, she kept up a repeated fire on the enemy.

During the engagement, which lasted five hours, Garibaldi, as was his wont, experienced the greatest shock he ever felt in his life.

Anita, in the heat of the battle, standing on the deck and encouraging a sailor, was inspiriting the men to deeds of valor when she was knocked down by the wind of a cannon-ball that had killed two men standing close by her. Garibaldi, who was springing forward to her, thinking that he would find her a corpse, when she rose to her feet, covered with the blood of the men who had fallen close to her, but quite unhurt.

Garibaldi begged her to go below and remain there until the engagement was over.

"I will go below," was her reply, "but only to drive out the cowards who are walking there;" for only a few seconds before she had seen three men leave the deck and hurry rapidly down the hatchway, so to get out of danger of the showers of bullets that was sweeping the deck. And going below she immediately after reappeared, driving before her the three men, overcome with shame that they should have been surpassed in courage by a woman.

Garibaldi himself has said that Anita, whose heart beat as much as his own for the cause of the people, took part in fights as an "amusement," and "as a simple variation to the general monotony of camp life."

At the battle fought at the place called Coritibani she could not content herself with being, as her husband desired, a mere spectator of the combat. She went to the baggage-waggons with the view of seeing that the soldiers were properly supplied with cartridges. The constant fire that was kept up by the Garibaldians against their enemy made her suspect that their ammunition would fail them if they were not constantly supplied with it. Accordingly she went to the principal scene of the engagement. She had not been there long when she saw about twenty or thirty of the Brazilian horse coming down upon the baggage-train at full gallop.

As she was both a good rider and well mounted she might have taken to flight and saved herself; but she was of too heroical a spirit to do so. She remained on the spot, encouraging the soldiers to fire upon the Imperialists as soon as they came within range. A volley emptied several saddles; but the wound was mortal in their charge, and Anita, being surrounded, was called upon to surrender.

Instead of doing so she clapped spurs to her horse, and dashed through the enemy's lines with the intention of joining her husband; and was galloping off when she was struck by a pistol-shot through her hat, which carried away some of her hair without injuring her skull.

And perhaps she would have effected her escape had the horse not been shot through the head, causing it to fall dead on the ground, and throw her heavily on the turf. She was then forced to surrender, and was taken to the Colonel of the enemy.

Heroically brave in danger, she became, if possible, still more sublime in calmness. In presence of the commander of the Imperialist forces she would not allow him to speak with contumely and disdain of the soldiers of his Grandee.

When judiciously used, BRANDRETH'S PILLS seldom fail to cure, because they purify the blood. If we are sick from any cause, we owe it to ourselves to use 'his remedy which Providence places within our reach.

Read the following in proof:

NEW YORK, July 8, 1851.

DR. BRANDRETH:

SIR: A boy of mine was subject to fits from his infancy —he case was considered hopeless by the doctors, who thought he would be unable to learn for life. After they had given him up, I was recommended to try your pills and, without much faith, did try them, using them according to your printed directions. Four years ago I commenced giving them to him, and, to my great joy and relief, he has had but one SEVERE ONE of his affliction since. I consider him now perfectly cured.

The extraordinary benefit they did him makes me always recommend them to my friends, and I would be glad that everybody knew their value. The cure was as near as possible: he would have been helpless and almost unsteady unfit for any kind of business, from the length and severity of each attack—often lasting a whole night, and leaving him for two or three days afterward entirely prostrate from weakness. Every kind of treatment was also severely applied that was professionally advised. You may therefore judge what good reason I have for letting you have this statement in acknowledgment for the benefit received, and in the hope of letting those who are in the like hesitating under similar circumstances, have my testimony in confirmation of the reliability of the other certificate, and perfect confidence, like myself, in the value of the pills.

Yours respectfully,
JOHN WEBB, No. 15 Beekman St.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

The Secretary of the Treasury gives notice that subscriptions will be received for Coupon Treasury Notes, payable three years from Aug. 15th, 1864, with semi-annual interest at the rate of seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum—principal and interest both to be paid in lawful money.

These Notes will be convertible at the option of the holder at maturity, into six per cent. gold-bearing bonds, payable not less than five nor more than twenty years from their date, as the Government may elect. They will be issued in denominations of $50, $100, $500, $1000, and $5000, and all subscriptions must be for fifty dollars or some multiple of fifty dollars.

The Notes will be transmitted to the owners free of transportation charges at once after the receipt of the original Certificates of Deposit as they can be prepared.

As the Notes draw interest from August 15, persons making deposits subsequent to that date will be entitled to interest accrued from date of note to date of deposit.

Parties depositing twenty-five thousand dollars and upward for these Notes at any one time will be allowed a commission of one quarter of one per cent., which will be paid by the Treasury Department upon the receipt of a bill for the amount, certified to by the officer with whom the deposit was made. No deductions for commissions must be made from the deposits.

Special Advantages of this Loan.

IT IS A NATIONAL SAVINGS BANK, offering a higher rate of interest than any other, and the best security. Any savings bank which pays its depositors in U. S. Notes considers that it is paying in the best circulating medium in the country, and it can not pay in any thing better, for its own assets are either in Government securities or in notes or bonds payable in Government paper.

It is equally convenient as a temporary or permanent investment. The notes can always be sold for within a fraction of their face and accumulated interest, and are the best security with banks as collateral for discounts.

Convertible into a Six per cent. 5-20 Gold Bond.

In addition to the very liberal interest on the notes for three years, this privilege of conversion is now worth about three per cent. per annum, for the current rate for 5-20 Bonds is not less than eight per cent. premium, before the war the premium on six per cent. U. S. stocks was over twenty per cent. It will be seen that the actual profit on this loan, at the present market rate, is not less than ten per cent. per annum.

Its Exemption from State or Municipal Taxation.

But aside from all the advantages we have enumerated, a special Act of Congress exempts all Bonds and Treasury Notes from local taxation. This exemption, when appreciation is worth about two per cent. per annum, according to the rate of taxation in various parts of the country.

It is believed that no security can offer so great inducements to lenders as those issued by the Government. In all other forms of indebtedness, the faith or ability of private parties, or stock companies, or separate communities, is only pledged for payment, while the whole property of the country is held to secure the discharge of all the obligations of the United States.

While the Government offers the most liberal terms for its Loan, it believes that the very strongest appeal will be to the loyalty and patriotism of the people.

Duplicate certificates will be issued for all deposits. The party depositing must write upon the original certificate the denomination of notes required, and whether they are to be issued in blank or payable to order. When so endorsed it must be left with the officer receiving the deposit, to be forwarded to the Department.

SUBSCRIPTIONS WILL BE RECEIVED by the Treasurer of the United States, at Washington, the several Assistant Treasurers and designated Depositaries, and by all National Banks which are depositaries of public money, and

ALL RESPECTABLE BANKS AND BANKERS throughout the country will give further information and AFFORD EVERY FACILITY TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Important to Subscribers.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY will find upon the wrapper of each Number a Statement of account. The figures on the direction-label, following the Name show the Number with which the Subscription EXPIRES, as noted on our books. Every Subscriber may thus ascertain whether he has received the proper credit for his remittances, and when to renew his Subscription. In renewing Subscriptions, Subscribers are particularly requested to name the NUMBER with which the New Subscription should commence; they will thus avoid receiving duplicates of any Number.
It is desirable that a Renewal should be received a few weeks BEFORE the expiration of the former Subscription, in order that our books may be kept properly adjusted. Attention to this request will prevent many of the errors which annoy both Publishers and Subscribers.

A Word to our Fair Readers.—Health the basis of Beauty.—Pimples, blotches, and all skin diseases, each clear complexion is not only essential to female loveliness, but it is equally an outward evidence of health—while sallowness, pimples, and all cutaneous eruptions are indicative of a disturbed condition of the stomach and liver. Upon these depend the famous aperient and tonic known as Holloway's Pills, not with a directness, precision, and rapidity unparalleled in Medical Science, while the Ointment purges the vesicles of the skin, and imparts a brilliancy and roseate hue to their delicate envelope. All who value health and beauty should beware of tampering with cosmetics, as they are not only pernicious but highly dangerous to health.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN—COUNCIL OF WAR HELD AT GENERAL WOOD'S HEAD-QUARTERS.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 566.]

READING ON THE RAIL FOR CHICAGO.

ANOTY seventeen years ago Mr. HOSEA BIGLOW, of Jaalam, contributed some sprightly verses to the Boston Courier of those days (not of these). They were afterward published, with others not less lively, in a convenient volume, edited by HOSEA BIGLOW, A.M., which has latterly been included in the works of JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL, doubtless for reasons satisfactory to Mr. BIGLOW and his editor. There is one poem in the collection called "The Debate in the Senate," which, as Mr. CALHOUN is his hero—who was, speaking humanly, the real author of this war—we have thought might be a subject of fruitful meditation by delegates upon their way to Chicago. They will remember that General JACKSON, who used to be good Democratic authority, said that the fiercest agitation would be the next excuse of the secessionists. Nor will they forget that Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS, in his conversation with Colonel JACQUES and Mr. GILMORE, has just confirmed the General's prophecy. The younger delegates to Chicago, who are pondering compromise or reunion upon the bottom of the disciples of Mr. CALHOUN, may not be unwilling to be reminded that General JACKSON was always sorry that he did not hang Mr. CALHOUN.

THE DEBATE IN THE SENNIT—(1848).
SOT TO A SUBET HYEME.

"Here we stun' on the Constitution, by thunder!
It's a fact if wich she's bustin' up right smart.
For how could we trample on't so, I wonder,
Ef 't wern't that it's ollers under our hoofs?"
Sez John C. Calhoun, sez he:—
"Human rights haint no more
Right to come on this floor,
No more'n the man in the moon," sez he.

"The North haint no kind o' bisness with nothin',
An' you're no like how much bother it saves;
We slant more riled by their frettin' an' foolin',
We're used to hyrin' the string on our slaves."
Sez John C. Calhoun, sez he:—
Sez Mister Footh,
"I should like to shoot
The hull crew, by the great horn spoon!" sez he.

"Freedom's Keystone is Slavery, that there's no doubt on,
It's suthin'eth'ut's—whu' d' ye call it?—divine,—
An' the slaves that we sliers make the most out on Air them nerth o' Mason an' Dixon's line."
Sez John C. Calhoun, sez he:—
"For all that," sez Mangum,
"Would be better to hang 'em,
An' so git red on 'em soon," sez he.

"The man ought' to labor an' we lay on softes,
They're the critters that 's used to spread Freedom's area;
It puts all the cunnicest on us in office,
An' restless our Maker's ongrateful idee,"!
Sez John C. Calhoun, sez he:—
"That's ex plain," sez Cass,
"But then some on's an ass,
It's ez clear ez the sun is at noon," sez he.

"Now don't go to say I'm the friend of oppression,
But keep all your spare breath for coolin' your broth.
For I allow there comes at least forty my impression
To make cussed free with the rights o' the North,"
Sez John C. Calhoun, sez he:—
"I'm, me know o' Minn,—
"The perfection o' bliss
Is to skinnuh' that same old coon," sez he.

"Slavery's a thing that depends on complexion—
It's God's law that fetters on black skins don't chafe:
Ef brains went to settle it (horrid reflection)
Wich of our cranks hain't ollered to rule?"
Sez John C. Calhoun, sez he:—
Sez Mister Hannegan,
Afore he began sich,
"That exception is quite opportoon," sez he.

"Gen'ule Case, Sir, you mestn't be twitchin' your collar;
Your mark's quite clear to the dot on your forrid
At the North we don't make no distinctions o' color;
You can take a lick at our shoes when you please,"
Sez John C. Calhoun, sez he:—
Sez Mister Jarnagin,
"They're more'n I'm fit for to larn spin,
They oil on 'em know the old toun," sez he.

"The slavery question ain't no ways bewilderin'.
North an' South hev one int'rest, it's plain to a gleaner,
Northern men, mud' yer patriarchs, don't sell their children,
But they do sell themselves, of they git a good chance,"
Sez John C. Calhoun, sez he:—
Sez Athertun here,
"This is gittin' severe,
I wish I could dive like a loon," says he.

"I'll break up the Union, this talk about freedom,
An' your fact'ry gals (soon ez we split) 'll make bread,
An' gittin' out cotton, the chief o' other to feed 'em,
'll go to work raisin' promiscuous Ned,"
Sez John C. Calhoun, sez he:—
"You, the North," sez Colquitt,
"If we Southerners all quit,
Would git rich at a busted balloon," sez he.

"Jest look wut is doin', wut anuyky's hevein',* —
In the beautiful clime o' the olive an' vine;
All the wise arbitery is tremblin' to ruin,
An' the sacredyers dreein' an' dreinin' their wine,"
Sez John C. Calhoun, sez he:—
"Yes," sez Johnson, "in France
They're beginnin' to dance
Beelzebub's own rigadoon," sez he.

"The South's safe enough, it don't feel a mite skeery,
Our skies is all sunshine darkness an' dan can't hint
Not to welcome with proud hallyingers the ery
Wen our eagle kites scum from the naytional nest,"
Sez John C. Calhoun, sez he:—
"Oh," sez Wentesh o' Florida,
"Wut 'bout a hereafter
Then our privileges tryin' to proon?" sez he.

"We can theyre'e so happy, that, wen crazy zaptists
Stick their nose in our bizness, we gin so durned riled;
We think it's our duety to give pooty sharp hints,
That the last crumb of Edim on airth shan't be spiled,"
Sez John C. Calhoun, sez he:—
"Ah," sez Dixon H. Lewis,
"It is positively true
That slavery's airth's prettiest boon," sez he.

* The French Revolution of 1848.

NO PEACE FOR THE WICKED.

PEACE with the serpent's nest?
Peace with the traitor race,
Who have stabbed their mother's breast,
And brought our land disgrace?
Whose feet were on our necks,
Whose brows swarm our decks,
Who have drenched with blood our sod?
There is no peace! saith our God.

Come on! ye sunburnt men,
From bay-field and from plow!
Spring up from desk and pen!
Forward! if ever, now!
Come faces dusk and pale!
Shall whips or thews prevail?
Come, whom nature has made,
And win peace, hand to hand!

Remember all our dead;
Have they, then, died in vain?
The blood that they have shed
Calls from the ground again!
Clasp! noble hands and true!
Those hearts that bled for you—
In this the peace they sought?
The liberty they bought?

No peace while breathes a slave!
No peace while lurks a stain!
No peace with brute or knave!
No peace with love of gain!
Patient land, quicken!
When chastened, strong, and pure,
Like dew upon thy sod,
Shall fall the peace of God.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1864.

THE CHICAGO CONVENTION.

THE result of the Chicago Convention is a foregone conclusion. It matters little whether it sits a long or short time; whether Mr. DEAN RICHMOND or Mr. VALLANDIGHAM be its master spirit; whether there be the brotherly peace in its deliberations which the latter gentleman prophesies, or whether the astute delegates break each other's shins, heads, and noses; it matters little whether it painfully constructs a platform sparkling with shan sentiment upon which the party may try to scale the glittering heights of power as poor Madame Somebody in spangled skirts tried to walk up a tight rope amidst fire-worked splendors, or whether, ing by the way, or whether it builds a vessel as broad and ample as the unfortunate steamer President which sailed away and was never heard of more; it all the same whether it nominates General M'CLELLAN and Mr. GARRETT DAVIS, or Mr. VALLANDIGHAM and the late General BUELL, or GUTHRIE and Mr. WASHINGTON HUNT, or Governor HORATIO SEYMOUR and Senator SAULSBURY, or JUDGE NELSON and Mr. EDSON OLDS, or Mr. DEAN RICHMOND and Governor JOSEPH E. BROWN, or Mr. POWELL and Mr. FERNANDO WOOD—a selection of eligible combinations, especially the last—to which we respectfully invite the attention of the Convention—it will be all the same, and the Chicago nomination will wonderfully simplify the situation.

It matters little who is nominated there, because the Convention represents opposition to the war, and its candidate can not escape the fate of his position.

On one side in this election, all who stand for the unconditional maintenance of the Union and the Government, and for waging the war for that purpose by all the legal yield and to be heard, will vote for LINCOLN and JOHNSON. On the other side, all who stand for the conditional maintenance of the Government, for asking the rebels on what terms they will obey —in a word, all who wish peace upon any terms or "conciliatory" war, which is merely shameful surrender, will vote for the Chicago candidate. He will be the candidate of the enemies of the war, and whoever he may be, knowing who his supporters are, he will justly regard his election as a sign that the first step for the people is to stop the war, not to maintain the Union.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM was right, therefore, in saying at Dayton that there would be harmony in the Convention. For he knows that if M'CLELLAN is nominated with a platform, his policy must be substantially that of VALLANDIGHAM himself. This is clear from the facts. The "Democratic" party is said to be divided into the Peace men and the War Democrats. But it is only the former who manage the party. The logic of the party policy is incarnated in Messrs. VALLANDIGHAM and WOOD. That policy has always been, as no honest Democrat will deny, to yield to the South—which is the policy of Messrs. VALLANDIGHAM and WOOD to-day. The efforts of Mr. DEAN RICHMOND and his friends can not successfully oppose that policy. Those gentlemen can only hope to do the same thing without saying so. They must insist that they are going to Lincoln and not to Jefferson Davis.

Mr. WOOD declares that there is no such party as the "War Democracy." Is he not correct? There are indeed men of the purest patriotism who are uncompromising supporters of the war, and who have always been and are now Democrats, like Mr. MOSES F. ODELL, representative in Congress from Brooklyn. But in Pennsylvania, last autumn, when Governor CURTIN was re-elected by a lean, though tough and true, majority of 5,000, was the bulk of the opposition vote cast by men like Mr. ODELL, firm and faithful for the war, or by men like the opposition candidate, Judge WOODWARD, and WILLIAM B. REED, one of the most notorious rebel sympathizers in the country? General BUTLER, like Mr. ODELL, is a War Democrat, so is Daniel S. Dickinson, and Secretary STANTON and General LOGAN, and General GRANT. They have never been any thing but Democrats. Have they, or any man like them, a chance for the Chicago nomination? The "War Democracy" is a name. There are individual Democrats who support the war with all their hearts, looking first to the Union, not to their party. But the vote for THOMAS H. SEYMOUR in Connecticut—was that a War Democratic vote? So in all the States, the opposition vote represents opposition to the war. Its resolutions always denounce the Government, seldom the rebellion. Its orators rage at the President, never at JEFFERSON DAVIS. Its papers are what they can be to disloyal men. It is upon these orators and papers that the Chicago nomination will rely. It is this vote which Chicago nomination will command. It is this policy which the Chicago nomination will favor. Mr. VALLANDIGHAM seems to us quite correct in predicting harmony in the Convention.

Whoever is the candidate and whatever the platform at Chicago, therefore, the Convention will not propose to change the authority of the Government more vigorously, but to truck and dicker with rebels. The platform will state the contemplated bargain in some pretty phrase. It will call it a basis of fraternal effort at reconciliation. But the American people, who are the Governmen of this country, will not forget what without the least delay done or threatened this rebellion began. They will not forget that the House of Representatives, in which the friends of the present Administration were largely in the majority, were modified by a vote of 133 to 65 it recommended a constitutional amendment that the Constitution should never be amended so as to allow Congress to touch slavery in a State. They will not forget that the friends of the new administration in the Peace Conference proposed a national convention to consider how to settle all differences before blood was spilled. So precious was the Union, so great the dread of war, that efforts to preserve peace and maintain the Government, which were new attempts, were made by the Congress and loyal citizens and were haughtily spurned by the rebels. They counted upon the absolute degradation of the American people, and they fired at Sumter to try if that degradation were complete.

They have had their respite; and this election is to determine whether the tone of that response is to be changed. The rebels are waiting to learn whether the war they have waged has degraded us to the point of granting them their will; or whether they are to discover in the defeat of those upon whom they depend in the loyal States, and the total ruin of their armed power, the conviction, that the will of the American people, constitutionally expressed, shall be respected by all American citizens, or the disbodied land to the full force of the Government until they sue to be heard.

COMPROMISE OR WAR.

On the 6th of November, 1860, at a constitutional election, in which the people of all the States participated, ABRAHAM LINCOLN was elected President. On the 17th of December, the 20th of December a Convention of the people of South Carolina "dissolved the Union" between that State and others. No complaint of the general Government existed. No oppression was pleaded; no wrong alleged. At the moment of secession, and for more than two months afterward, it was under the control of the party which was predominant in South Carolina, and that party had controlled the Government for many years. The debates in the Convention show that the secession was the result of a mature purpose. Mr. INGLIS said that they had been thinking of it for twenty years. Mr. KEITT said that he had been engaged in the matter ever since he entered public life. Mr. RHETT said that it was not the event of a day, and was not produced by Mr. LINCOLN's election or the non-execution of the Fugitive Slave Law. Similar statements were made by Members of Congress, as they rose in their places and resigned. The movement continued. Under the plea of the right of States to withdraw from the Union at their pleasure, State after State seceded, and the seceded States combining declared that the United States should not victual its own troops, and upon its attempting to do so began the war.

For more than three years the war has been waged, on the part of the Government to maintain the Union and enforce the laws; on that of the seceders to establish their independence, whereby the Union is destroyed and the Government overthrown. The question now presented to us is whether the effort of the Government to compel disobedient citizens to obey the law unconditionally shall be relinquished, or whether any minority of the people of the United States who are dissatisfied with the result of an election may take up arms to impose their will upon the Government. That is the only question. The Government has sought neither conquest nor any thing under and than the character of the Constitution in South Carolina as in Maine. What is there, then, to compromise? The movement the rebels yield to the laws and renounce the war ends. What is there to compromise but the right of the Government to make the Constitution the supreme law of the land—and when that is compromised the Government is gone.

But we have been fighting for three years, says somebody; why not try a Convention? Very well. Suppose a Convention were called. Suppose the rebels attend its meetings. Is it proposed to offer them more or less than the Constitution and the laws of Congress and the acts of the Executive authorized by it? Is it proposed to ask them upon what terms they will consent for the present to obey the laws and abide by the Constitution? Is it proposed to take their terms? But if the Constitution and the laws are to be offered them, they are offered now, and always have been, without a Convention, and it is upon that basis that we have been fighting. If something less or more than the Constitution is to be offered, then we confess that the rebels are already successful, and the Convention is one in which they will dictate terms to a conquered foe.

In a convention of the kind proposed the Government must either maintain its position or recede from it. If it stands fast, the rebels will have gained a breathing spell for renewed fighting. If it recedes, the Government will have justified every defeated political party or sectional faction in flying to arms against their opponents.

That Government should be reasonable is not denied. That grievances should be redressed is true. The Government that does not hear complaints and redress them will soon fall. But while the measures of Government are just, its authority must be unquestionable, or there is no security for justice. While, therefore, all complaint should be heard, all citizens ought to be useful. If, therefore, any citizens of the United States have any complaint against the Government, what is the reason why they can not thereby they can be heard in a convention or any where else. But if, with arms in their hands, they can force it to do their bidding they are themselves the Government, and the end no longer exists. Yet in our case, as we said, no complaint was alleged. The men who up to that moment had controlled the Government said, quietly, "It is our pleasure to destroy it." If now, under any pretense, the Government which knows that they are straining their last nerve, which hears one of their veterans say that the rebellion must end of sheer depletion before long, stops to ask these leaders upon what terms they will compromise, it concedes that it is vanquished, and that it has not the most essential quality of every true Government, the will and the power upon proper occasion to compel absolute obedience.

FINE FEATHERS DO NOT MAKE FINE BIRDS.

No name is more cherished by the people of this country than "Democrat." But it must stand for a true democracy, or every true Democrat will leave the name and cease to be the thing. The party which now assumes the name and uses the organization is not a party with which unconditional Union men can easily ally themselves. "Democratic" conventions no longer speak for true Democrats, the political children of JEFFERSON. Thus the "Democratic" Convention of Maine tacitly avowed that "the Democratic party is, and ever has been, the true Union party of the country."

Now, considering that the rebellion was plotted by a "Democratic" Cabinet, Senators, and Representatives—that every rebel leader is a "Democrat"—that the rebel press, with the Atlanta Register, if the "Democrats" will only "use the ballot-box against Mr. LINCOLN while we use the cartridge-box, each side will be a helper to the other"—that every State which such "Democratic" leaders controlled in 1860 has been taken out of the Union—that every form of opposition to the maintenance of the lawful authority of the Union comes from persons and parties who call themselves "Democratic"—that those who rejoice at rebel invasions of the North, who constantly suggest the necessary measures of the war, who maintain in speeches and papers the cause of secession and disunion, all belong to what they call the "Democratic" party—that those who invite foreign interference are "Democrats" of the same kind—that every man who, under the name of peace, hopes and works for a bloody counter-revolution at the North is a "Democrat"—that every "Knight of the Golden Circle," or open or secret foe of the integrity of the Union, is a "Democrat"—that every man who counsels the surrender of the Government by making terms with citizens who are trying to overthrow it is "Democrat"—considering that there is no man, party, or measure which is now obscene has been working in the interest of the rebellion, and consequently for disunion, if this is not "Democratic," we submit that the Maine "Democracy" perpetrate a tragical joke when they solemnly resolve that the "Democratic party" of which JEFFERSON DAVIS, FRANKLIN PIERCE, SLIDELL, VALLANDIGHAM, MASON, WICKFALL, and FERNANDO WOOD are accredited leaders, for which consummates BUTLER, STANTON, DICKINSON, LOGAN, and GRANT, is and ever has been the true Union party of the country.

THE "PEACE" APOSTLE AND THE MAJOR-GENERALS.

WE had supposed that MR. VALLANDIGHAM was sent to Congress by his political friends; but he tells us at Dayton: "I expect speedily, by the grace of God—and I ask no higher authority—to be at Chicago." This effectually disposes of the authority of the Convention that sent him. But would he kindly inform an inquiring public, in case he had been dissatisfied with the authority he asserts, to what "higher authority" he would have appealed?

In the midst of his speech the worthy orator paused to ask this most puzzling question: "What shall I say, as an honest man?" Why, indeed! That question may be called, in the language of the rude street boy, "a sockdologer."

But recovering toward the close of his address, he proclaims his purpose "to remain forever God's noblest work, an honest man." That is a most commendable resolution. The delegate who holds his office as the old kings claimed to hold theirs, "by the grace of God," doubtless remembers what Othello says to Emilia of her husband Iago:

> "An honest man he is, and hates the slime
> That sticks on filthy deeds."

But being an honest man, why does the immaculate orator proceed to asperse the honesty of the soldiers. "I do not look for personal aggrandizement. If I did I should not be a Major-General long ago, and had millions of money laid by as the spoils of my part in the war." This is the plain assertion that the commission of a Major-General is the result of a desire of personal aggrandizement, and that Major-Generals lay by "spoils" to the amount of millions of dollars. Mr. VALLANDIGHAM should remember that he is a "peace" man, and not a good authority upon soldiers; who as they read such words will be apt to exclaim, as he remembers Othello and his peculiar emphasis, when his mind wandered to the truth, "Honest, honest Iago!"

TWO NATIONS ON THE SOIL OF ONE.

THE question is often asked whether England did not declare in our Revolution, as we do in this rebellion, that to yield to the demands of the colonial rebels would be to connive at the humiliation and the dismemberment; and whether after all, England was ruined by the separation of the Colonies. This is another form of the favorite remark of rebel sympathizers, that the secessionists are doing only what our fathers did.

The British Government was unquestionably humiliated by the separation of the Colonies, and the English have always borne us the grudge which they are now gratifying. But the Government was not dismembered, simply because the Colonies were subjects of a country three thousand miles off, and because the bond between them was not like ours. In a word, the cases are not alike because they are essentially different. Thus, our fathers did not say that, because government justly exists by the consent of the governed, therefore any portion of people any where, at any time, and under any circumstances, have the right to overthrow the Government by force, with all the inevitable and melancholy consequences of war. They said only that, when the consent of a people is permanently and injuriously disregarded by the Government, and when peaceful redress by petition is be hopeless, and the consequences of submission are more calamitous than war, then, rehearsing their wrongs in mankind, and appealing to human sympathy and divine justice, those people may forcibly overthrow that Government.

That is what the American colonists did in 1776. Is that what the American rebels are doing in 1864?

The Government, so far as the Colonies was concerned, was destroyed, but the consequences ended there. But if the British monarchy had been a Union like ours, if the counties of Kent and Sussex had been parts of the whole in the same way and by the same bond that the colonies of Virginia and Massachusetts were, then the whole bond would have been loosened. But even then it would not necessarily have plunged the island of Great Britain into anarchy, for the revolted section of the empire was separated from it by an ocean.

But if thirteen English counties on the soil of the island, separated from the rest by no natural barriers of any kind whatever, had risen in insurrection, and after a war of four years the British Government had asked them upon what terms they would submit, or had agreed that they should form an independent power upon the English soil, how long would the majesty and force of the British Government last? Should we have heard the London Times complacently asserting that we must apply for room for two monarchies in England; or would the London Times perceive, what all the world would know, that the British monarchy was at an end?

There are such things as nations and a national life. There is an American nation and an American people, exactly as there is an English or a French nation and people. And the American nation proposes to continue its existence.

GENERAL SHERMAN AND HIS SOLDIERS.

A PRIVATE soldier in the First Illinois Artillery lately sent to General SHERMAN a bridle and collar which he had worked in camp. "As a slight token," he said, "of the high regard and esteem which all the soldiers entertain toward you as our commander." The General, with that hearty recognition of valor and character which is ennobling to every man and sure to endear him to others, in acknowledging the present, says:

"I have always borne testimony to the peculiar intelligence, good conduct, and gentlemanly deportment of the young men who compose your battery, and, when the war does close, if I survive it, I will make it my study to show full honor to every man of the battery. The musician, though in humble capacity, have been the working hands by which you have achieved honor and have been vindicated.

"As Infantry A was one of the first to fire a hostile shot in the war in the great valley of the Mississippi, I hope it will be one of the last, and that its thunder tones will in due time proclaim the permanent peace for which we we could not avoid, but which called all true men from the peaceful avocations of life to maintain."

The final sentence shows General SHERMAN'S just appreciation of the nature of the war. The rebels and traitors at the North differ from DE. CARLOS BUELL, late a Major-General in the United States army.

COMPROMISE WITH THE SOIL!

THE powerful picture of MR. NAST'S, which we print this week, shows at a glance the condition which compromise presupposes. These who urge it represent the friends of the Union as in the condition of the Northern soldier in the picture, utterly defeated, crippled, and crushed; while by letters in their papers and by the speech of their orators they depict the Rebellion as rather more stalwart, vigorous, and victorious than ever. And again, when compromise has been effected, secession at the North will be the total prostration represented in the picture. For compromise with armed rebellion is abject surrender.

When the free and independent citizens of the United States are completely overwhelmed and conquered, like the Union soldier in the picture, as Copperheads now believe them to be—when they are ready to send back into slavery the brave black boys who have fought for their flag—and they forget the massacres of Lawrence and Fort Pillow, and the slavery of Andersonville, and the whole history of the hanging and torture of Southern Unionmen at home and of Union prisoners in rebel hands—when the people forget the past, and trample contemptuously at the American flag, and the thousands of true and brave men who have been slaughtered defending free institutions, and the spectators are deluded fellow-citizens at the South forced into the service of the rebellion, and are ready to renounce honor, and truth, and faith, and become mere noble or a nation imperial—when they are a pack of cowards, and no longer a sovereign people—then, and not until then, will they be ready to become true, and agree to relinquish by compromise the authority of the Government their fathers founded, and the Union for which their sons and brothers have died.

LITERARY.

"OUR Burden and our Strength" (from the steam presses of the Daily Times, Troy, New York), by DAVID A. WELLS, A.M., one of the highest statistical authorities in the country, is a little tithe of his most timely and valuable pamphlet accents, a comprehensive and exhaustive exhibition of the debt and resources of our country, present and prospective. The importance and clearness of MR. WELLS'S statements should be widely appreciated that its substance has been issued as a "broadside" by the New England Loyal Publication Society, and is now being widely circulated. Published under equally loyal auspices in New York; while the newspapers have not failed to appreciate it, at that we may confidently expect every voter in the land to understand that a large debt is not for this country necessarily ruinous. The title of the pamphlet explains its purpose. It must be seen by all who care to know the truth; and we can assure our friends that Mr. WELLS is justified in saying, as he does at the end: "Enough of statistics (which no partisan zeal can wrest from their true meaning) have been given to establish the position that the country can not be destroyed or even crippled by any probable future debt; and to induce every loyal man, as he reflects upon our resources as a nation, to 'thank God, and take courage.'"

"The Destiny of our Country" (A. D. F. RANDOLPH, New York) is the title of Judge CHARLES P. KIRKLAND'S address originally prepared for the alumni of Hamilton College, and now enlarged for publication. It is an ample and accurate statement of the origin, course, and probable consequences of the war, made with judicial calmness and patriotic earnestness. The cause of the rebellion the Judge finds in the aristocratic ambition of a certain class in the Southern States; an ambition nurtured by the social and industrial system of the South—that is, Slavery—and essentially at war with the spirit and natural development of our popular republican government. The right of Nullification and the Slavery agitation he connects with General JACKSON, to be more pretenses for insurrection. The real object sought is the salvation of the aristocracy, by which a class may be created. Although an opponent of the present Administration at the time of its election, Judge KIRKLAND justifies its official conduct upon the ground of necessity. He evidently does not love the word abolitionist, although he thinks slavery is doomed by the war. But he is too good a scholar not to know that the one thing that is never harmless until it is stone-dead is the exclusive political discussion of politics. The failure of the Constitutional Convention of 1787 thought that slavery was dead. But eighty years afterward it is still terribly lickin'. While it lasts war, open or hidden, will last in this country.

"The Gospel of Peace," Part 3, has been published for a few weeks, but, as usual, has received little attention from the press. It is remarkable that the only publication of the war which should have made its way into universal recognition without newspaper assistance of any kind. Nor is it less remarkable that the literary secret of which it should have been so long and faithfully kept. The great many persons are sure that they know the author, but their assertions are still inquiries. Whoever he may be, he may congratulate himself that he has reached and enlightened many a mind that was otherwise in Christian ignorance, indifferent, or confused in the great struggle. The broad humor, the felicitous allusion, the trenchant truth-telling, and the sympathy with all the true interests of the New York "ring" are as striking in this part as in the others.

"Not Dead Yet" is the last novel of J. C. JEAFFRESON (Low), whose name is already known among the most popular of current novelists. It is a story which begins "not far away in the past," accomplished in the style of to-day. It is a story of love and crime, told with that peculiar intensity of style which characterizes the author, and winding up, as the sensational novel should, with the passing away of the "subtle, selfish, clever, false Rupert," and the happy marriage bells of "Kitty and Nat," of "Edward and Flo."

THE HARPERS publish "Willson's Larger Speller," one of their School and Family series. The peculiar value of MR. WILLSON'S school-books is already widely acknowledged, and every parent or teacher who can obtain a copy from experience speak most highly of their simple and comprehensive method. Primers, reading-books, and spellers have made the study of books as pleasant as it can be made without shirking the inevitable difficulties or helping the child to think.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE MILITARY SITUATION.

GENERAL GRANT evidently does not intend to leave Petersburg, Richmond, and Secessionism alone. He will not allow General LEE to dispose of the rebel army in Virginia at his own pleasure, and, if the latter chooses to send reinforcements to Maury, or Hood, or Early, the last the Harpers' Ferry commander, he will move on the vicinity of the Weldon Road will certainly teach him that he can not despise his opponent impunity. He has no reason we give the details of the engagement near Deep Bottom, August 14. The rebels in force attempted to turn up a stronger position further back. On the 15th our line was formed in front of the enemy's works, from the Appomattox to Swamp. While the rebel line was drawn out thus exclusively to protect the railroad, the operations were underthem south of Petersburg with a view of gaining possession of the Weldon Road. At 4 o'clock on the morning of the 18th the Fifth Corps, which had been for some days in reserve, moved to the left, supported by the Sixth Corps. The enemy proved a surprise to the enemy, who was not aware of the movement. Warren was at 7 A.M. Four or five hours were spent in tearing up the track, which was destroyed for a considerable distance down the railroad. The Second Division held the road supported by the Third and Fourth on the right, and by the left by the First. The rebel force, a portion of Hill's Corps, after a time made its appearance. The next day the rebels attacked again, and succeeded in breaking through the line of the Second Division, said to be a portion of the Sixth, which had come up to its support. About 1500 of the Fifth Corps were captured. The rebels also took prisoners. The general assault, however, failed, and the road was still held by the Second Corps, the Sixth having at losing some up in time to regain all the ground which had been lost. On Saturday, the 20th, the rebels attacked again, and were again repulsed with great loss in killed and wounded, and 1500 captured. Great still held the road. The Second Corps recrossed the James Saturday night.

In the Valley Early has been quite heavily reinforced by General LEE, and on the 16th has taken a strong position south of Strasburg. This, together with a partial defeat of Hunter's force, in the region of Lynchburg, where vagrants was so completely destroyed as to embarrass his movements, has led to the belief that Early will invade Maryland. The details of SHERIDAN'S movement down the Valley are as follows: On the 10th Sheridan assumed command, his force consisting of the Sixth, Eighth, and Nineteenth Corps, with Crook's, Averell's, and Kelly's commands. On the 9th he started in pursuit of the rebels, who had fallen back to Strasburg by Averell and Kelly. On the 16th Early's rear was overtaken between Strasburg and Winchester, while Sheridan's force followed with trifling results. The pursuit was continued to Fisher's Hill, on the 16th Sheridan's force moved by all at Berryville, and owing to the weakness of the force deployed against him, the rebels succeeded in getting two days later Early was reinforced through Thornton's Gap. On Sunday, the 21st, the rebels advanced near Charlestown, in the Valley. Charlestown is on the line of railroad from Harper's Ferry, and at a point seven miles southwest of the latter. Sheridan's line in the morning had its front at Summit Point, its left stretching out toward Berryville, and its right across the Martinsburg Pike. At 6 o'clock A.M., General WILSON'S cavalry holding the advance at Summit Point, was attacked and forced back to Charlestown. Mackintosh's brigade had 300 men. A front attack was then made on the Federal left, led by Rosser's brigade, but the main assault fell on the Sixth, which held the right. There was a severe battle, and the rebels were driven back and knew that Sheridan fell back two or three miles on the railroad, to the heights about Halltown.

Turning to the West we find no material alteration in the position held by Sherman's army.

On the 14th of August the rebel General Wheeler advanced with a force estimated at between two and five thousand men against Dalton, which was defended by Colonel Sehoff with four hundred men. General Wheeler demanded the surrender of the place in the following terms:

"To prevent the effusion of blood, I have the honor to demand the immediate and unconditional surrender of the forces under your command at this garrison." To which Colonel Sehoff replied: "I have been placed here to defend this post, and not to surrender it." An attack was then made by the enemy, but Sehoff succeeded in holding his position until the arrival of General Steedman with reinforcements from Chattanooga on the 16th; the rebels then commenced to retreat.

The information in regard to the raids made by Sherman's cavalry under Stoneman and McCook down the Macon road is yet very unsatisfactory. Stoneman passed around Atlanta on the 27th near Rivers's plantation, and struck his right. From Stoneman nothing has been heard. McCook commanded his forces against Lovejoy Station. He when near the Chattahoochee on his return he found himself nearly surrounded by the enemy. McCook's forces consisted of his own Division, the First Brigade containing the Fourth Kentucky, First East Tennessee, and Eighth Iowa, commanded by Colonel Croxton, and the Second Brigade, containing the First Wisconsin, First Indiana, and Fourth Indiana, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Funkhouser. The Second Division, the Indiana, Second Kentucky, Fourth Tennessee, and Fifth Iowa, which participated in Stoneman's raid, was sent along as a reserve to the Ninth Ohio, also one of Stoneman's raiding regiments, was to be left to guard the pontoon across the Chattahoochee, where the raiding party crossed, also four pieces of Lilly's Battery. Besides these, the other two pieces accompanied his raiders—the only artillery along. One ambulance to each regiment was all allowed, and a few pack mules.

The entire column was not over 3500 strong, many of every regiment being left behind. The horses were poor, horses were only admitted to the expedition, though, which could travel fifty miles per day, and the men were of an "ability to mount them properly. Some of the regiments were armed throughout with the Spencer rifle, a most formidable and effective repeating arm known.

The column started on the 27th, moving through the Chattahoochee to the north side, several miles below the railroad bridge, and crossing at the ford by Powers's Ferry, seven miles below Campbellstown. Here McCook crossed the river, and struck the Ninth Ohio and the pontoon guns to guard his pontoon bridge, moved eastward 18 Pulaski about ten miles from Atlanta, and then struck the Macon Railroad at Fairburn station, twenty-five miles from Atlanta. The road was destroyed for five miles, and the depot, filled with commissary stores, was burned. Moving on, the night of the 28th was passed at Lovejoy Station, and the night through a drenching rain, came upon the skirts of Jonesboro', where upon a train of rebel wagons, themselves taken for rebels, they easily surprised and captured the train of nearly a thousand wagons, containing all the baggages of the rebel army at Atlanta. Then Fayetteville on the 31st of August was occupied. At 10 o'clock on the 30th, M'Cook struck the Macon road three miles south of Jonesboro', and began the destruction of a section of the road destroyed. At two P.M. the column began its return march, having thoroughly destroyed about 20 miles of the Chattahoochee. At night, before reversing White-water road northward, a heavy force of rebels overtook M'Cook's rear under Harrison, driving the latter. Harrison was then supported by the Second and Fifth Indiana, and the enemy was repulsed. The command then halted for the night at the house of Governor Newman, forty miles from Atlanta, and twelve from the Chattahoochee on the West Point road. Here M'Cook encountered a heavy force of rebel infantry. He fell back to Newman on the road 24 miles from Campbellstown, afterward the advance-guard—the Fourth Indiana and Second Kentucky—were cut off from the main body and had to fight their way out. Not more than half succeeded in doing so. On the 31st August Campbellstown was turned with 1700 men. His loss in killed, wounded, and missing can not have been less than 300. It was from here that the rebel General Stoneman's command rebels effect a junction on the Macon road. Stoneman appears to have met with a disastrous repulse. Stoneman reports his presence his arrival with 500 men as prisoners of war at Macon, Georgia.

General Kilpatrick has just returned from a raid on the Macon road. The details of the expedition are not yet given; it is only known that about a dozen miles of the road have been injured, and that the command has returned uninjured.

From Mobile there is no important intelligence later than that given in last week's record. On pages 565 and 566 of HARPER'S WEEKLY will be found extracts from Admiral Bay, August 5, giving the disposition of the Federal and rebel fleets, and the preparations made for the final obstructions. At the mouth of the Bay is Dauphin Island, which commands the entrance to the harbor of Mobile. It is impossible for a fleet to navigate the western channel, which is the only one left open, if the rebels succeed in their operations against Fort Morgan, a formidable fort with a garrison of 1000 men.

ITEMS.

General Hovey and Hughes lately encountered the rebel General Johnson's forces near Morganfield, Kentucky, and completely routed them, capturing nineteen prisoners and recovering a large amount of Government property which had been taken by these guerrillas.

The guerrilla Woolwood died at Hopkinsville, Tennessee, August 19. His command is scattered in all directions.

The faculty and trustees of Williams College at its last commencement conferred the honorary degree of LL.D. upon the title of Doctor of Laws. The Honor from a Massachusetts college to a distinguished representative of democratic Massachusetts citizens will certainly appear to no one inappropriate or unmerited.

FOREIGN NEWS.

EUROPE.

ALL the occasions which a few months since supplied an extensive European war seem now to have disappeared. The Danish question has been settled, Poland has been allowed in peace to take possession of Mexico; and the Schleswig-Holstein question has been definitely settled.

The preliminaries of peace agreed upon between Denmark and the German Allies are the following:

1. The Danish kingdom shall cede to the Duchies Schleswig-Holstein and Lauenburg, agreeing to whatever disposition the Allies may make of them. The Government with which Schleswig are surrendered all the islands belonging to Denmark, including Alsen, and the Danish possessions south of the District of Ribe, for which Denmark receives the sum of 29,000,000 rix-dollars.

2. The debts contracted on account of Denmark proper, and the Duchies, will be borne respectively by either of them. The debts contracted on account of the monarchy will be proportionately divided between Denmark proper and the Duchies, with the exception of the loan contracted in England in 1863, which will be paid by Denmark, and the war expenses of the great German Powers, which will be borne by the Duchies.

3. Both parties agree to an armistice until September 15, and to commence negotiations for a definitive treaty. The two armies to remain as at present until the treaty is concluded.

4. Prisoners of war are to be set at liberty on giving their parole.

THE LATE BRIGADIER-GENERAL DANIEL M'COOK.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY HOAG & QUICK, CINCINNATI, O.]

GENERAL DANIEL M'COOK.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL DANIEL M'COOK, who lately died of a wound received at Kenesaw Mountain, July 27, and whose portrait is here given, was born July 22, 1834, in Carrollton, Ohio. The following sketch is from a soldier of his brigade:

"General DANIEL M'COOK was the sixth son of the late Major DANIEL M'COOK, who was killed at the battle of Buffington Island, Ohio, on the 21st of July, 1863. He is the third son of this family who have been killed in the war for the Union: CHARLES, aged 17, was killed at Bull Run 21st July, 1861; General ROBERT L. M'COOK, killed while sick in his ambulance August 5, 1862. At the breaking out of the war he was practicing law at Leavenworth, KANSAS, a member of the firm of EWING, SHERMAN, & M'COOK. EWING is now a Brigadier-General; and the present gallant commander of the army before Atlanta was the other member. M'COOK raised a Company, called the 'Shields' Guards, and joined the First Kansas Volunteers as Captain of Company H; he remained with his regiment in southwest Missouri until his health failed him; being satisfied he could not undergo the fatigues of long marches, he resigned, to accept that of Captain and Assistant Adjutant-General, and was assigned to his brother's division in General BUELL'S army, where he served with distinction until the evacuation of Corinth by the rebels. At this time he received a commission as Colonel of the Fifty-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry. He soon after marched with his regiment to Lexington, Kentucky.

"When General BUELL advanced from Louisville M'COOK was assigned to the command of a brigade in General GILBERT'S Corps. On going to Nashville his brigade was assigned to General GRANGER'S Division, and formed part of the Reserve Army of the Cumberland. GRANGER'S Division joined ROSECRANS just before the battle of Chicamauga, M'COOK'S Brigade being the first to welcome the veterans of LONGSTREET with Western bullets. In this battle Colonel M'COOK greatly distinguished himself, and was recommended for promotion, which he received two days before his death."

General M'COOK wrote the article in the May number of Harper's Magazine headed "Second Division at Shiloh."

GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN—CAPTURE OF A REBEL WAGON TRAIN BY GENERAL M'COOK, NEAR FAYETTEVILLE, GEORGIA, JULY 30, 1864.
SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 568.]

THE LATE

JOHN GRIGG, Esq.

In 1816 a young man, twenty-four years of age, came to Philadelphia and assumed the position of a clerk in the Publishing House of Warner & Johnson. His life thus far had been for the most part an adventure. Left an orphan at six in Cornwall, England, he began with the world as a farmer's boy. But there was a spirit of enterprise within him which overtopped the limits of the farm. Looking out upon the sea from the Cornish coast, he thought he saw harvests of brighter promise; and at twelve he began to seek a sailor's fortunes. Soon tired of this field of labor, he came to Richmond, Virginia. Here we find him engaged in a survey of the State before he was yet out of his teens. Leaving Virginia for Ohio, we next find him a clerk in a Judiciary court, and afterward superintendent of a woolen factory.

This young man was JOHN GRIGG, Esq., long known as the enterprising Philadelphia publisher and bookseller, and whose portrait is here given. He came to Philadelphia, as we have said, at the age of twenty-four. Here he resided until his death, August 2, 1864. Serving Warner & Johnson seven years as a clerk, he, in 1823, commenced publishing on his own account, securing immediately the patronage of the firm with which he had been connected, and which, by the death of WARNER, had been dissolved. He had closed up the business of this firm, and his sagacity and perfect integrity soon built up his own fortunes. In eight years his business was so large that he was induced to take Mr. HENRY ELLIOTT as partner. In 1847 three younger partners were also introduced. In 1850 Grigg & Elliott sold out to their juniors, Messrs. Lippincott & Willis, and the firm was styled J. B. Lippincott & Co.

At his retirement Mr. GRIGG was fifty-eight years of age. He was married to Miss M'CLELLAN, sister of the celebrated surgeon, and aunt of General GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN. He was a man possessed of a very genial disposition — as characteristic for positive benevolence as for good-humor. Although a millionaire, the modesty of his youth never gave place to the swaggering boldness or the curt manners which so frequently distinguish the very wealthy. Money only gave him the opportunity to exhibit the inherent nobility of his nature. For the most winning traits of his character he was known only to associates, but his public spirit endeared him to all.

Mr. GRIGG was also a man of cultivated tastes. Music and poetry delighted him, and in the latter his judgment was very good. But the strong development of his understanding gave him a keen relish for history and biography. And, as in all cases where the judgment is superior, his memory was remarkable. It was in immediate connection with these mental characteristics that those habits of method were developed which, though they never create, yet chiefly secure and regulate success.

After he retired from the publishing business he was engaged until his death as a private banker, and in the management of his large fortune, which included real estate in Philadelphia, Illinois, and Mississippi. But he was always especially interested in the Book Trade, with which his fortunes had been so intimately connected. He died at the age of seventy-two, leaving many friends to mourn his loss, and leaving on record an example not only of enviable success but of inestimable worth.

THE LATE JOHN GRIGG, ESQ.

NASSAU, N. P.

NASSAU, New Providence, of which we give a view on this page, is a point of great interest at this time as the principal rendezvous of the Anglo-Confederate blockade-runners. A correspondent says of the place: "The enterprise of British merchants" — an enterprise, we may remark, which no honorable nation would care to justify — "has lined its quays with long, light-colored, rakish-looking steamers, discharging their rich freights of cotton that have run the gauntlet through the Federal cruisers off Wilmington. The voyage from the Confederate States to Nassau averages about fifty hours; but these fifty hours are crowded with an excitement that a voyage of fifty days would fail in producing. From this time of leaving Cape Fear River, Wilmington, to the time of sighting Nassau and getting into British waters, those craft are never at safe from being overhauled by a Northern man-of-war. Nassau is the point whence most of the blockaders start with the cargoes destined for the southern Confederacy, and it is here that they return with their bales of Sea Island and Upland cotton, which they have obtained in exchange for the rifles, blankets, and shoes so much needed by the Southern soldier. The climate of the Bahamas, of which New Providence is one of the groups, is the most tropical; oranges, shaddocks, bananas, cocoanuts, pine-apples, and many other varieties of fruit abound, and the diversity of foliage is rich and charming. Handsome residences are embedded in most attractive." The population of the town is about 10,000.

GEN. SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN.

On our first page and on page 554 we give illustrations of General Sherman's campaign. The sketch on the first page represents General Sherman holding a council of war at Wooden's head-quarters. General Sherman holds his councils of war with himself. The different generals seem to listen rather than to suggest. The General speaks his thoughts aloud, and the words uttered on this occasion disclose the movement that he has in his mind for some day in the future.

On page 554 we illustrate the capture of the rebel wagon-train by General Edward M'Cook. A full description of the incident will be found in our next column. General M'Cook has made the only raid in the year of Atlanta that has any semblance of a success. He succeeded in destroying the Macon Road for a short distance, and burned a considerable number of wagons, which were mostly headquarter trains. He broke from the line of march for him, and the gallant manner in which he cut himself out, are spoken of with pride by the army.

Captain Le Grand, whose portrait is given on page 564, commands Battery II, First Illinois Artillery. The following gallant action is thus recorded by our correspondent: On the 22d of July the battery of Captain De Grass was placed by order of General Sherman in such a position as to throw shells from his 20-pounders into Atlanta. The rebels came charging through the railroad cut to the left of the battery. The wagon-master of Captain De Grass saw at once that his guns were gone. He directly ordered his guns pointed left oblique, and gave the charging rebels double canister, at the rate of four rounds per minute. Soon he had two of his guns spiked, and ordered his men to get away, reserving himself with one gun (named Miss Wyman), using one gun as rapidly as possible. Still the enemy came on, and when within less than twenty rods of the piece called to his men of thirty years. The very sight of his white head, tremulous and bowed down with age, and not with dishonor, ought to have stricken them into shame, and I did see several, who were getting on in life themselves, hide their faces for a minute or two in their hands, as if they were saying a second prayer on his behalf alone.

There was a long stilling hush after all the usual work was over, so dreadful that all our hearts throbbed and fluttered painfully, while we gazed out his trembling hand toward the old pastor.

"Brethren," he cried, "I can not! I can not! You ask me to sit in judgment upon a father. God knows I have looked upon Mr. Amhery as a most severed father. Choose one from among yourselves to take this place."

He left us he spoke, and, stepping down into the aisle, took a seat in the minister's pew. There was a stirring and rustling of the motionless figure beside me, and I saw Rebecca glance once at the minister's averted face. The deacons looked at one another in confusion and bewilderment, not knowing how to choose, and there ran a whisper from one pew to pew; but before any person had found courage to speak Mr. Amhery rose from his seat, and, with tottering steps, moved to the middle aisle, and, standing for a moment to look round with a faint glimmer of a smile, sank down into it, leaning his silvery head against the purple cloth with which it was covered. He had always taken the vacant chair whenever our minister was absent. Was he thinking in his judgment upon himself? I kept my eyes fixed upon him, but his face was as tranquil and bright as was before, in his hour of the communion-feast, and while yet the church hesitated, he lifted up his voice, clear though feeble, and said, "Brethren, proceed with the matter in hand. Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matter?" One of the deacons named over no names—stated that thirty years ago, when the sum in question must have passed into Mr. Amhery's hands, it was found that he had subscribed the same amount in a mortgage upon a church, which he proved by a letter from one of the trustees of that church.

Mr. Amhery listened attentively, but with a strange sad air of perplexity upon his face; and when the matter came to a pause he said, in a low thing, but gleaned round uneasily as if for some one else to speak. After a dreadful pause, he rose and drew himself to his full height, stretching out his arms toward them with a look of tender entreaty, while his trembling, thin and quavering, fell upon our hearkening ears.

"My people," he said, "it is I who have baptized you; it is I who have been with you in sacred communion among you; night and day have I borne the burden of your souls before the throne."

He paused there tremulously, amid a profound stillness and shame fell upon the church.

"You ask me how I saved that money," he cried. "I tell you I denied myself every luxury, and I lived strable and pleasant to a man. I gave hunger, and famine, and loneliness, and labor for it. Catherine herself was upon the verge of starvation at the time it from the poverty which threatened us. I tell you men like you know not what self-denial is. I paid the full price of suffering for every portion of it. Behold now, here I am, old and gray-headed, before you, a criminal against the laws of God, and before his anointed; whom have I defrauded? or whom have I oppressed? or of whose hand have I received a bribe to blind mine eyes therewith? and I will restore it to you."

He stood before us with his hand upraised, and his eyes flashing back our earnest gaze, and I thought he could move the fire faded away from his face, and with a low bitter cry, which tingled in our ears, he sank down upon the floor, as one suddenly stricken by the hand of God.

Yes, stricken, but with a very gentle stroke; paralyzed down one side, yet with the power of speech spared to him, or rather restored after a few days' lethargy. There was nothing marvelous about it after the great excitement and suspense of the troublous days; but there were some who, when the first shock was over, were not afraid to say there was a judgment in it. There was a solemn awed meeting held, though nothing had been decided at the first; and still every one was reckoning and calculating whether the money could have been honestly gathered, or was, as Mr. Corbett's friends asserted, this very sum for which Mr. Amhery was trustee. And there was a great division of opinion in the church about it.

Of course we were compelled to tell Katie all; and never did a more woeful change pass over any young creature. She had come home to us a rosy, merry, young girl, such as it delights one to see, and see, after bearing the burden of Rebecca's carefulness and anxiety; but in that single day Katie grew bleached and sorrow-worn, as if the sun entered into her soul. No delay or dallying she allowed herself, but wrote at once to Harry Thompson, bidding him to find out the treasury, recollect that her father, or to see her face no more; and then she closed her lips in utter silence about him, and going about the house like one of those who have no share us with downcast head and sunless face, it almost broke my heart to watch her.

There was nothing that I could not do for the children. It is no light thing for a woman of forty to think of marriage; but I sat down and mused upon Joshua Lamb's house, and carpet, and furniture, until I reached out the writing-desk my children had given me, and wrote a note on a sheet of gilt-edged paper, inviting Joshua to come to supper that evening. I never saw a man relish any thing more than he did the meal which I set before him, well cooked by myself, for he had miserable sort of cookery at home, in spite of his drawing-room; and when he was satisfied he leaned back in the armchair and regarded me with a very earnest and grave countenance.

"Mary," said he, with a deep sigh, "how long are you going to make me uncomfortable?"

"Why, Mr. Lamb," I answered, innocently, "I'm sure I'm making you as comfortable as I can."

"Nay, Mary," he said, "you understand me well enough. Will you marry me, or will you not?"

He had never spoken so plain before; and though that was just what I was wanting to bring him to, there was a dither all through me as he spoke the words.

"Joshua," I said, after a while, "I'll make a bargain with you, and a promise. If you'll find out this roguery of Mr. Corbett's I'll be married to you as soon as ever you choose to ask me again."

All this would be expected that the deed might be found, or Mr. Corbett's heart be changed; but nothing happened. Joshua went home to his bachelor's bed, and I to come and receive the money in her father's presence; Mr. Craig and the longbearded deacon were asked to be present likewise, and Rebecca insisted upon me staying with her in the old minister's sick room.

Mr. Corbett opened the chamber with the air of an apostle, ready to give every one of us his blessing. The long-headed deacon shook hands with him heartily; and I suppose Mr. Craig felt it to be his duty to submit to take his offered hand. But when he turned to old Mr. Amhery, who lay propped up on pillows, his chin sunk upon his breast, and a roll of bank-notes which fluttered in his hold, the tears ran down his white and furrowed cheeks. Rebecca stepped forward and placed herself between him and the smiling villain.

"Be quick," she said, with a flash of the lightning in her eyes; "you have no time to waste and no your way." But take you this word from me, the Lord God of recompenses, He will requite."

He shook his head, and muttered that we could not catch; and Rebecca, taking the banknotes from her father's feeble hand, counted them out one by one before us all, and then, without saying more and more upon her face, like the thick thunder-cloud. When the task was ended, and the deed of release given in due form, she crossed the room without another word, and, throwing wide the door, beckoned to them to depart at once, and in silence. Even Mr. Craig withdrew, after casting one beseeching look at the white-faced, haughty woman, who closed the door with a scorn as if it would never be opened to any one of them again. I also went home, and wrote a letter upon black-edged paper to Joshua Lamb, telling him that there was no need of such a thing as crossing my door-step any more.

Mr. Craig continued constant in his visits, and at times was a little shamefaced, pleading for Rebecca's Harry Thompson; and they were carrying on a correspondence of heart-breaking letters about their circumstances, which I could not read without pity very much. As for Joshua, he would as soon have dared to venture into a lion's den as to enter into my house either for prayer or for supper again.

Many a person would say it was my fancy; but ever after that day, when he took the minister's money, Mr. Corbett's old age began to fail, and declined away before my eyes, until whenever he went down the street, with the woeful shadow behind him waiting upon his bending steps, each time he left slowly dying out of him, like the light goes out of the sky on a summer's evening. I noticed him muffling up more and more and walking with heavier tread; and then there came a faint, hollow cough, and he sometimes made him press his hand against his side.

It was getting on for twelve months after Rebecca and her father had come to live with us when evening sings, when one day, in the dusk of the evening, Joshua Lamb tapped meekly upon my counter; but, before I could say a word, he had walked into the premises, he began to speak glibly but humbly enough, not giving me room to put in one word, until he had told me all that he was getting worse and worse, and wanted to see Rebecca.

I may as well be straightforward, of Joshua Lamb and Mr. Corbett's decease. After many months back, she consented; but would not go without me. We were shown into Corbett's lonely parlor, where he sat amidst the relics of concern enough, which cast a kind of rosy glow upon his white face. They could not conceal the wasted cheeks and sunken eyes, nor the pallid hands which trembled with pain and agony with which he met Rebecca's steadfast gaze.

"Thank you, Mary," he said, smiling; for he was that cunning yet that he could read one's very thoughts; "thank you, but never mind. Sit down, you and Miss Amhery; you would rather not shake hands with me. I am troubled about the old minister. I, be in an aged man, and he thinks he has something against me. Miss Amhery, I should die easier, and I know I am dying, if you would receive that money back again from my hands."

Rebecca did not answer for a minute or two; while Mr. Corbett drew out a large pocket-book, and took from it a number of notes, counting them aloud one by one. I knew how poor we were, and I felt dazed and giddy for very joy.

"No," said Rebecca, "I will not take them; they are the price of my father's good name. I will accept no gift from you, Mr. Corbett."

A spasm shot over his face, and he held his worn hand upon his heaving chest, as if to strengthen him to speak again.

"Rebecca," he said, "I have known you since you were a little child, and I can not bear for you, and Katie, and Nellie to come to want. I would rather give you the money than leave it in my will. Take more money. Take five thousand dollars apiece if you will have it. Take it, and I will consent for Harry to marry Katie." Rebecca stood up in her place calm and resolute, though her eyes were fastened upon the rustling bank-notes in Mr. Corbett's hand; while he watched her face eagerly, as if his soul's salvation rested upon her answer. She smiled at length, half in scorn, and half in triumph.

"It is a great bribe," she said, "and I loved money once, but it has no power over me now. Give me back my father's good name, and I will listen to you; but till then you may go on to offer me your worthless money and I will say no to the last."

Rebecca, he cried, looking affrighted at her, "give me your promise that you will not betray me, and I will tell you."

"I will hear nothing that I can not make known," she answered. "What you have to tell you shall write down, that it may be made known to the world after your death. So far I consent. Only let my father's name be righted, and I care very little about the money. May God have pity upon you, Mr. Corbett!"

He was too feeble to answer her any thing; and I ran and made the pillows soft and easy under his head before we left the room. Even Rebecca stepped up to his side and took his languid hand for a moment in her own.

"Stay," he cried, grasping for breath, and he closed his fingers over hers, though he had not the strength of a baby, "you shall write it for me; only speak my secret till I am gone."

So Rebecca sat down at the table beside him, neither trembling nor faltering, and waited with her steadfast gaze upon his face, while he, with still he recovered himself; and receiving our solemn promises to keep his secret, he bade her what she should put down, and then began to dictate. When Mr. Amhery resigned his office of pastor to the church, the trust-deeds, with other law papers intrusted to his charge, had been given up to Mr. Corbett's care, and that among them he discovered the last deed of release, which the minister had kept with them. Mr. Corbett was a man of very private affairs. Furthermore, that when Mr. Thompson died, who was the last person then living that could bear testimony to Mr. Amhery, he had been tempted of Satan to claim the moneys from him. The wretched man spoke clearly, and Rebecca wrote it down with a firm hand. Whereupon he may and ordered Joshua Lamb to his presence, and without making the paper known to him, signed his name put his name to it as a witness. After which, with the precious paper in our own possession, we returned home again.

Mr. Corbett died at last without much feeling, either of body or mind, as most people do, whether they be saints or sinners, on the following Monday, being the ordinary monthly church meeting, Rebecca sent that paper to Mr. Craig for him to publish before the whole body of the church.

She and I had never been to a church meeting since the charge was brought against Mr. Amhery; nor did we go that night. We sat together together in Mr. Amhery's chamber, Rebecca near the window, looking up to the evening sky so peacefully and serene, and I on a low stool upon her feet. And when through the quiet house there rang a loud and earnest peal, which caused us all to start with affright, and I heard the stairs leading up upon the front door. There in the street stood the assembled church, with Mr. Craig at their head, and all the deacons grouped close after him, eager to follow him in. Mr. Craig put me gently on one side, and marched straight on with his company up into the minister's parlor, deserted and shadowy chamber. There was little need of speech. The weeping church, tongue-tied with shame and sorrow, yet shining and serene, crowded round the old pastor's bed, hanging garden in sobs and choking words, until the long-headed deacon gave place Mr. Craig to be their spokesman. He went forward before them all, and standing for a minute or two speechless by the bed, Mr. Amhery, as every body was looking to him to confess their sorrow, he could do nothing else but stoop down and press his lips reverently and tenderly upon the old man's wrinkled forehead.

I saw that when he lifted up his head his eyes and Rebecca's met over and a flood of courage to both those grave faces, flashed across them for a moment. He lingered till all the church had departed, even to the deacons, the last sound of footsteps had died out of the house. But as Rebecca, shrinking and nervous, was creeping away doubtfully from the presence, he placed himself in her way, and took both her hands in his.

"Rebecca," he said, speaking before her father had time, "do you love me?"

"Yes," she answered, hanging down her head.

"I am a poor man," he said, "and we may have to wait long."

"We will wait," she whispered, as Catherine, her mother, might have done many years to this aged, brotherless man, who had been more her as her lover. Mr. Craig laid his lips upon hers with as much reverence and tenderness, but with more passion, maybe, as when he had kissed her father beforehand; but I, knowing the mother's sorrowful, shattered soul, and care, turned aside my heart-sore for the two young creatures before me.

But their lot in life was to be easier than Mr. Amhery's and Catherine's. When Mr. Corbett's will was opened, though it made no mention of the paper which owned to one of his crimes of dishonesty and oppression, it contained a codicil which left five thousand dollars apiece to the minister's three daughters, and it revoked the condition that Harry Thompson should forfeit his wealth only if he gave up his marriage with Katie.

Before many months were past Rebecca became the young minister's wife; and Katie only waited for a year or two more of discretion. Joshua Lamb professes to charge me with breaking my word, but my bargain with him was plainly enough that he himself should find out the trickery about the deed of release. At times I feel a little heart-sinking, lest he should bring an action against me for breach of promise of marriage; but he has nothing to show save those two little notes I wrote to him; and I feel there would be very little hope of happiness in marriage if I had to be upon my guard all my life long.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"No man was better associated to prejudge pork than my husband was," says Mrs. Partington; "he knew what good hogs were, he did, for he had been brought up with 'em from his childhood."

At the Dorkum assizes a deaf old lady, who had brought an action for damages against a neighbor, who, being examined, when the judge suggested a compromise, and instructed counsel to ask what she would take to settle the matter. "What will you take?" asked the gentleman in the bob-wig of the old lady. "Eh?" said the latter, whose head at the counsel, full of the jury, in confidence, what she was to say. "Counsel," said the latter, "wants to know what you will take?" asked the learned counsel again, this time shouting as loud as he could in the old lady's ear. "I think his lordship kindly," said the latter, "and if it's no inconvenience to him, I'll take a little warm ale."

"HOSE, SAMMY HOSE."—Acclimatization is all very well in its way; but it is no joke, on closing the orifice, after taking a booster, to find a lively hippopotamus as your companion in the bed.

"How thankful we ought to be for the many good things which are provided for us to enjoy!" said a gentleman at a city dinner the other day. "The bounties of the earth, the fowls of the air, and the fishes of the sea," he continued, "were all created for the use of man." "Very true," replied his friend; "but if you had witnessed the hair-breadth escapes which I experienced in being rescued alive by a shark, when in the West Indies, you would have been satisfied that there was another consideration in just the opposite opinion. He believed that man was created for fun."

It is mentioned in the "Diary of a Lady of Quality," that the first thing asked for by a rescued man, when rescued by the Life Boat, is a glass of "hot brandy-and-water." Since she was five years old she had never seen her own face.

An admirer of dogs having had a new litter of a fine breed, a friend wished him to put him down for a puppy! "Let you down for one a great while ago," was the answer.

"John, can you tell me the difference between straw and hay?" asked a gentleman of his coachman. "Why, yes, Sir," said John. "Attraction of gravitation pulls a drunkard to the ground, and the attraction of cohesion pulls water into from getting up again."

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.—The Poet Laureate is about to bring out a new volume of verse, entitled, the "Idylls of the King." The subject is, of course, a grate one, and likely to make a stir.

A PIL-GRIM.—A bolus made up of equal parts of prussic acid and opium.

"Some people," said a red-nosed individual, barraguing three or four by-standers, "waste their money in charity, and then complain of the hard times. I'm a supporter of the establishments, but as for me, I save mine to buy spirits."

Nobody giving attention to Diogenes while discoursing of virtue and philosophy, he fell to singing a funny song; and multitudes flocked to hear him. "Ah, Sir," he said, "how much more is folly admired than wisdom!"

The wit deservedly won his bet who, in a company where every one was bragging of his tall relations, wagered that he himself had a brother taller than any. "Well, he had, he said, "two half brothers, each measuring six feet."

A man brought before a justice of the peace charged with stealing a watch, pleaded in extenuation the natural infirmity. "I should have made a considerable figure in the world, Judge," said he, "if I hadn't been a fool; it's a dreadful drawback to a man."

Lines written on the marriage of a Mr. Husband:

"The case is the strangest we've known in our life,
A husband's a Husband, and so is his wife."

The sweetest of all pleasures, and one that will never decay, is to cherish the heart that lover you.

There is said to be a man in the moon. In the honeymoon there are both a man and a woman.

A Hibernian senator, speaking of suicide, said, "The best way to stop it is to make it a capital offense punishable by death."

A grave friend of ours tells us that he and his wife always go to bed quarreling. "Of course," said he, "with all our differences, we never fall out."

MUSICAL QUERY.—When a person declares that his "brain is all on fire," is it adjacent to Kane's Hall?

A man advertises that he has "always a large supply of leeches on his hands."

LIQUID REMEDY FOR BALDNESS.—Use brandy externally until the hair grows, and then take it internally to cleanse the root.

ON A BALD HEAD.

My hair and I are quite, d'ye see;
For how could she be shown
The skill
Whose tongue would never let her chin be still?

Never confide in a young man—new pals leak. Never hold your secret in the hands of a young woman—she'll give it away.

A philosopher being asked of whom he had acquired so much knowledge, replied, "Of the blind, who do not like their feet until they have tried them with their stick the ground on which they are going to tread."

One common Solomon Sheldrick the preceptor observed the noble family of Lord Cavendish, by his talents, and likely to be kept out by these pressing in before them. Being very desirous for their accommodation, he called out to his little brother whom he considered the principal obstacle in clearing the passage, "Come back, Bob, and let in the noble Cavendishes," and then turning to his psalm-book, took up his duty, and went on to read the line, "Nor stand in sinners' way."

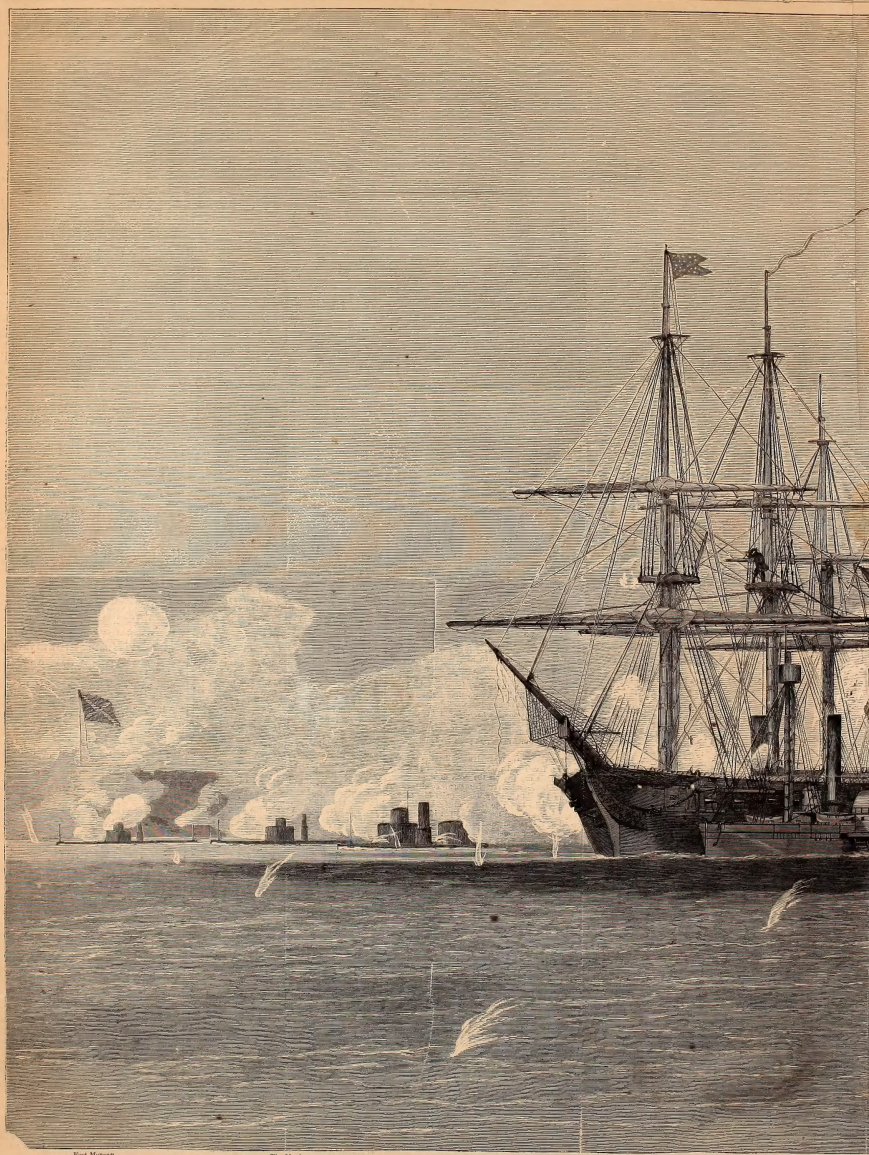
"Come down this instant," said the housewife to a journeyman painter, who had been filling in the rounds top. "Come down, I say, and I'll give you a good dozen, you rascal!" "Don't say that, mum," replied the painter; "you'll spoil my best days for it."

EPITAPH ON A MISER.

Reader, beware immoderate love of pelf,
Here lies the worst of thieves—who robbed himself.

Some school-boy meeting a poor woman driving asses, one of them said to her, "Good-morning, mother of asses." "Good-morning, my child," was the reply.

"I rise for information," said a member of the legislative body. "I am very glad to hear it," said a by-stander, "for no man wants it more."



FARRAGUT'S FLEET PASSING THE FORTS AND OBSTRUCT

TIONS AT THE ENTRANCE OF MOBILE BAY, AUGUST 5, 1864.

RICH AND POOR.

WITH choicest meats the cloth is spread
And clustered fruits from off the vine,
And in the goblets, gold and red,
Sparkles the warm, delicious wine.
The rich man lifts it to his lips,
And murmurs whilst he slowly sips:

"Ah, wealth, what bounteous gifts are thine!
Where does the poor man find his bliss?
For him grow no generous wines
With fruity flavor like to this.
Wealth builds us round a wall secure
Which shuts us from the vulgar poor."

Oh, rich man, once upon the earth,
In vain gone by, a stranger trod,
The prophets who foretold his birth
Proclaimed him as the Son of God,
And he, whose every deed was pure,
Chose his own friends among the poor.

In yonder naked garret's gloom,
Her aching sight made dim with tears,
With little left which once was bloom,
And seeming twice her actual years,
A woman toils from day to day
To drive the wolf and sin away.

And here a mother, mute with grief,
Bends low above her prostrate boy;
The nights are long, the days grow brief,
To her no blessing brings to joy,
But finds her watching by the bed
Where lies her darling cold and dead.

Somewhere beyond our mortal sight
There is a city fair to see,
Where none know sorrow, want, or night,
And time is an eternity.
And there no frowning wall secure
Shall separate the rich and poor.

QUITE ALONE.

CHAPTER XLIV.

THE PILGRIMS AT RANELAGH.

I DON'T know whether they allow strangers to dine at the Trade days. I am rather inclined to think they do not. Ultra exclusiveness reads in the long-run to inhospitality, and Spaniards, through whose inexhaustible generosity creeps the sangre azul, are sometimes reluctant to share their pochero with the best-recommended stranger, fearful lest he should have less than ninety-seven quarterings on his scutcheon.

At all events they dined outsiders at the P. twenty years since, and a very agreeable time the outsiders had of it. This may account for a certain round table in the Pilgrims' coffee-room being occupied on certain evenings in the winter of the sultan's sojourn in London, by four guests, only two of whom were free and accepted Pilgrims.

Members first, if you please. There was our old friend Lord Carlton, much older, but not much the worse for wear. He had settled down and grown fat. Need any thing more be said? Well, a little, perhaps. He was married, and her ladyship modeled wax flowers beautifully, and illuminated scrolls with "Thou shalt not steal, and "The tongue is an unruly member," in gold and colors, for ragged schools, in most superb style. She was rather too serious to be the wife of a reformed rake, and was given to lamenting her destiny, and exclaiming against the ingratitude of the world, when the juvenile pickpockets she had converted proved equally of a state of grace, and physically to be foot-pages, turned out failures, and absconded with the spoons. Lord Carlton had obtained a splendid sinecure post, which she had promoted to be butler, was detected handing a blue bag containing Lord Carlton's coronet (broken short off at the bill), a church service bound in purple velvet and gold, a silver vinaigrette, and fourteen yards of Valenciennes, over the area railings to Mrs. Fence, of Middlesex Street, late Petticoat Lane, by condition a widow, and by predilection pursuing the business of receiver of stolen goods. Lord Carlton, however, went his way, and her ladyship took to Spiritualism.

His lordship bought pictures that were not by Titian, and, in his place in the House, was a very thorough-paced Anti-Church-and-State-ite, and the Trustees of the National Gallery. He had brought in a bill to abolish whistling in the streets, and the general consequence was that "asparagus" instead of "grass," when they cried that delicious excellent for sale. This measure had a spice of destiny, for it almost got read a second time, by accident, on a very hot Goodwood Cup day: and it was only in committee, by the advice of a right honorable and prelate, who, as the rumor ran, was a distinguished amateur of sibilation, and the only bishop who ever dress-appeared with the full tarragon vinegar after the recipe of Marie Antoinette—that of Robra, that his lordship withdrew the bill, which had fluttered the Volscians, and dreadfully alarmed the London watercress-and-itinerant-vegetarians. A good man was my Lord Carlton, and a very respectable one. He owed a good deal of money, but he also gave away a good deal; and if Peter was damnified by his laches, Paul profited by his liberality. He went to sleep with commendable regularity at church, at the Opera, in the House —save when the whistling and green-stuff business was afoot—at the club, in the green-rooms of the patent theatres, in the committee-room of the Royal Hospital for Plica Polonica (that beneficent institution which we owe to the munificent patronage of Dr. Quackenbos, and at whose anniversary festivals a royal duke generally takes the chair), and at the board meetings of the Elephant Life Assurance Association. Universally respected and beloved, a D.C.L., and lord-lieutenant in prospective of his county, Lord Carlton had probably little to wish for here below, save a little less gout, and a little more money to pay off his mortgages. He had a lavish larry turn, and had written a stinging article in a review, showing up would-be connoisseurs, who gave enormous sums for pictures by Titian, and he was, just now, occupied in editing the family papers of the Carltons. As the first lord got his coronet through writing a note to Sir Robert Walpole, and the second earned a step in the peerage by selling votes to Mr. Pitt, and the third had created himself Chamberlain to King George the Fourth, much, very much was expected from the Carlton Papers.

And who was the second Pilgrim? Sir William Long. He was thinner, and paler, and looked older, and men said his health was failing him. His hair was slightly grizzled, he ate little and drank less; he had a cough; and he smoked even more persistently than of yore. He was unmarried. He had traveled considerably since we saw him last, and fully earned his status as a Pilgrim. He had been to Japan, he brought home nargehils, papouches, and attar of roses; he had been West, and returned with buffalo robes and moccasins, and tomahawks, and the tails of beavers. His hunting-lodge was hung with the scalps of the Hours he had killed; but he felt a little lonely among the decorated stuffed skull-caps of his slain enemies. They were dead; but what was he to do with the hours which were no more? They had become weighty; but he spent little, so far as was known; drove now no four-in-hand; indulged in no elegant wickedness. The gossip current was that the priests had got hold of him; that by his munificence had been endowed the new bishopric of Adrianopolis in Partibus infidelium; that he had built the oratory of St. Genguldhus up in Northumberland; and that he would probably make an end of it as Brother Sebastian or Brother Ambrose in his shoes and spikes in his girdle. But you and I know what the whispers of the gossips are worth.

And the pair of guests? The Sultan Greyburn is before you. He was in his proper element; he was happy. The pale, handsome woman and the jewel of a body-servant had done all that was possible for him. His linen was of unstinted mind, and had fully made that mind up on the important subject of himself.

The pastry was a delicious one. It was completed by Tom Tuttlesheld. I wish to state that Tom has been dead (worthy soul!) these five years, and that I have been immortalized upon my body. There are a great many people going about the world who would like to be Tom Tuttlesheld, but they can't. Tom was a genius in the art of cheffing a gentleman, and the time of the next Tuttlesheld has not come yet.

Tom was a short man, with a very high head of hair and whiskers, such sparkling blue eyes, such gleaming white teeth, such a dazzling shirt-front, such mirror-like boots, and altogether such a violent and inflammatory state of freshness, that he looked as though he had been boiled, and starched, and ironed, and that his features were so ostentatiously clean, that you might have fancied (but that he was the most harmless under heaven) that he had been in collision with somebody, and scrubbing his knuckles with a flesh-brush to get the blood off. In evening dress he was superb, and wore the Tuttlesheld crest, cut stiff within nickcloth to be seen out of it. Weighty was the responsibility which his trowsers were of so very large and pronounced a check as to give his legs the appearance of undulatory chessboards; and his coat, wore, winter and summer, a white waistcoat, a black watch-ribbon, and a white hat with a deep round fit. Such was the appearance of the making of Tom. In it he was fit for any society. In that white waistcoat he had assisted at a select examination of Bacon's, at the Cambrian saloons of Sennacherib House. Often you might see the white hat, and money vest, and the rubicund perspiring face bending down, on festive and public meetings, down the yard at Tattersall's, and in the lobbies of the Parliament House. They are always in the Lobby of Supply, in spite of the Commons. I don't know why; but I conjecture in consequence of the hat and waistcoat. They looked well in the Lobby. At the Derby receiver had a right to go every where.

You met Tom Tuttlesheld in all kinds of London pentetials, to the Opera-house. At the award-mounting at St. James's you would find him in the midst of the button-wearers, where the colors were, chatting to the other Gunnicmen. At a review in Plumstead marshes who was that individual in a blue coat and brass buttoned coat? Who was that bold civilian riding full split with the chief of the staff? That, by your leave and by the chief's leave too, was Tom—you know him, was Tom Tuttlesheld. Tom was never in the commission of the peace—his commissions were those of a very different description—but you beheld him sitting on the bench, check by jowl with the Middlesex magistrates on licensing days. He was sure to be present at the special days of the public schools, and at the collations afterward. The swan-hopping excursions of the corporation of London; the term-feasts of the Honorable Society of Reynard's Inn (where you dined in a resty dungeon, drank hippocras, and were expected to drink, in Norman-French, to the health of the late Chief Justice Gascoigne), and especially the annual banquets of the Worshipful Company of Chainmail Makers (nearly the last of the City companies who put five-pound notes under the plates of their guests, and cause their beadles to fill the hats of the company with nauseous and pine-apple jelly when they go away: such is the munificence of the Chain-mail Makers, whose Hall has not been rebuilt since the great fire, and whose paraphernalia is in the custody of the head waiter of the Star and Garter);—none of these festive gatherings would have been complete without the presence of Tom Tuttlesheld. He sung so good a song, and told so good a story, had such manners and bowed so low, and heard to regret, almost with tears in their eyes, that That Man was not something in the City, whereby he could likewise have made his fortune. I believe that Tom was free of the Chain Makers, whose stock paid twenty-seven per cent., and that he lived upon his dividends. Others accounted for his means of livelihood by whispering the mysterious word "commission." It was certain that, although Tom was always ready to borrow forty thousand pounds—at seven per cent per cent., not a penny more—for the Earl of Liverton, he never borrowed any money himself. You could not call him a sponge; for though his services were rarely asked to dinner, he never asked to be asked. You had no right to brand him as a tuft-hunter, for he studied nobility and made himself sought by, without seeking the company of, the great. The malevolent only could hint, with a sneer, that Tom's function was to waiter-woman and his father a cab proprietor, so very white and profuse was his linen, and so very frequently was he to be seen issuing forth from the West End to the City in a Hansom. Being a very little man, he naturally carried, at all places of public entertainment, a large opera-glass: and it was highly edifying to watch him at the opera or the theatre, on the first night of a new dancer or a new play, perpetually engaged in sighting a brace of Armstrong guns linked together. You could scarcely sweep the vista of the hill at Epsom of a great actress's equipages, so judge from the neatly-folded and banded copies which were handed to him by boxing publishers when he took his usual place from the Strand every Saturday afternoon. He went frequently to Paris, and was reported to be best people there both English and French. He was a confidential creature. When Sir John Brute, who adored his wife, and who, in the habit of beating her black and blue, had been unusually obstreperous, her ladyship always called in Tom Tuttlesheld, as the person most likely to induce gentlemain Tenstum's minister in her writing-case; and when Mrs. Mujelos threatened to make a scene in the Park, Tom would step forward, discussing china images at her, and the children, terrified by the quarrels of their parents, cast themselves in wild confusion down the nursery stairs, Tom was always called in to restore peace to that distressed household. Thus, welcome every where, Tom Tuttlesheld was not rich. Tom Tuttlesheld. He was not literary; but had once written a song in aid of the funds of a decay fair, and was invited by permission to Miriam Hyem Higgs (great banking family). He was not artistic; yet was supposed to have a certain eye for the picturesque, for he had been examined as a witness before a Fine Art committee, and was considered to be allied to a Fine Art debate, when the report was brought up in the Commons, as "a gentleman of well-known taste." He was not a politician; but he was very active election-time, to be on the Conservative candidate's committee. He was neither financial nor commercial, though he was always most anxious about the price of consols, shook his head when Venezuelan bonds were mentioned, and had been heard to say that Thames Steam was genteelly regarding a sample of Patna rice in the outstretched palm of an eminent wholesale grocer. Tall was Tom, as a little man knows what's what, if that's rice?" the grocer was heard to say. He was undeniably respectable; but always mysteriously where he lived. He was supposed to have a bedroom at a hotel in Jermyn Street, and chambers in Reynard's Inn, and at one time in Gideon Court, Sampson Lane, Cornhill. Yet, granting this slight amount of mystery, and the suspicion of vagueness in the fair fame of Tom Tuttlesheld, for he had been seen lunching on turtle at Birch's with a sergeant of the Life Guards Green, and was currently reported to have an audience with the prime minister every morning, when the pilot was guided into the cabin, he was engaged in a pleasant occupation of shaving. These things become known, and do a man good.

The Pilgrims had reached that agreeable stage when men begin to trifle with the cates before them; to be critical about the vivacious bubbles that rise in the aspect contentedly the checkers in their Madras napkins; to be deeply interested in the hinges of their mitrecockets, to see that the spoons are straight on their filberts, and when they find a withered one to utter a fat sigh, half in the complacency of processive digestion, and half as though they were reflecting, "Such is life;" then to whisk imaginary crumbs from off their knees; then to pull their wristbands and adjust their collars; then to find more flavor in the Chambertin—A very fine wine it sound wine, Tuttlesheld."

"I wish I had a quarter-cask of it, my lord"—than ever the wine-merchant put into it; then to admit that, after all, the old Saxon families surpass the so-called Norman race in purity of blood and antiquity of lineage. "I would rather be Cedric the Saxon than Philippe de Malvoisin," says Lord Carlton, finding two beswings in his port instead of none: to which Tom Tuttlesheld, whose grandfather was the Lord knows whom, cheerfully assents; and finally to yawn, and to think that a mild cigar and a glass of Seltzer with something in it would be about the summum bonum of human felicity. Don't we know every one that these are the fears of unmixed happiness in life, or repeat that vain that man never is but always to be blest. Man is best when he is asked to dine at Greyfriars. The chef would impale himself on his own spit if he heard that any one had been compelled to take cayenne or soda after one of his dinners; the cellar is so good that there is not a bandache in the whole of it; and black care never follows behind the horseman who has his leg in the mahogany stirrups of that friendly club. No British wife is ever angry with her husband for being hidden at dine at the Pilgrims': precisely as no British husband (save a monster) would deny his wife a check if she were about to be presented at court, and desired jewelry or lace.

"But the question is," said Lord Carlton, as they rose from table in beaming mood; "the question is, where shall we go?"

"Strangers can't play cards," remarked Sir William Long.

"Hate cards," added Lord Carlton.

"They are stupid things at best," observed the sultan, lighting. "Give me lazzat."

The baronet looked at him. "You must have oceans of money, Mr. Greyfaunt," he observed.

"Not much, but enough," Edgar replied, with something akin to a blush.

"I am glad to hear it. People call me rich; yet I daren't play at hazard."

"You played too much when you were young, young," the baronet. Who was conscious that Edgar was not very well pleased with the remark, interposed: "Greyfaunt will soon have enough of hazard. He's going, you know, to follow begins to know something about it it's time for him to leave it off. But still, all this by no means helps us to settle the question, 'Where shall we go?'"

"I shall go home," Sir William Long said, wearily.

"You've no home to go to, most misanthropic bachelor, except those dreary chambers in the Albany, where I'm told you never let smoke cigars twenty times too strong for you, and read Crebillon the Younger, or Mrs. Eyres of the Adams. Why can't you don't you fall in love and marry?"

"I never was in love but once," the baronet made answer, gravely, "and that was with a little girl scarcely nine years old. I don't think it could now be in love, for I am very broken now, and she must be a young woman by this time."

"Was the attachment reciprocal?"

"I think so. I never saw her but once in my life; but I gave her some sugar-plums, and she let me kiss her at parting."

"What was her Christian name—sans indiscretion?"

"Lily."

Edgar Greyfaunt pricked up his ears. "Why, I know a little girl called Lily," he cried, "and not so long ago either."

"Not such a very uncommon name," yawned Lord Carlton.

"My aunt adopted a poor relation," put in Thomas Tuttlesheld, "whose name was Hannah; but she was a sentimental woman was my aunt, and changed the girl's name to Lily."

"A most interesting piece of family history," sneered his lordship, who was not to be scarcely knew why, the universally popular Thomas. "Have you many poor relations, Mr. Tuttlesheld?"

"Plenty," answered Tom, cheerfully. "The very poorest of my poor relations has had the honor of sitting for a fourth at the Pilgrims dinner-party at the Pilgrims' Club, Park Lane, this very evening. Hereby Tom managed to tell two birds with one stone: to let Edgar know a Rowland for his Oliver, and to pay Lord Carlton, who was the Amphitryon, a neat little compliment. Edgar Greyfaunt was already somewhat as he replied to the young man. He knew all about Mr. Edgar Greyfaunt. "Why should that gentleman be poor?" he asked, he thought. "Here's a peer of the realm and a rich baronet, who never set a shilling out to nine; yet here's a stock-up young jackanapes, who's barring the cauals at both ends, and in his mouth to have a spoon of silver, and not a penny, has never a civil word to throw at Tom Tuttlesheld. Well: it don't much matter. Hell is paved with good intentions, and Tom never does, and to prophesy that a man would never get on was the severest censure he ever passed on the conduct of an enemy.

"The question," resumed Lord Carlton, anxious to put an end to an embarrassing discussion, "again resolves itself into, 'Where shall we go?'"

They were donning their-great-coats in the hall.

"Come home and smoke with me," suggested the baronet.

"We will smoke, and not go home with thee, hermit of the passage between Piccadilly and Burlington Gardens:" thus Lord Carlton, in his turn, and challenging us all to fight ducks before breakfast; nervous affections brought on by excessive indulgence in tobacco; and Tom Tuttlesheld asleep with his head in the coal-scuttle."

"Come and play lansquenet at my rooms," proposed the sultan. He knew that Tom never played, and would go away (which was the very thing he wanted) if the invitation were accepted; and he would have been delighted to entertain a peer and a baronet, even if he lost money to them.

"Long has forsworn lansquenet, and I prefer whist," objected his lordship. "Can no one propose something else?"

"Why, there are plenty of places to go to," said Thomas, who saw that his peculiar office was now in request, but who had prudently bided his time until the invention of his superiors was exhausted. "You must not be obstinate with the lion, even if you be a jackal. Wait until King Noble begins to scratch his mane with a puzzled air, and turns an inquiring eye toward you! Then you may hint to his majesty, but very discreetly, where you think the nicest antelope is to be found.

"Places to while away an hour positively abound," quoth the diplomatic Thomas. "Will you take a cab down to Pentonville, and see the Grecian? A monstrous queer place, I can assure you. I took an English duke and the Hospodar of Moldavia (who insisted on wearing a false nose, thinking that it was a masquerade) there one night, and they enjoyed themselves immensely. Don't care about going so far? Will you be my guests at an humble little cab in Frith Street, Soho? It is club night. Brattles will be in the chair. You know Brattles, the well-known sculptor of Saxon cattle and the Serpent's Skin. There will be some capital singing, and you'll meet some of the first wits of the day. I'll introduce you all to Mackthorter men, if Mr. Greyfaunt chooses to hide his artistic candle under a bushel."

"I should like to go very much indeed," said Sir William Long.

The Sultan Greyfaunt demurred, on the plea that they would probably be bored. The cabby would have dearly liked to strangle Tom Tuttlesheff for that ill-timed allusion to his artistic genius.

"Try again, Tom," said Lord Carlton, who was thinking what her sensible daughter would say if she were by of the expediency of visiting these wild haunts of dissipation being mooted.

"Well, there's Jones's; but it's too full. There's a new farce at the Lyceum—Potatoes and Pool, or the Can and the Cannon Game; but I know it's stupid to pieces, and the critics has done it into English, and both are stupid. What do you say to a visit to Ranelagh?"

"Ranelagh! I haven't been there for ten years!" exclaimed Sir William.

"Ranelagh! Why, it's midwinter and as cold as Greenland," said Lord Carlton.

"Where is Ranelagh?" asked the Sultan Greyfaunt, with engaging simplicity.

"Sancta Simplicitas Royal, half a mile from the Asylum for Club-foot; two-shilling cab fare," rapidly pursued Thomas. "As to its being winter, that will be just the fun of it. M'Variety, the manager, who took the lease when poor Benjamin Bashael went to the bad, and who is a friend of infinite resources, was the first man to hit on the ingenious notion of opening Ranelagh in winter. The station in the Arctic regions walk are covered up with straw, it is true, but they're beautifully lighted. The room are hot-house, but there's no end to additional lamps. There's an artificial skating-pond, and a Gaslop Infernal on skates, with a full band, at each clock. The lake's boarded over, and the Panorama of Scringapatam has been turned into Moscow at the time of the French invasion. It will be all on fire, and literally at eleven; and Bandeneus, the great gymnast, dressed as the Emperor Napoleon, will cross from the Kremlin to the Church of St. Ivan on the tight rope, and in the midst of a shower of fire-works."

"Accompanied Tom, you speak like a book," said Lord Carlton.

"Or a play-bill," good-naturedly suggested Mr. Greyfaunt.

"You're not far wrong there," returned Thomas, with a sly laugh, "for I help M'Variety (who is an old ally of mine) in every way to make out his programmes. Come, my lords and gentlemen. Shall it be Ranelagh? The price of admission has been reduced from half a crown to one shilling. There are a concert-room, a dancing-pavilion, an exhibition of new inventions from Paris, and the property of the celebrated Florentine anatomical artist Signor Ventinelli-hoti. There is the Wolverian Troupe of Bounding Brothers of the Western Prairies; there is a ballet-theatre; and, finally, there is a circus, where Zenobia Trafalgar, the celebrated equestrian, is to make her first appearance this very night on her trained charger Consuat, dressed à la Cosaque; the bills say nothing of what that may be I have not the slightest notion. We shall be just in time to see her."

Consuat proved an old name for a horse. Poor Frank Blunt—Griffin Blunt they used to call him; he came to a sorry end in Paris the other day—we learn it was a cancelled document. Deuced clever fellow he was too. Dressed hair and made oaracas perfumes wonderfully. Robbed his master, I dare say. No, I think Blunt must have robbed him. A shocking rip was Frank, poor fellow!

"There is a man called Constant who keeps Pomeroy's Hotel, where I staid when I came to town," Sir Knight remarked, in reply to Lord Carlton. The nobleman had sent away his brougham, and the banner his cab, which were waiting at the club door by this time; and the distinguished quartet, cancened in an humble four-wheeled cab, were on their way to the famous gardens of Ranelagh. "I wonder whether it's the same Constant? These valets often save money and set up hotels."

"There is a river in Macedon, and there is a river in Monmouth," observed Sir William Long, "and I can't see what your Constant or any body's Constant has to do with the lady's horse at Ranelagh. I wonder who this Madame Kressitzin is? Those horse-riding women change their names so often. I know there is one of them whom I should like to find."

THE SONG OF THE BLUE-BELLS.

HARK! what do the blue-bells say,
As they ring their fairy chime,
Tinkling their music through the airy
In the summer's early prime?

They're nodding in elfish glee
As I slowly pass along,
And merrily mocking me
In their tinkling, whispering song.

I sit by the old oak-tree,
At my feet a rushing stream;
And here my wild heart beats free
As I lie awake and dream.

I list to that floral peal,
As it joyously wafts me a ring,
While sad mem'ries o'er me steal
Of the past, as thus they sing:

"Our summer is bright and brief,
But, ere clouds pass o'er the sky,
To tell of a coming grief,
We wither away and die!"

As I muse on joy that's past
I envy each bending bell,
And wish that my fate were cast
With them in their quiet dell.

THE WINDOW OF NO. 4, POHL.

How came the window open on that stormy morning? At what hour was it? Mary, the sister of young hearts and old heads. Two young people falling in love with each other; a person in the shape of a fatal disproving; the love lover poor, the father rich; the girl divided between duty and affection for her parent and passionate tenderness for her lover; and Love triumphing in the long-run, as he generally does.

This was why the parlor window stood wide open that stormy morning; for at twelve the night before she had come down to him, wrapped in white furs and a snowy hood, and had sobbed, "Oh, Charles, I can very, very wicked, and unless Pa forgives me God never will!" which theological statement Charles considered to be quite correct, beyond a doubt (to his own heart at least) that there was no harm in marrying whom one loved.

Pleading against the storm, which now and then no danger of being heard amidst the gusts of wind and the creaking of the bare elm branches, she let down the veil which had been blown against his breast to keep himself warm, helped the lady in, with a gruff sort of sympathy. And away they glided, she had scarcely time before them, and the view now about them, falling softly, softly over them, and James's hand lying upon Charles's breast, and her little fur-clad form nestled close to his. They were foolish little people, but not wicked, whom two black heavens covered over the white snow to Hymen's altar that bitter winter's night so long ago.

When they found that balcony window open in the gray morning's dawn, and found also a penitential letter blotted with tears, and an empty bed, the pillow of which was also blotted, pathetic pursuit was useless; for Janet Grey had promised to love, honor, and obey Charles Oliver, and he had vowed to love and cherish her until death did them part.

"Forgive them—never!" So passionate old Robin Grey vowed, with many an expletive not to be written here. Forgive her, indeed! He hurried in his broom to sting him at last. From his heart and his home she had gone forth of her own free-will, and an exile from both she should remain forever.

Poor Janet, she loved her father dearly. Poor old man, he had no one on earth but that pretty and petted daughter, and her death was as dead to his life before her as a baby might have had.

She had married Charles Oliver in spite of the Bonnie Lassie, who made voyages to the East Indies and brought home cargoes of spices and sweetmeats, and many other rich and rare treasures, but who did not always bring home those who went with her; for in those warm latitudes fevers are rife, and many an English merchant-seaman is plucked from his moorings to the Spice Islands, while at home many a young wife has watched for the ship only which should return her husband to her more.

Three months of innocent delirium, the world forming under her dazzled eyes, and only beauty to breathe its air. Then came the awakening. Bully Captain Thomas broke the dream with his "Ahoy, mermaids, where away?"

They were rambling together in the shady paths of Washington Parade Ground, and he came upon them.

"How are you, Captain? Glad to see you. This is my wife." And how pretty she was to show the pretty child, with her long curls and blue eyes and dainty waist and waxen white hands with her six-inch hanger and pistols in her belt! Bully Captain!

The Captain bowed. "Heered you was spliced," he said. "You couldn't have moored alongside of a prettier craft, any lad. Though she don't look as though she'd weather through a storm. Never expect to follow your example myself though. The Bonnie Lassie is my wife. You know she sails today week."

"Ay, say," said Charlie. Why should I forget?"

"Sunset bette r t. think on; p'raps," said the Captain. "Fair weather, shipmate. Respects, mum."

And away he went, feet wide apart, hands in both pockets, and gait that of one who, used to a rolling vessel, seems when on land always to expect the world to give a sudden lurch, and who tries to be on his guard against it.

Janet looked up into Charlie's face with fearful eyes.

"What did he mean, Charlie?"

"He is Captain Thomas, of the Bonnie Lassie, love."

"Well?"

"That's all, dear."

"And the Bonnie Lassie is your ship?"

"Yes."

"And she sails to-morrow week?"

"To-day week."

"Charlie!"

"Love."

"Of course the horrible thought never entered your mind of going with her."

"I must."

"Oh no; you want to frighten me. I couldn't live, you know, Charlie. I feel like fainting. I'm all alone. I have nobody. Pa will never speak to me again. Charlie, laugh—say 'It's all fun, Janet.'"

"I wish I could. My dear, you knew your husband was a sailor when you married him."

"Yes; but I never thought he would be so cruel as to leave me. Charlie, I really think I shall die."

Her pretty baby face was so white and wan, and her hands so cold, that he was frightened. They sat down upon the bench together, and Janet imagined to go with him—only to go with him any where and any how.

"A long dangerous voyage. He could not think of it." And her answer was:

"A dangerous voyage! And I to stay at home and listen and hear the winds blow, and think of you, Charlie, stay at home if you care for me."

Poor Charlie! He held her to his breast in the shadow of the Castle Rock, and tried to teach her her first lesson—how money must be earned, and how men must earn it; how a sailor bred could be no thing but a sailor, save as a man he must discharge his duty, and never have to think that he had dragged her from the sheltered home of luxury to offer poverty and all its ills; how, in fact,

"Men must work and women must weep.
And the sooner 'tis over the sooner to sleep."

It was very hard to learn, and the poor girl-wife could not comprehend it. As for going with him, old Captain Thomas, an old-fashioned sailor, who thought a female Jonah ought to be at the stern oars, and never studied navigation out of book, but fought his way up from cabin-boy—that old sailor-worn veteran had no sentiment at all save a woman on board, in view of all manner of traditionary ill-luck—storms, shipwrecks, etc., etc. There comes some such episode to every young wife in a modified form.

Janet could see no necessity for this voyage. Only cruel choice.

That fortnight all tears and lamentation. That parting for six months—six eternities to her. Charlie had left her just enough in dear to buy loving hearts to fill this world and leave a surplus for some other.

At last the day came, and he left her falsting and went away crying like a child.

Then Janet sat down all alone, and thought that she should die. When her tears refused to flow so freely as at first, which was not for many weeks, she found some comfort in an old piano, a sweet-toned thing, and very, very shabby, that stood in the parlor of her boarding-house, but her songs were always sad; a mournful dirge dying in her soul was calling for her mate could not have uttered notes more pitiful to listen to. Only now and then when a letter came was she roused up for a while. Then at last six months were gone and there came no letter. The ship must be at hand, that of course was it. He thought that she was very, very soon; but no Charlie came: those who waited for the Bonnie Lassie saw her not. No letter, no Charlie: another month—another month—another—still no news. One morning she stood by the window watching, and the landlady came to her. She was a good woman, and particularly fond of her boarding-house girl. She kept her out of poverty, and this blue-eyed girl was a boarder after all. So she said: "Mrs. Oliver, I don't like to tell you—but—but—"

"Oh you've heard ill news of Charlie!" and Janet, turning swift and white, clung to her arm.

"No, my dear. Oh no, thank goodness, it's quite different! Your husband paid your board for six months in advance, you know."

"Yes."

"Well—ahem. It's—it's nearly ten months since he went, and—and—I'm afraid you've disobeyed, very often, and, the fact is, can you pay me?"

"I? Oh no. Charles—Mr. Oliver will settle with you the moment he returns."

"Y-e-s—but it's no use missing matters, my dear. If he never does, you'll not see me—and he will come back? The sea is treacherous, and they say sailors are also, 'a wife in every port,' There, now, you haven't got a lover in your eye, or somebody who will help you?"

"My father, I'll go to my father," said poor Janet. "He will forgive me now;" and she left the house as a weary child might have done, longing for the parent who had used to be her shelter. Far out of town the homestead stood, and its doors were locked, and its windows barred against the thieves. Janet questioned at her summons: she had anticipated that, and written a few lines begging that he would see her. They were returned to her. On the envelope was written, "I have no longer a daughter: she is dead to me."

Janet Oliver went back to the city boarding-house, and there that night a babe was born to her. A wailing thing that struggled for life and was it at last; and Janet, struggling against her inner faith that a fragment of her Charlie's life lay there, and clung to it as drowning men will cling to the frailest floating thing. But for those little hands—those strange, ignorant eyes, that precious nothing holding the embryo soul, Charlie Oliver's wife would have let go of life and floated away upon the sea of death that night. Her baby kept her alive; and now her watch, her rings, her little jeweled keepsakes began to go—by-and-by her costlier clothes, the white furs she had wrapped herself in when she eloped that night with him. One by one every thing went, save some cotton gowns, her hood, and a large shawl. At last came the climax.

She stood with her babe before the landlady, and the woman said, though not unkindly,

"Mrs. Oliver, I am sorry for you; but you have a father, and he must keep you—can't." And Janet took her child and went out into the midwinter afternoon. She had no hope of her father's pity: but she said, "We can die, my child and I," within sight of the old house; and perhaps he may forgive us when he sees me dead." Then another hope entered her soul; she would wrap the child up carefully; the little one might live, and he would have mercy on that for its mother's sake.

Poor girl, she had no money for a stage-fare; she plodded on through the cold streets and out upon the weary road for hours; and it grew dark and darker: night was rung from the city clocks, nine, ten, and only then, by the clear frosty moonlight, she saw the roof of her father's house, and with the alien about it feelless as they had been when she had fled from it with Charlie Oliver.

She had matured her plans, and dragged her weary steps to the porch. Upon it those deep windows opened to the ground. There she would lie down, and in the morning they would find her there dead. Ah, poor child! I hardly dare tell what she had done, it was so wicked: but she was very miserable. At the bottom of her pocket lay a vial labeled "laudanum."

So at last she stood before those windows, and one of them was open—wide open at half past ten on a night in midwinter!

God had ordained it for her. So she said. And even then she knew not the strange truth of her words.

"Oh, my home!" she wailed, softly. "Oh, my father! I will go in. I will lie in my little bed. I will die there, and my baby will be and all good angels help me to be a better child to father than I have been."

So she crept in on tip-toe, unfastening her shoes, and leaving them without, that she might make no noise whatever.

She gained her little room. By the moonlight she saw that it was just as she had left it, and must have been carefully kept from change. The sleeping-place with upon the old-fashioned bed, and she thought of her garments lying in the bureau drawers. Were they there yet? It would be more homely to die clean, fresh, and pure than in those travel-stained clothes which she wore. So she peeped in, and found the white raiment, and knelt on, and took the knelt to pray, and pray with a vial of poison in one hand, with mad suicide in her heart.

As she knelt she faced the door, and her eye glancing thither, she saw a light glancing up and down the wall, and heard a footstep. Could it be her father? He crept to the door and looked. Along the stairs came the man-servant bearing a light, coming stealthily with a strange look on his face—the strange look a servant will but turned her from the door by her father's orders months before, and whose wicked face she haunted her evening. Where was he going—what was he going to do?

She watched him with a heart suddenly stilled in its beating, and saw him enter her father's chamber door.

Then she made haste to follow him as fast as her trembling limbs would carry her. Not one soon was she saw a the crept in an open safe, a rifled chest, papers and gold upon the floor, and the servant's hand upon her father's throat struggling.

She uttered a shriek and sprang forward. In prison afterward the villain said he fancied her a spirit, and that it struck him with fear. He started up, half arose, and with this opportunity the strong and vigorous old man recovered his surprise, and struck him down on the floor beside him.

He knew his child; he knew she had saved him; but this was no time to think of that. He only said, "Hold the villain, Janet, and call John, the coachman." And Janet obeyed. In a few moments that wiry rascal on the floor had no chance of escape: he was bound hand and foot before the window.

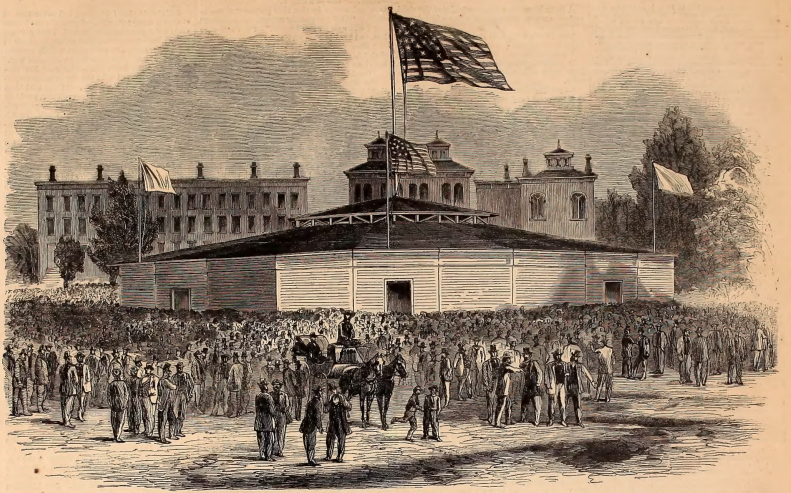
And Janet was in her father's arms. She had left him to his bed where her baby lay, and had told him all. He had known nothing of her woe, even of the baby's birth. For he had been ill, very ill indeed in her young love, ungrateful to him. God had left the door open indeed, though the intruders had been a murderous servant at hand, who, fearful of the watchful ear of honest John, had thought to steal out noiselessly through it. Janet was restored to her father, and her father's life and to creep into his heart once more.

The Bonnie Lassie, and good old Captain Thomas, and a host of honest sailors sailed out next again, for the sea opened its great arms and enfolded them to its breast forever. But a little island in the ocean had room enough for some food, and, with so much to live for, Charles Oliver battled with the waves, and with thirst, and hunger, and death itself, and survived, and watched, and prayed, and waited, feeding on roots, and berries, and strange fruits until at last night and day a sail was seen, and love's prayer and the voice of living man greeted him once more.

He came home to Janet, and long ago forgiven by her father in his fancied death he was not refused forgiveness living.

And so the old love-dreams were realized, and the shadows banished, and as much of joy as can come to earthly beings came to those who lived together in the old homestead among the elms. And to her children, in the twilight, ay, and to her grandchildren, perhaps, by this time, Janet Oliver has often told the story of the open window on the porch.

DEDICATED TO THE CHICAGO CONVENTION.



VIEW OF THE TENT IN WHICH THE DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION IS TO BE HELD, AT CHICAGO, AUGUST 29, 1864.

THE CHICAGO CONVENTION.

We give on this page portraits of C. L. VALLANDIGHAM and FERNANDO WOOD, the leaders of the Peace Party; also a view of the WIGWAM in which the Democratic Convention is to be held on Monday the 29th. These two gentlemen recently held a Peace Convention at Syracuse, New York, the object of which was to coerce the Chicago Convention by a vast popular demonstration in favor of peace. The meeting was of no significance. They each made speeches, earnestly begging the people by their fear of severe wounds and of heavy taxes not to resist the rebellion any longer with arms, but to settle our difficulties by compromise. As our "difficulties" are nothing but the armed resistance of certain citizens to the laws, with the declared intention of destroying the Government, it is not easy to understand what kind of compromise with them is possible, except submission to the degradation of the Government. The plan of Messrs. VALLANDIGHAM and WOOD undoubtedly contemplates a temporary separation, with the hope of an ultimate reunion upon terms that will permanently secure the Southern ascendency. Of course there is as yet no open declaration of such a scheme, but no man familiar with our politics and with the course of these two leaders will doubt it. Their silence, and the studied manner in which they always speak of the Union as endangered by the loyal men of the North, instead of the rebels at the South, and the constant declaration that the authority of the Government can not be maintained by force, are sufficiently significant of their views.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM was first notorious as the squire of Mr. MASON, of Virginia, at the time of the JOHN BROWN enterprise, when he endeavored to extort from the old man something that would implicate in a conspiracy the leaders of the political party to which Mr. VALLANDIGHAM was opposed. This unhandsome trick, in which certain gentlemen in New York took part, signally failed; and a suit at law being brought against the New York gentlemen by Mr. GERRIT SMITH, the effort was exposed to merited contempt. Since then Mr. VALLANDIGHAM has been a steady friend of the rebels.

Of Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, who was first notorious for a suit brought against him for swindling by his partner, Mr. MARVIN, and who as Mayor of the city of New York regretted to ROBERT TOOMBS that he could not connive at the sending of arms destined for the slaughter of loyal citizens, the New York Herald of August 22, 1864, says: "His appropriate sphere is that of a ward politician, and he displays himself to singularly bad advantage whenever he vainly attempts to appear like any thing else."

INTERESTING ITEMS.

AMONG recent demolitions in Paris is that of the old well-known MORNAC. A much larger MORNAC has been erected on the island immediately behind Notre Dame. Its one apartment, lighted in the most effective manner, is twelve stairs of black marble, on which the fortunate tenant will be found. Another apartment are fourteen similar stairs, destined for bodies that have been so decomposed that they cannot go in lodged possible. Bathrooms are abundantly supplied with water, which falls continuously in the basin in a rain. The clothes appertaining to the latter are suspended in a cool, certain proof of a year. Summer, and, unless of mum, and women received at the of the 2851 bodies which have been deposited during the past ten years, 1705 are set down as the result of suicide, and concerning the remainder no information is given. It appears that self-destruction is at its maximum in the months of May and June, at its minimum in October, November and December. Between 10 and 15, and dwindles to almost nothing after 70, while it is not surprising, the suicides which are committed after the age of 70 years. As regards the means employed for this each there must be a margin left for imperfection of judgment,—it appears that twenty-five suicidal men commence razors and disgust of life, each, for about one month; absolute poverty for nearly the same proportion; misery and insuitable disappointment, for a little more than a month; next, and close upon these, come disgusted with domestic misery, and insecurity of the mind, for about the termination of theft stands for about 1 in 26; false and disappointed love, 1 in 28; and vengeful love, 1 in 30; fear and dishonor, 1 in 35; and vengeful love, 1 in 36; the remainder are of others about 1 in 57. This, however, applies only to the male sex. In the case of women the causes of life flee, disappointed affection second, disgust fifth; third, domestic misery, fourth, vengeful love, fifth; the mind sixth, and insurable disease seventh.

As regards the mode adopted, out of the 1705 men reported by the Morgue, 1414 had recourse to drowning, 114 to hanging, 94 to firearms, 56 to the fume of charcoal, 46 precipitated themselves from buildings or other elevated places, 18 made use of sharp weapons and instruments, 13 had recourse to poison, 7 threw themselves beneath railway trains or carriages, and 4 killed themselves by swallowing alcohol. Another table informs us that more than one third of the cases of these suicides were committed between the hours of six in the morning and mid-day; while the 24 hours of the afternoon are responsible for the smallest number, not one-sixth as compared with the all the preceding hours of the day.

The number of females who committed suicide is scarcely more than a fifth of that of the male sex. As to the fair proof of the influence of misery on suicide—unless, indeed, it be not rather a superabundance of wealth—only about one in six of the suicides was buried at the expense of his family or friends.

THERE is a new style for the fancy seating in Pennsylvania. At the Mansion House Restaurant at Chester in that State rooms about one wire fringe were put out on one occasion. Some of the citizens of the borough, who seldom ever went fishing before, and who had no fish in hand, came down to the fray fields. Several gentlemen report a morning's work at forty-eight.

MR. ARNOLD, in his "European Mosaics," suggests an spelling idea as to the future of Rome, the "Eternal City." He says that Rome, which once was the capital of the vast cemetery, becoming more and more deserted by the miasma spreading from its ruins, that which are now are depopulated and deserted, and the time may come when the city will be no longer habitable, and when the Papacy itself be blighted, and go forth a wanderer over the World.

AGNES STRICKLAND, in her "Lives of the Queens of England," in giving an account of the reverses which befell Queen Mary on her flight from Calais, after her accession, says: "The Queen's gratitude took a very old form in the case of the Duke of Alva. She was a widow, childless, and in a great fear of surviving her head; and, considering that he ended his days in a monastery as penance, he persuaded Queen Mary he knew to her his head-cap in her royal presence. She knew that he was a confirmed invalid, and let him leave to wear one, but two night-caps, if he pleased. His patent for the latter privilege, perhaps, was the first on rats." Know ye, that we do give to our well-beloved and trusty cousin, Ferdinand, Duke of Alva, Knight of the Golden Fleurster, and Lord of Egremond and Barnell, liberty and power to wear his cap, or, if more than one, any two of them, at his pleasure, as well in our presence as in the presence of any other person or persons, whatsoever this realm, or any other place in our dominions wherever, during his life, and bear over our letters this, in full sufficient warrant in his behalf." The Queen's seal, with the Garter round it, is affixed to the royal document.

A SMALL picture, not larger than a plate, said to be painted by Jacques Callot, in only twelve years of his brush sold at the Hotel Drouot. It represents Charles IX. of France, and was knocked down to Baron de Rothschild for 3700 francs.

A WITNESS of a single char character was celebrated lately at a church in Yorkshire, England. Miss Sheepshanks led to the altar four blushing brides, sisters, of the name of Preston, aged respectively 30, 28, 26, and 24. Both brothers was born in the same month of the year as his bride, and each bride was eight days younger than her husband. The bridegrooms were all widower and the brides were orphans, and were all married in their own parish church. Such a fortuitous concurrence of singular circumstances is a great deal in divergences and brides will make happy husbands and wives.

THE fumes of burning coffee are powerful disinfectants. Experiments have been made at Paris to prove that the insanity of meat was hung up in a closed room until decomposed, and by burning coffee it was entirely cured. Six grammes of coffee thrown on the fire. In a few minutes the disagreeable odor completely disappeared. The room subjected to hydrogen and ammonia were developed, and 30 grammes of coffee were burned with the same result in a minute. It is also stated that coffee destroys the smell of smoke, and of the most wretched.

THE following is a description of an interesting encounter which lately took place between a lion tamer and a lion elephant. When the elephant was brought to the Paris Jardin d'Acclimatation it was very unwilling to be harnessed against this terrible adversary without evincing the slightest fear, and attempted to hide its head in the wood him; but the elephant, exhibiting an equal agility in his sudden, pounced upon him, overthrowing him, and held attacked him in front; but, every where confronted by the formidable tusks with interposed as a moving barrier, he did not succeed in wounding him. At last, in one of the rushes he fell seized the elephant's trunk in his head beneath the tusks; but, before he could penetrate the bony side of the animal's head, he fell to the ground. The latter only saw the elephant bend his head slightly, and with his powerful tusks, which he held in his trunk, struck upon the back of the bull. From that moment the bull was the lion of combat, and when they afterwards met in the ring it was found that three ribs were completely crushed by the blow. Immediately he encountered the elephant had made in holding him with his tusks.

PRACTICAL and native shrewdness has long ago taught the Russian peasant that the appearance of large quantities of carrion being taken into his animal system; important against the cold of that country, and still more against the to a new cause in the large quantity of grain brand he consumes. Russian peasants bonds a day provided with a loaf of brown during harvest, over and above his kvass, or bottle of edible, and a salted cucumber, mushrooms, cabbage, and not unfrequently cupfuls of beef. The rest of bread he prefers it raw, and prefers it for the same reason that the acute Scottish plowman clings to his oaten cake, and discerned long before the days of Liebig, that it was chemically more strengthening to assimilate three than strengthening to assimilate three than strengthening to assimilate three pounds of bread than four. So here, then, we have the Russian peasant, as well as most other articles of his food, dried up in ovens, and he takes himself off, on Sundays and holidays, with sunflower oil, the hardy denizens of the steppes and forests, or the coarser over-the-steppe flour, by, is able to prosecute his work through all seasons of the year in spite of even Siberian weather.

FREAR FARM.

A GRAY horse and a yellow-wheeled chaise stood under the poplars which shaded a brown farm-house.

"Marg'ret!"

Mrs. Frear's voice went ringing up the stairway to the east chamber.

"Yes, 'm."

It was a cheery voice that replied, and a trim little figure which came tripping down after the voice.

"Aunt Mary has come, and I want you to go and shell the peas for dinner while I visit with her."

"Yes, 'm," again, as the worthy Mrs. Frear took her basket of shelling, walked briskly down the path, and climbed to a seat beside her sister.

You see she was a cripple, this Aunt Mary, and in her widely-scattered thought of slightest favors the chaise in which she came. Consequently that which took Sarah away in its old chinks more general information than ever crammed the examination of any mortal carriage since the flood. It was, in short, a perambulating encyclopedia of births, marriages, and deaths, past, present, and prospective, for the little town of Heathen.

In it they were nestled, this June morning, two white-haired women; their backs were turned to the sun, while Dobbin cropped the lilac twigs, mumbling them after a solemn, reflective fashion, quite cognizant the while of the movement of tongues behind him.

Within doors a tidy kitchen, great squares of sunlight lying out on the unpainted floor, and Margaret bowing a low song to herself over the basket of peas.

"Guess who!" rang out a merry voice behind her, and two brown hands drew her backward blindfold.

"Anon! But what will father say?"

"Nothing! I'll run and imagine. I left him down in the two-acre lot with Pruan Sykes. They'd just begun with original sin, and they've got to get through election and the decrees of, to say nothing of the probable fate of the heathen world. They're safe enough for the next two hours," said the young man, throwing his straw-hat upon the floor.

A bread-shouldered, straight-limbed fellow was Anson Hoar, and so still thought Mrs. Frear in the low kitchen, his curls just missed brushing the cross-beam overhead.

"Mother!" and again suggested the girl.

"Oh, I knew what would become of her when I saw Aunt Mary's Dobbin coming up the hill. They're having a good time over there, I heard every name just as I leaped over the fence. So now, if you please, I'll sit down, though you haven't asked me to, and shell peas for dinner as soon as you can, whatever you choose to call it, for my transgression." He drew up a low chair, and sat down beside her.

"But, Anson," she still remonstrated, "I'm afraid this is not right."

"Of course you are, and of course I know 'tisn't! But I know of something that's wrong; and that is, for you father and mother to keep me waiting as they've known how fond we are of each other, and for no reason under heaven than that I'm an orphan and you're poor. I beg your pardon, Margaret, I beg pardon, Margaret." And the young man's face flushed indignantly. Margaret said nothing, and we went on:

"However, it's the last time I shall trouble him, or cross your scruples again for the present."

"The last time?" Margaret opened her eyes wide with her thumb, and looked up inquiringly.

"Yes, the very last time! I'm going away—going to-night." The flush had gone out of his face, and instead was a look of fierce determination.

"California!" The pod was opened, and a round dozen of peas rolled across the kitchen floor. Callifornia! Margaret looked to her, little girl, sitting in that Vermont farm-house.

"But, Anson, isn't it a dreadfully wicked place? Are there Indians, and cannibals, and bad as the Hottentots 'most?"

"Don't know, I'm sure, Maggie. I only know that there's gold, and I'm going to find it out out there. Oh! you ought to hear Jim Bartlett talk. You'd think twas mighty slow work getting a living or digging money out."

"I know—but, Anson, seems to me 'twould be better to stay in a Christian country," said she, unfaithfully.

"I declare, Margaret, you're well-nigh as bad as Uncle John. He says he'd better steal a horse, and get out from a country where everybody cheats and lies." Anson laughed his old merry laugh. Margaret remembered it. It was years before she heard that laugh again.

Then there was a pause. The cat dozed upon the cattle, and the tea-kettle sang upon the hearth.

"And will you write, Anson, back, Anson?" asked the girl.

"When I can bring something with which to make a home of my own," he said; and there was another silence.

The peas were shelled, and Margaret was sitting with her two hands folded upon the top of the basket. Anson sat gazing at her with a hungry look in his eyes. Then he arose, and went to the window. The small head with its heavy coil of hair at the back, the long-lashed downcast eyes—he took them all in with that look. How many nights in the years that came after did he see in the darkness that little figure parting the shadows come and go before him!

"Here's something I found for you," he said at length, laying in her hand a small gold cross. "You'll wear it sometimes, and remember me, I know."

She did not move. Only her fingers were like ice as he touched them, and her face was pale.

"I must go now," he said, rising.

Margaret rose with him, and opened the door.

She raised her eyes now, and Anson stood looking down into them—those clear, brown eyes—and holding her two hands in his.

"Do you think you can wait for me, little girl?" he said. "It'll be a long while. We shall be old man and woman by that time perhaps," trying to smile. "Will you wait for me until I come back?"

"I will wait for you forever!" The words were low, and her lips were very white.

"Bless you, child! But, please Heaven, you shan't have to wait as long as that;" and he drew her closer to him.

"Good-by, and God bless you, Margaret!"

She felt his arm drawn tightly round her, knew that his lips touch her cheek, and then she sank down upon the floor, her face buried in the cushions of the old chair.

"Why, Margaret, what air ye doin'?" cried good Mrs. Frear. "Here 'tis twelve o'clock this blessed minute, and the fire all out! What will yer father say?"

Mrs. Frear had begun a vigorous attack upon the cooking-stove, but stopped short as Margaret, rising wearily, stood before her with blanched, bewildered face.

"Why what ails the child! Bless me, she looks as if she'd had a stoke!" A stoke, indeed, but not exactly of the kind to which her mother referred.

Margaret vaguely looked around her eyes heavily, as with an effort. "It's nothing, mother," she said. "I must have been a little faint. That's all."

"I ain't enough, I should think. You just come into my room and lie down on my bed, and I'll make you a bowl of sage tea. Mercy to me! I think there's Aunt Mary's chaise! Your father told me that was provailin' in Barnet. Just let me look o' yer tongue!" and the good woman bustled about Margaret, pushing and bowing her into the solicitude for her child, quite oblivious of dinner and all other minor considerations.

And Margaret lay down upon the snowy pillows, while Anson, all his worldly effects packed in one valise, took his way on foot to the next stage-town. And when, after a toll mon stage-town. And when, after a toll mon stage-town. And when, after a toll mon forever. It seemed likely now that she would. It was so long to wait. Would he never come back to claim her promise? If he were alive. But what if he were dead? They all supposed he was. Perhaps he was. Every one she loved had died. Why not this one? And if he were dead was her promise binding? Something outside of herself seemed to suggest this. She looked away through the darkness. A bright light gleamed from among the maples on the hill. It came from the low-window of Squire Varnum's library. Margaret watched it a moment, thinking then of her own little room at Mrs. Kittredge's. It was a contrast certainly. A word of hers would place her under the cheery lamplight of that library, with all those old books looking down, and Squire Varnum's genial face looking down also. Should she speak the word? But between her and any such answer there came her own voice of old, promising to "Wait forever." And she remembered too well Anson's "Please Heaven, you shall never have to wait so long," to forget it now. And so she would trust God. Wait and hope still, though it should be hoping against hope.

And then the shadows deepened, and the flames of sunset burned to ashes down the west, and the figure of the lonely girl was lost in the gloom of the porch.

She started suddenly. Something brushed against her foot. Only the cat; she had forgotten her until that moment.

"Come puss," she said. "You shall go too;" and taking the old creature in her arms she went down the walk and the gate swung behind her, and she passed out into the night.

"The Frear Farm to be sold to-day," they said. An auction was sent to the dwellers in this quiet land of farms. Early in the afternoon the old vendue-master was upon the stand, shouting and gesticulating as only he could; and he done justice to a more hotly contested sale. There were, in fact, but two competitors for the farm, Squire Varnum and Deacon Hall. The latter had just risen twenty-five dollars above the price set by his opponent.

"The Deacon's got it now," said a voice in the crowd, but just then there appeared a new figure upon the scene.

On the street, in front of the house, just under the poplars, a wagon had stopped, and a tall man, bronzed and weather-beaten, stood erect in it, looking down upon the crowd with a keen, steady eye.

"Twenty-five hundred dollars!" shouted the auctioneer, "I've offered twenty-five hundred dollars for Frear Farm! Who bids again? Going, gentleman! Too cheap by half. Going!"

Every one awaited the last "Gone," when a voice sang out, deep and clear as a bell,

"Twenty-six hundred dollars!"

The auctioneer turned face about to a man, and scanned the new-comer.

"Twenty-six hundred and twenty-five!" vociferated Deacon Hall, bolstering his supposed possession suddenly taking to itself wings.

"Twenty-six hundred!" shouted the stranger, leaping from his wagon with a bound, and striding through the crowd. He reached the stand just as the hammer came down.

"Gone for twenty-seven hundred to—. What name, Sir?" and the vendue-master turned to the stranger.

"My fellow-townsman ought to do me the honor to remember that, Sir," he replied, with a merry twinkle in his eyes.

"By all the powers! I believe it's Anson Beloe!" exclaimed the old man, taking the stranger by the arm, and turning him toward the light.

"The same, Sir;" and Anson extended his hand cordially.

"Well done, boy, and well grown too! Why, what a giant you are! Might a ben one o' the sons of Anak the Scripture tells about," said Deacon Hall, looking up at him.

"And so you've come back to settle down among us. That's right, hearty right;" and they pressed round to shake hands with him.

"Where's your wife, Anson?" asked one.

"Haven't found her yet," was the laughing rejoinder.

But he did find her.

Margaret, sitting alone in the dusk, heard a step coming down the walk. "The auctioneer," she said. Well, she was ready for him. She had been schooling herself all day. She would be brave and not falter when he told her that the old homestead was gone. To whom? she wondered; and then the light from her eyes was darkened, and then rang out again the merry challenge,

"Guess who comes now!"

Poor Margaret, she had been ready for the auctioneer—ready for almost any thing, she thought; but not for this. So she gave a little cry, and would have fallen to the floor. Then two strong arms supposed; how Anson took her up in his strong arms and carried her to the sofa, and how Mrs. Kittredge ran for water and the "camfire bottle;" and the household generally was thrown into a state of confusion.

"Poor little creature, 't was all so sudden!" said Mrs. Kittredge, soothingly, as she bathed Margaret's white face. "But she'll come out on in a minute."

And Anson held the light form so easily, as though it were a child; and when Margaret's eyes came to herself again, there he was, looking down at her with the same old look in his eyes.

"I've come to stay," he said, and she smiled a little, bright, happy smile.

"She's had a hard time of it, poor thing!" said Mrs. Kittredge, stopping to take off her spectacles and wipe them. Anson turned his head aside. There was a mist before his eyes just then.

And so it came to pass one Sunday evening that the minister walked over to Frear Farm, and there was a quiet little wedding in the old parlor. And now, while I am telling you this, I can just catch the gleam of their lamp through the lilac bushes; and I know that within there is love, and plenty, and peace.

ARCHBISHOP M'CLOSKEY.

We give on this page a portrait of the Reverend JOHN M'CLOSKEY, the successor of JOHN HUGHES in the Archbishopric of New York. Formerly the bishop of the diocese of Albany, Dr. M'CLOSKEY was known as one of the most polished and eloquent orators of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States. He was born in Brooklyn, New York, and after the usual course of education was ordained a priest. On the 10th of March, 1844, he was ordained Bishop of Axieren and coadjutor to Dr. HUGHES, then Bishop of New York. Three years later he became the Bishop of Albany, being the first prelate of that see, as the diocese was then first established. St. Mary's, one of the four Catholic Churches of Albany, he made his cathedral. In the entire diocese there were about forty churches, none of them without a regular clergyman. The Catholic population were scattered over a large territory, were for the most part poor, and had to struggle against the prejudices of the surrounding people. Dr. M'CLOSKEY had therefore no easy task before him in carrying out his zealous plans for the Catholic Church. But he went to work with earnestness.

One of the bishop's first projects was the institution in Troy of a Female Orphan Asylum, which he placed under the control of the Sisters of Charity. In 1851 the Christian Brothers opened the Academy of Saint Joseph in the same town; and the same year the Sisters of Charity opened a hospital which has in a single year received 789 patients. The next year a Female Seminary was founded in Albany by a colony of the Sisters of the Sacred Heart. In 1853 Dr. M'CLOSKEY opened in Utica an Academy for boys, at the cost of more than $17,000.

The diocese of Albany includes all of the State of New York lying north of forty-two degrees north and east of the eastern line of Cayuga, Tompkins, and Tioga counties. After a service of seventeen years Dr. M'CLOSKEY left his diocese one hundred and thirteen churches, eight chapels, fifty-four minor stations, eighty-five missionaries, three academies for boys and one for girls, six orphan asylums, and fifteen parochial schools. If the new Archbishop of New York leaves as good a record as he has left as Bishop, the Catholic Church will surely have no reason to regret the Pope's selection of JOHN HUGHES's successor.

On Sunday, August 21, the Reverend JOHN M'CLOSKEY was installed as the Archbishop of the Catholic diocese of New York, the ceremonies on that occasion being performed in St. Patrick's Cathedral. If Dr. M'CLOSKEY succeeds as well as his predecessor in making his influence tell for good, both the Country and the Church will have occasion for congratulation.

ISOMETRIC VIEW OF THE VIRGINIA CAMPAIGN.

On page 580 we print a Map giving an ISOMETRIC VIEW OF THE REGION AROUND PETERSBURG. In the fore-ground is City Point and the region north of the James, which has so lately been the theatre of GRANT's movements. At Dutch Gap General BUTLER is digging a canal, which, as the reader will see, must very much shorten the course of the James at this point.

Off to the left, southward of Petersburg, stretch the Federal lines across the Weldon Railroad. Further to the left is the Danville Road, which has two branches from Burkesville Junction eastward, one running to Petersburg, and the other to Richmond. This view does not include Burkesville Junction.

FRANCIS MULLER, THE MURDERER, FROM LONDON.

INTENSE popular excitement prevailed in New York August 24, when it was announced that the London murderer had arrived in the packet-ship Victoria. There was nothing in the murderer himself to account for this excitement, which was due rather to the peculiar circumstances attending his crime, and the somewhat extraordinary manner in which the detection of the criminal was brought about. The crime was committed on the 9th of July, in a first-class carriage on the North London Railway. English rail-cars are very different from those to which we are accustomed in this country. The carriages are divided into separate compartments; and it is frequently the case that only one person is the sole occupant of a compartment. On the day above mentioned Mr. Briggs, chief clerk in a city bank, and residing at Hackney, took a compartment in a first-class train from London to his place of residence. The train arrived at Hackney without him that night. As it reached the station a person opening the door of No. 69, which was Briggs's room, and placing his hand upon the seat found it covered with blood. He also found in the room a gentleman's hat, walking-stick, and a small leathern bag. Ladies in the adjoining compartment gave notice to the guard that in some way blood had been spurted upon their dresses from this same bloody room. At the same time Briggs was being picked up back on the road, and carried almost senseless to Mitford Castle Tavern. Four and one half pounds in gold was found in one of his pockets, and a silver snuff-box in another. A diamond ring was also found on his person. From these circumstances it was evident that Briggs had been murdered and then thrown out of the car by some person who had that night occupied No. 69 with him.

Who was the murderer? This was the question which for days agitated the popular heart of London. There seemed to be but a single clew: Briggs's watch had been taken. The murder was committed Saturday evening. The next Monday evening a gentlemanly looking foreigner, apparently a German or Swiss, entered the shop of one Mr. Death, a silversmith on Cheapside, and asked to be shown some gold Albert chains. He finally selected one to suit him, and took from his waistcoat pocket another chain, and asked Mr. Death what he would give for it. It proved that there was five shillings' balance in the foreign gentleman's favor, which balance was covered by a ring. Mr. Death packed up the chain in a paper box and delivered it to his customer, who then walked out. That foreign gentleman was the murderer for whom the London police were in search, and this burst of luck with Mr. Death led to his detection. After leaving the jeweler's office he proceeded to his residence in Bow Street, and made arrangements for coming to New York in the Victoria. The little daughter of the cabman discovered the paper box in his room after he left, and showed it to her father. This box had Mr. Death's address on the inside, and this, with collateral evidence from a great number of sources, made it certain that Francis Muller was the murderer. He had taken passage in a sailing vessel, and on his arrival in New York was arrested by Inspector Tanner, who had arrived from London several days previously in the Manchester. THE NORTH TO THE SOUTH.

THAT is our answer—see on high
The old flag fluttering in the breeze,
Proudly it greet the broad blue sky
Upon the land and on the seas.

What! dim its lustre—strike one star
From out its glorious azure field?
No, never! we would rather far
Shed our last drop of blood than yield.

Take back the olive-branch! We hold
It better that the cannon flame
Than that the emblem we've to bold
The Peace we purchased cost us shame.

From Maine to Florida's far shore,
From East to farthest West, each State
Must be thenceforth for evermore
Bound in one UNION strong and great.

The fields are broad throughout our land
Our people powerful in their might;
Each loyal heart, each loyal hand
Is ready to defend the RIGHT.

The traitor who to WRONG would bow
Cowers low before the patriot's eye;
The North has registered her vow,
"The UNION!" is her battle-cry.

It sounds across the mighty lakes,
Its thunder tone the wide air fills
It rolls along her vales, and wakes
The echoes of her giant hills.

Hear it, ye people of the South!
Tear down foul TREASON'S bastard rag;
Join in the glad, rich heart and mouth,
And rally round the brave old flag.

Then shall this reign of bloodshed cease
The warrior shall put by his sword;
And, graved in golden letters, "PEACE"
Shall be a Nation's dearest word.

YOU have our answer—see where flies
The old flag, undimmed the sky;
Turn to its shining folds your eyes,
That banner is our OAK reply!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1864.

THE NEXT GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK.

WHO shall be the Union candidate for Governor of New York? Whoever he may be, if he be honest and true, we shall give him our hearty support. But, meanwhile, before the Convention meets, it is a most serious duty to consider the circumstances which should control the nomination.

In this great and vital campaign, for the salvation of national honor and the integrity of the Government, we need in the State canvass a leader whose name will be at once familiar to every voter in it, and which will assure every man who supports him that he has no party ends, and the Union that he may be confident and cheerful of the national result, because New York goes into the contest fight intent only upon overwhelming victory.

What man then is there, known to the whole State and to the whole country, whose name is his platform, who is identified in every word and act since the rebellion began with the Union; whose nomination will be the seal of the sincerity of Union men in choosing in regard party, and who will rally to the cause all who in an election regard persons more than platforms, and who look first and only to the honorable maintenance of the Union?

We know how conventions run in ruts, and how carefully they are selected with reference to certain purposes. We consider the necessity of strict party organization in free governments for the sake of achieving great results. But civil war are the furnaces in which old parties are fused, and the pure gold of patriotism run together in new combinations. We Union men deceive ourselves if we underestimate the necessity of gaining every advantage we can command. We are fatally deluded if we suppose that the old party precedents can now be strictly regarded. No convention can be so dear to the people, or so sensitive of victory by decoying the ballot which strikes a note to which the great popular heart responds, and which, by discarding those who seek to control it with too great personal partiality, confides its action to the dispassionate judgment of its constituents. If the Chicago Convention had been brave enough to rely upon the resolution of the American people to maintain their Government without asking the rebels upon what terms they might be permitted to do so, and had nominated a man competent and true for patriotic devotion, it would have divided loyal support with that at Baltimore, for its key-note would have been Patriotism. But it was impossible. It created not a mere party machine, the danger of which to the country we allow, but which will be shivered by the strong sense of the people.

Will Syracuse follow the mistake of Chicago? Will it not rather follow the noble example of Baltimore, which reflected the popular will in nominating Mr. LINCOLN in accordance with him an old Democrat and an ex-slaveholder, ANDREW JOHNSON? How gladly and gratefully every Union man in the land will vote for ANDREW JOHNSON, who was tried and tried again, but was not found wanting; and vote for him even more willingly, with a chivalric generosity honorable to human nature, if his former party associations were republican.

It was said, indeed, at Baltimore, and it will be said at Syracuse, that quite enough concession has been made to Union men of Democratic antecedents. But that is an unwise and unworthy suggestion. If the Baltimore Convention had thought General BUTLER, an old Democrat, a stronger candidate with loyal men than Mr. LINCOLN, an old Whig, it would have nominated him. It knew each to be as honorable and faithful as the other; and it was not a question but a patriotic consideration which decided for Mr. LINCOLN. So at Syracuse, and especially at this time, we are to forget whether a man were Whig, Democrat, or Republican, and are to ask only whether he be an honest, able man, who heartily supports the policy of the Administration, who is thoroughly loyal to the Union, and who for reasons that are honorable to himself but not discreditable to any other, is a candidate whose name not only promises a surer victory in the field, but will greatly strengthen the national ticket. The suggestion should need no argument nor illustration, but commend itself at once. Such a nomination should be as spontaneous as it will be successful.

We do not forget how many noble and true men there are, faithful early and late to the good cause; we do not forget how many have contend in a high rivalry of patriotism for the nomination at Syracuse; we do not forget that honest and long service even in a party cause is not to be wholly disregarded in party times and party conventions. But in strange and momentous periods like this, when all mere party is an important measure the most definitely trusted and tried party considerations, is it not clear that if a man can be found who, when all shook, was steady, when the wisest were confounded, and the bravest dismayed, and the most confident doubtful, and the very ground was reeling under our feet, spoke the word that brought the blood back to the pallid cheek, and vigor into its frame, and lighted its eye with victory, he is our natural, our inevitable, our triumphant leader, marching with whom we know that whoever hauls down the American flag will be shot upon the spot?

Every man, woman, and child in the State and the country should know at once and clearly that there is such a man; and their hearts are before their lips in naming

GENERAL JOHN A. DIX.

UNION FOR VICTORY, AND VICTORY FOR UNION.

OFTEN there be a more melancholy spectacle than the whiners, grumblers, and groaners among the Union men of the country? Involved in the tremendous struggle; under fire in the face of the enemy; with a large party skillfully and constantly assailing the Administration; with an ever-present necessity working with the Administration to be no less confident of its friends at home than vigorous in the field, and an equal necessity upon its friends to be patient and forbearing—in a crisis so unparalleled in its judgment, there are plenty of Union journals and men incessantly, although undeservedly, lending the most effective aid to those who are assailing the Administration and prolonging the war.

The need of the hour is recruits. How are they to be obtained if Union men are busiest and loudest in exposing the evils of the period in which they are called as the most unfortunate possible, and the Administration that calls them up as the weakest conceivable? We confess to wonder that rebels shout, and Copperheads hiss with joy, if Union men are limp in the knees and mentally weak in the back, and invite defeat by shouting the cry of impotence?

"Oh! but," sighs some despairing brother, "the President is so dreadfully slow." Yet he is quite as fast as Congress and faster than the country. You who complain of his being slow and behind the people, are the very ones who regret his talking about the abandonment of slavery in 1863, and the freeing of negroes! You blow hot and cold in the same breath.

"Oh, dear me! yes; but if he had only gone ahead at first and created public opinion!" Yes, you know, who sigh and groan most dismally, that if the President had begun by abolishing slavery the Democratic party would have had the very excuse they were longing for, to take sides against the Administration. And even now, from the moment of the preparatory Emancipation proclamation, there has been an organized opposition. Would he have avoided it by issuing his proclamation when Ellsworth was killed. It is very important not to skip facts.

"But he is so shockingly weak! He might have shown more vigor. Just hear how openly treason is talked on all sides!" And yet whenever his hands fall heavily, upon WALLANDIGHAM, upon the papers that publish a proclamation forged for mischief to the country, upon orators inciting to resistance, or when LINCOLN in Congress is confronted with expulsion for renouncing his oath, who is first to condemn the action of the Administration, and so give the President the strange appearance of supporting that unwary action will divide Union men?

"Yes; but why didn't he end the war long ago? See how he hung on to M'CLELLAN when he knew him to be incompetent." Those who say this are mainly "radical" men. Do they honestly believe that a war of which they understand the philosophy, which they know to be a political, vital, social, and political revolution, was to be ended in a year or three years, when one party to the conflict was taken utterly by surprise, and totally without preparation, and when the course of the war was sure to develop the bitter opposition that we see? Does any thoughtful man really believe that in June, 1863, there was the least road to victory in six or twelve months? And as to M'CLELLAN, he was at that time a popular idol, and worshiped with a superstition proportioned to ignorance. Before he had been publicly tried and had conspicuously failed, it would have been more folly for the President to risk the consequences of his arbitrary removal, for if his removal after the terrible Chickahominy campaign, and the day's truce given to LEE to save himself at Antietam, has produced the party feeling for him that we see, what would the result have been had he been removed when an immense number not of his party believed in his capacity and insisted that the time for trial was past?

"Yes, perhaps; but then the President is surrounded by such a shilly-shally cabinet." Yet against the character of each one of them no word can be found. The Secretary of State has saved us from foreign war; perhaps obsequiously, but he has saved us; and of vows more or less profound in a time of great peril they were vital results, we can at least be tolerant. "But the Secretary is under the thumb of THURLOW WEED." Very well; then the President is not under the Secretary's thumb; for Mr. WEED himself assures us that he has, and has had, no influence whatever with the President. "But he wants to compromise and haggle." Very well; if he does, you see the President does not, and every cardinal act of his administration has been his own. In the range of facts and figures his skillful and patriotic appeal with returning public confidence and the decline of the gold fever, reconciled loyal men to the departure of his predecessor? "But there is a row in the Navy Department, and the Monitors are a failure." Well, we did not think the Monitors a failure in Hampton Roads, and FARRAGUT, and WINSLOW, and DU PONT, and PORTER have not seriously tarnished the old fame of the American navy. "But MONTGOMERY BLAIR is the very genius of evil." Yet he supports with all his might the President's policy, and we hear most of his enormities from the friends of Mr. WENDE DAVIS, who, unquestionably faithful and able to the cause, at this moment is certainly not doing much to secure a Union victory at the polls.

That, as in every administration, there have been gross blunders and costly faults; that there have been mistakes of policy and of detail; that, as in every war, there have been contract frauds and peculations of every kind, is as true as that in the recovery of every man, whose friends are fiercely assailing this, there was universal corruption and infamous treason. But the man who does not see that the Administration as a whole who does not consider exactly under what circumstances it took office, and with what unquestioned honesty and unselfish patriotism its chiefs have conducted it, and that the man who does not bear constantly in mind the enormous difficulties which have beset it, arising from the peculiar political complications of the country; who does not consider the inevitable danger to the cause itself of pertinaciously making the Administration responsible for every military mishap; who does not see and acknowledge the vast results that have been achieved in every way; who does not recognize that the insane fury of the rebels against the President, echoed by the frantic denunciation of him as a despot and a tyrant by their political allies at the North, all indicate a mortal fear that the people, whose representative he is, do not mean to submit to disunion or degradation—the man who does not bear all these facts in mind, but forever carps at and rails at a frightened by the loud brag of the enemy into dolefully shaking his head and flapping his feeble hands, can not be held guiltless if the event he predicts arrives, and the Union and the country are destroyed.

AN INSTRUCTIVE GAME FOR THE CANVASS.

THIS new game is very simple, but it is very instructive, although not in the least surprising. It consists merely in rolling up separately the following pretty sentences, shaking them in a hat, then drawing them out and trying to determine which is from a rebel, and which from a "Democratic" authority:

"Our ruling LINCOLN has attempted even not be done, —God only knows what when the people are aroused against him."

"LINCOLN can never rule the South."

"LINCOLN is a usurper, a man of blood, a monster of iniquity, the embodiment of murder and infinite crime."

"Let not the tyrant usurp the place (vote?) of the ballot."

"To throw off such a tyranny requires the exercise of a public virtue and a popular and manly independence."

"A despising will breed upon us tenfold more people by an imbecile President."

"Let the two hundred thousand graves he has made tell their own tale."

"General LEE is a better champion of the rights of self-government in this war than GENERAL LINCOLN."

"MR. LINCOLN is a military despot."

"On to the cannon mouth! I am with LINCOLN!"

"United against MR. LINCOLN and his wicked policy."

"Though the Government has not passed through the land and taken your first-born, he has taken hundreds of your first-born at the command of LINCOLN."

"The usurper who now rules the Yankees."

"LINCOLN demands blood. Let the tyrant trouble when the people speak."

"Who among you dare speak or write what he thinks against the tyrant who has robbed you of your property, imprisons your sons, drags you to the field of battle and to daily deluging your country with blood?"

The game may be varied by daily cutting out fresh extracts from the rebel papers and those that support the Chicago nomination. Those that we have quoted are from a paper in Iowa, from the EXAMINER organ, from the Richmond Whig and Dispatch, and the New York Express, and from the speeches of Messrs KERNAN and WOOD of New York, DREW and BEARDSLEY of Maine, and VALLANDIGHAM of Ohio, and from the "Peace" mottoes at Syracuse. The last extract, however, is not modern—it is from the Proclamation of Brewster and others to the citizens of Boulogne of the United States, October 20, 1780.

Those who use this language do not differ very widely. They mean the same thing. Whoever agrees with them will vote for their candidates. Whoever believes that no Government can compromise with rebels without insuring its own destruction will vote against them. If the President of the United States is "a monster" or "a tyrant" for keeping his inaugural oath, and if his recourse in the midst of civil war by means universally necessitated and legitimated by a state of war any where, and by the Constitution of the United States and the commonest sense of mankind, makes him "a usurper, a man of blood," then let us hasten, under leaders who say what we have quoted, to return to a state of things in which the right of speech and of the press and every right of personal liberty whatever was annihilated in a time of profound peace by those who now rage at the President when, by the exercise of those very rights, he suspends the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, in order that the Union, and under it the personal liberty of every citizen in it, may be as secure in peace as it is in war.

FRIENDS OF THE ENEMY.

WAR is it that the rebel papers are so ready to give friendly advice to what they call the "Democratic" party at the North? They had no counsel to offer as Baltimore—nothing but curses and defiance. Yet the Baltimore Convention only declared for the unconditional restoration of the Union and submission of all rebels to the supreme sovereignty of the people. Was it, then, because they believe the Chicago Convention ready to demand something less than this that the rebels were so forward with friendly advice? And if so, does any loyal, faithful Union man who understands the question wish to support that policy which is shaped by rebel counsel and enjoys rebel approval?

The Atlanta Register says: "If they [the 'Democrats'] will use the ballot-box against Mr. LINCOLN while we use the cartridge-box, each side will be a helper to the other."

The Richmond Examiner said, two years ago: "It is not to be denied that a Democratic victory at the North would be a subject of much gratification."

The Richmond Whig says: "If LINCOLN be defeated the war may be brought to a speedy, honorable, satisfactory close.....It is the sheerest nonsense for Southern people to affect indifference as to what is going on in the North, or as to whom the people of that section may have for President.....It is a matter of the first importance to us that that functionary be a man who shall have some regard for our rights, our interests, and our honor."

The point of the last article from which we quote, which is very long and written with studied calmness, was to show the Chicago Convention what policy would defeat Mr. LINCOLN. That is the rebel hope. To defeat GRANT and SHERMAN in the field and LINCOLN at the polls is the aim of all their efforts. Then they say that the way is clear "to commence negotiations for peace." Will negotiations for which our military disasters and the overthrow of an Administration pledged to maintain the Government pave the way be likely to end in an honorable and lasting peace?

Granting that the Chicago Convention was an assembly of the purest patriots—that mere party success was scouted by them—that they were inspired by the most holy horror of corruption in every shape, from swindling your partner in business up to stealing Indian funds in the War Department—we considered that the rebels would be in a morbid anxiety for the success of the Chicago candidate, may not every loyal-hearted citizen who wishes the rebellion subdued and the Union unconditionally maintained, properly ask whether the way to secure these results is to vote the ticket which the rebels recommend?

THE CHICAGO CONVENTION.

THE Platform of the Chicago Convention will satisfy every one of the democratic enemy of American Union and Liberty. It declares that the Government of the United States is guilty of resisting the rebellion, and that the American people can not maintain the authority of their laws. It has no word of righteous wrath against the recreant citizens who have plunged the country in the blood of civil war, but hurls its fury upon the constituted authorities which have steadily defended the Union. It has no censure for any out of the ranks but the war measures taken by the Administration, under the authority of the Constitution, are branded as tyrannical and despotic. There is not a word in it that can cheer any soldier or sailor fighting for his country—not a syllable that stirs the blood of a patriot. It is craven, abject, humiliating. It confesses the defeat of the Union cause, and covertly implores the mercy of JEFFERSON DAVIS and his crew.

And this at a moment when stout old FARAGUT is thundering at Mobile, when the honorable GRANT clutches at the WELDON Road, which, as an officer in his army writes, is "like touching the cubs of a tigress;" when EARLY's Rhenadoah valley raid is at an end, and when SHERMAN is closing around Atlanta; when State after State is supplying its quota of fresh soldiers; when every healthful decision at the universal public confidence is awakening; and when the rebels are plainly, palpably struggling to hold out only long enough to see if the election, by the action of the Chicago candidate, will not turn to their advantage.

Never again will this nation have a fairer chance of securing a permanent constitutional unity than it has now. For three years it has, at every disadvantage, battled against this formidable conspiracy, and never was the conspiracy fit so desperate a strait. The country has it by the throat. A little more force, a closer pressure, and the monster falls strangled, dead forever. At this hour, from the deepest hold, a lowering purpose, and the scaly folds of rebellion thrill with hope to the extremity; it renews its strength, it recruits its venom, and darts a deadlier blow at the life of the country.

As the Chicago Platform declares the war hopeless, its friends will of course wish to see its position realized. The victory of FARRAGUT, and of SHERMAN will therefore be unwelcome. Every brave man who enlists will be grudged. The rise of prices will be hailed with delight; whatever financial crisis our armies and navies, and the victories of the rebel armies will be hailed with exultation as conclusive proof of the "failure to restore the Union by the experiment of war." There is to be an English lord or European aristocrat, not a mourner at popular government and friend of despotism in the world who will not applaud the Chicago Platform and hope for the success of its candidate.

The political campaign is opened. It will be short, sharp, and decisive, and the most momentous the country has ever known. If MR. LINCOLN is re-elected the Union, the authority of the Constitution, and the national honor will be maintained unconditionally; the rebellion, strained and balled on every side, will be suppressed, and the peace and prosperity of the country be permanently established. If General MCCLELLAN is elected there will be an attempt to negotiate, to compromise, to bargain with the rebels. In the effort it is not to be computed point, it is the dignity and character of the Government which will be compromised. A treacherous element will be picked up and labeled peace, and after staggering under its dishonor and disgrace for a miserable while the country will plunge forward again into the flaming gulf of war.

The issue is simple and sublime. It is the life or the degradation of the nation. It is to show that a Government of the people is equal to every exigency—ready for taxation, ready for military service, ready for endurance, ready for forbearance—that it is as strong as any Government in the world when it wishes to be—that it is as powerful and resolute and orderly as in peace it is industrious and prosperous. There seems to us but one way in, which this can be shown, but one way in which utter national humiliation can be avoided, and that is by the steady and strong hand of war until the rebels confess the authority of the Government. That is the policy which is personified in ABRAHAM LINCOLN and ANDREW JOHNSON, and which we shall most strenuously support, for it is the cause of the peace and happiness of the American people.

GENERAL SEYMOUR UPON THE WAR.

WE hope our readers have not failed to see General SEYMOUR's letter to MR. W. E. DODGE, JUN., and printed in the daily papers. It is full of matter, and inspires the most hopeful confidence. The General, it will be remembered, was captured in the Wilderness, and was afterward taken to Charleston, and could not be suspected of any factious prejudice against the rebels, for he had no political sympathies against them, and was—we believe unjustly—accused of injustice to colored troops of his command.

General SEYMOUR's conviction agrees with that of every judicious observer—that the rebel cause is approaching exhaustion. This is apparent from various considerations. The rebels are more strikingly than the universal and forcible conscription ordered by Governor BROWN in Georgia. A letter from one citizen of Georgia to another, by the hand of a fellow-prisoner of the General's, confirms this view of the depletion of the rebel cause. "The people are sullen and heart-sick of this fatal, hopeless strife.... The men who, to aggrandize themselves, or to gratify their own political ambition, plunged this people into the vortex of the rebellion to bay. But, as General SEYMOUR says, we ought to have four to one in the field, and the army of occupation of Georgia should be from the terrible GRANT has upon the rebellion, and enable him to shake it speedily to death. The one stage of the struggle, he says, "is the result of our next election for President. If a Democrat succeeds he will be sure, within four months, to open negotiations, and sure of their Confederacy. They believe a Democrat will be elected. In MR. LINCOLN's re-election they have no confidence. Capitulation, for the war must then continue, and consequence is their failure and ruin. In military strength it is as much to our advantage as to that of the enemy desires—is it not equally true in politics? Certain it is that the only remaining hope of the rebels lies in the election of 1864.

The whole letter is a manly rebuke of the pusillanimity which sighs and sobs that we "can not conquer the South," and that such a task is "only whining that it is impossible. But, says General SEYMOUR, "behind the James only boys and old men are to be seen, while hundreds of acres are put in the olden days of quiet, and regiments of able-bodied citizens crowd the street." With just and patriotic indignation the soldier who has endured and suffered exclaims in conclusion—redeeming the name of SEYMOUR in this war—"There are some who speak of the rebels as if they were the bravest, most serious those who do not fight, but are glad enough to employ them, as they do their slaves, to perform their dirty work. Let us crush the South with the sweet indeed; for us, except through Southern subjugation, but anarchy and war forever. The people, the Union, the glorious history of the race fall asunder. The South would be dominant, and the people of the North would deserve to be driven under the yoke of secession, to hoe corn and cotton for Southern masters."

DOCTORS DISAGREE.

The Richmond Examiner of August 22 says:

"GENERAL GRANT's army may now be considered as utterly and signally and finally defeated. Whether the necessary result came when the Rebels ran back to the line of the ships, General LEE is the best and safe judge. That conscious, however, when he shall decide upon it, will be a noble movement in the interest of peace."

The Richmond Enquirer of August 23 says:

"GRANT's plans on the Danville Road are now revealed, and the enemy's purpose to cut off our supply trains at DEATHBEARD will not be too much to beat back this bold movement to the south of Petersburg."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE MILITARY SITUATION.

On Wednesday, the 31st ult., the enemy appeared from the front of the Fifth and Ninth Corps; and it was thought by some that the movement of the Fifth, Second Corps and the Tenth had recrossed the James to the south side and reinforced the Army of the Potomac, or were to assist to the support of the Fifth on the Weldon Road. On the 1st inst., the Ninth Corps, the Second Division of the Second Corps were engaged in tearing up the road, they were attacked by a portion of Hill's corps, and desperately contested the ground, but finally were compelled to retire. The Second Division came back to that point in order to connect with the left of the front, which was then engaged. The night fight being nearly at night again with the railroad, the centre of the front bowed and broke the road. The enemy first assailed in front, but then made two charges on the extreme right, and were each time repulsed with heavy loss. The enemy's centre was then made against the right; two regiments of them could not be driven back, and were captured by the enemy. ... This was without firing until they reached our works. They were then met with a murderous fire of musketry, and the enemy's new recruits on the right centre gave way, and the second line of battle, which was composed of the two divisions to withdraw into the shelter of some woods, where they again formed in line and advanced against the rebels in their works, flanking them, and compelling them to abandon the position. The action had been made late in the afternoon, and night now put an end to the conflict. The rebels, fearing that we would be so strongly reinforced that they could not expect to hold their ground, abandoned the field, leaving their dead and wounded. Our loss in this battle is stated at about 2000, while that of the rebels is estimated at 5000. The length of General Ringgold's command from the fact that Reams Station is twenty miles from Petersburg, the Weldon Road is therefore still held by the Weldon Road, and a railroad has been projected to connect Petersburg with Reams Station Depot.

On the night of Thursday we lost nine guns. Captain Henry Sleeper, of the Tenth Massachusetts Cavalry, was wounded. The Weldon Railroad has been destroyed to a distance of eleven or twelve miles.

From Sherman there are no official reports, and our only information is Secretary Stanton's dispatch stating that the enemy succeeded in place his army on the communications of Hood's army, but were unsuccessful. On the 31st of August the Atlanta and Macon Forrest made a raid into Memphis, Tennessee, probably to rescue the rebel prisoners confined there. The generals Washburne and Hurlburt. The particulars are given as follows:

Early, it was thus disappeared from Sheridan's front; but as the rebel cavalry force is now in our rear, would leave the Lynchburg Road open to our forces in the Valley, it is probable that the rebel retreat was necessitated by the movement of Sheridan. A portion of this force will doubtless join Lee's army in front of Petersburg, and the rest from the Weldon Road, and this will prepare the way for Sheridan's advance upon Lynchburg. The rebels are now at every point driven to a purely defensive conduct of the war. This has been long predicted by those who have observed, and is a most encouraging sign that the war is rapidly drawing to a close.

From Mobile we have the unpleasant news announcing the rebel possession of Fort Morgan. It is now in our possession.

THE CHICAGO CONVENTION.

The Chicago Convention met August 29, and Ex-Governor Bigler was chosen temporary President. A Committee of delegates was chosen to report resolutions. The next day, upon the permanent organization of the Convention, Governor Seymour was elected its President, and the following Platform was adopted by the Convention:

Resolved, That in the future, as in the past, we will adhere with unswerving fidelity to the Union under the Constitution as the only solid foundation of our common safety, and will support no candidate for any office or any measure of government unless he will make and keep inviolate these primary objects, both Northern and Southern.

Resolved, That this Convention does explicitly declare, as the sense of the American people, that after four years of failure to restore the Union by the experiment of war, during which, under the pretenses of a military necessity, or war power higher than the Constitution, the Constitution itself has been disregarded in every part, and public liberty and private rights alike trodden down, and the material prosperity of the country essentially impaired, justice, humanity, liberty and the public welfare demand that immediate efforts be made for a cessation of hostilities, with a view to an ultimate convention of the States, or other peaceable means, to the end that at the earliest possible moment the rights of the several States unimpaired to them by the Constitution may be restored.

Resolved, That the direct interference of the military authority of the United States in the recent election held in Kentucky, October 6, was a shameful violation of the plainest violation of the Constitution, and a repetition of such acts in the approaching election will be fatal to constitutional liberty, and resisted with all the means and power under our control.

Resolved, That the aim and object of the Democratic party is to preserve the Federal Union and the rights of the States unimpaired, and they hereby declare that they consider the Administration authors of the unnecessary and dangerous powers not granted by the Constitution, the unconstitutional acts of Congress, the open violation of the rights of citizens, and the subversion of the civil by military law in States not in insurrection, the arbitrary military arrest, imprisonment, trial and sentence of citizens in States where civil law exists in full force, the suppression of the freedom of speech and of the press, the denial of the right of asylum, the open and avowed disregard of State rights, the unconstitutional issues of paper money, and the tendency to centralize power, and to consolidate all the powers of the States in one common government, as conducting to the final overthrow of the liberties of the people to base and servile submission to despotism.

Resolved, That the unparalleled infamy of the military authority of the United States in the recent election held in Kentucky, October 6, 1863, and the subsequent high-handed violation of the Constitution, and a repetition of such acts in the approaching election will be held as treachery, and resisted with all the means and power under our control.

Resolved, That the aim and object of the Democratic party is to preserve the Federal Union and the rights of the States unimpaired, and they hereby declare that they consider the Administration authors of the unnecessary and dangerous powers not granted by the Constitution, the unconstitutional acts of Congress, the open violation of the rights of citizens, and the subversion of the civil by military law in States not in insurrection, the arbitrary military arrest, imprisonment, trial and sentence of citizens in States where civil law exists in full force, the suppression of the freedom of speech and of the press, the denial of the right of asylum, the open and avowed disregard of State rights, the unconstitutional issues of paper money, and the tendency to centralize power, and to consolidate all the powers of the States in one common government, as conducting to the final overthrow of the liberties of the people to base and servile submission to despotism.

On Wednesday General GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN was elected as the Democratic candidate for President, receiving 162 votes.

INTERESTING ITEMS.

MR. CHARLES BARNARD, in "Passages from the Life of a Philosopher," tells the following anecdote: GOD, it was thought, had given to the Indians the gift of second-sight, or presence arising from the custom, then commencing, of having visited a friend or the sick place of plate-glass. He said that a short time ago he sat at dinner with his back to one of these windows, when suddenly he appeared to him that the window was wide open, and each man the front of his house. He immediately turned around. At no moment that I was sitting just opposite to the post. Knowing that no such thing existed, he said, "I must be mad to it, SIR. Regret, that you and I should make such a very different use of the gift of imagination. When I go to the house of a friend in the country, and unexpectedly remain for the night, I always imagine that I should naturally catch cold. But by tying a bit of pack-thread very tightly round the little finger of the right hand, I am taught-up, consequently I catch no cold at all." This simple remedy I recommend to the notice of the faculty. I used it and improved it; but odd as it may appear, it is a positive fact, nevertheless. MR. ROGERS, who lived in full well the respect and regard I had for him, was at once what I was striking a simple fact, and joined cordially in the merriment it excited.

ABOUT ten months ago two gentlemen of San Francisco made a wager. The terms of the bet put in writing and the following condition: If the Federal forces did not capture Richmond within ten months from that date, he was to pay his opponent a single, sound, eatable apple; if Richmond should not be captured by the Federal forces within the time, doubling the number for each month until Richmond was taken—viz.: the end of June, if that event did not occur before. Nine months have passed since the bet was made and Richmond is, as yet, in the possession of the rebels. Now the successive months be as follows: 1, 2, 4, 8, 16, 32, 64, 128, 256, 512. If Richmond is not by the 1st of September taken within the present month he will get back all the apples he has had to pay for, and will have to pay double his bet more than ever; but should it hold out a year longer and not continue to be in the hands of the rebels he would have to pay him 40,960 dollars, and he would be 81,920 dollars out: in three months more he would be out 163,840 dollars.

TORTURE applied to extort confession was discontinued, it is said, in the public courts of Portugal, in consequence of the following circumstance: A executioner judge, having observed the effects of the rack upon suspected criminals, who, in the extremity of pain, say anything to get free of their lives, to get released from the torture, determined to try on himself the effect of the rack, in order that the country to kill a horse or mule; and he had one of the strongest animals in Portugal. He took care not only to have all his servants employed, so that no one but the executioner could put him to the torture, but he also, out of their beds, to stile thither himself, and cut the string so that he bled to death. The groom was apprehended and committed to prison. He pleaded not guilty; but the presumption being strong against him, he was ordered to the rack, where the extremity of the torture soon wrung from him a confession of the crime. Upon this confession, he had entrance at hanging passed on him, when his master went to the tribunals, and there exposed the fallibility of confessions obtained by such means, by owning the deed himself, and declaring the motives which had influenced him to commit the horrible suicide.

"I REMEMBER," says DR. Leichfield, in his Autobiography, "a conversation which I had with the personal instrument of John Wesley as to one of the characteristics of his uncle—namely, that he was remarkable for the neatness of his dress; he seemed to be himself a gentleman, his dark wig, his clean linen, and at least that on one occasion when arguing with a people in the open air, he was interrupted by a man who, as one of Wesley with an air of superciliousness, addressed himself to Mr. Wesley, 'Sir, you are a fool, forbearance, felt it necessary to check annoyance of this kind, and, with a look of dignity, he asked the man the question, 'Can you read Greek?' 'No, SIR, I can not,' was the reply. 'Then, SIR,' rejoined Mr. Wesley, 'you can not be able to satisfy you.'"

WHENEVER you find a man who has more than common oddity dressed, or talking ridiculously, or exhibiting any eccentricity of manner, you may be sure that he is not a married man; for the little corners are rounded off, the little angles are ground down, and the sharper edges are generally have much more sense than their husbands, especially when the husbands are clever men. Such advice are like the ballast that keeps the ship steady. They are like the windows that make a house stand a sea-sailing off little growths of self-conceit and folly.

In the burial-register of Lymington, Hants, here is the following quaint entry, dated August, 1703: "The remains of body of Samuel Baldwin, late inhabitant of this parish, was carefully put a vessel and set off to sea, and was committed to the deep off the Needle rocks, near the Isle of Wight." The Rev. Gilbert White, of Selborne, says a Hampshire paper, "in accordance with the wish of the deceased, to protect his relics from dancing over his grave, which she threatened to do."

CURIOUS anecdotes are related of the effect of music upon animals. Mr. Bruce has given the following instance of his experience: "While a man was playing on a trumpet-major, and was in the habit of playing to it on a horn, on one, a third, some cows, small birds, and a rook and hens, with a wild duck, a yard under the window. The cat was not the least affected; the horse stopped short from time to time, and looked at the musician as long as he was feeding on the grass; the dog continued to bark in the usual manner; the chickens picked about the player; the ass did not discover the least indication of his ever having heard music in his life; the rook and the hens went up her large wide ears, and seemed very attentive to their wants; the wild duck and the cows sat as well as they could; some little birds that were in an aviary, and others that were in the hedges, appeared to be delighted with the singing; but the cock, who minded only his hens, and the cows, who were busily employed in consuming a neighboring dung-hill, did not show in any manner that the trumpet-major's performance was heard by them. The effect of music can not be doubted. Stribbi had one which excited by force the power of music for a time; and the modern composer had a pug-dog that fricked merrily about to any tune which was played on the violin, but the dog immediately was performed he would seat himself down by the music, and fall asleep. Mr. Bruce says that a man who used the player cause to the forty-eighth hair as the direct was struck to sleep by the performance of the violin, playing tail, rock refuge from the unpleasant sound under the chairs or tables.

EASTOE relates that a hare left her retreat to listen to some diminutive boys who were singing on the banks of Mersey, retiring whenever they ceased singing, and resuming her seat when they commenced their song. I have seen the same thing with a rabbit in the Bactlie fever bells near my residence. A rabbit was frequently seen to sit on a moonbank in Paice had taught rats to dance on the rope to perfect time. The Remembrand also says that he has seen the rattlesnakes in Upper Canada appeared by a violin, and that they would come out of their holes two elephants in the Jardin des Plantes leaves no doubt in regard to the influence of harmony upon the animals. Every instrument seemed to operate distinctly as the several parts of the orchestra struck up. Even the lowest excitement of these intelligent creatures had been carried to such an extent that further experiments were deemed dangerous.

SIR WILLIAM NAPIER was one day taking a long country walk and was tired, when he came to a little gill about five years old sobbing over a broken bowl; she had dropped and broken it in the street. He gave the girl a shilling, and she had taken her father's dinner in it, and she told me she would be beaten. Napier return home he has become fit them, with a sudden gleam of hope, she innocently looked up in his face and said, "Please, SIR, will you break it again?" Sir William explained that he could not mend the bowl, but he could give her money to buy her a piece to buy another. However, on opening his purse it was empty of silver, and he had to content himself by promising to meet his little friend in the same spot at the same hour next day, and by doing the engagement he kept honor, her, meanwhile, tell her mother she had seen a gentleman who would bring her the money for the bowl next day. The child, entirely trusting him, went on her way contented. On the morrow he found the little creature awaiting him to dine in Bath the following evening, to meet some one whom he wished to see. The child, who had never for some little time, trying to calculate the possibility of giving the meeting to the little friend at the house first and of still being in time for the dinner-party in Bath that evening. But the child, who had the full confidence in the invention on the plea of a "pre-engagement" saying no one of his friends to be at ... "I can not disappoint her, she trusted me so implicitly."

THE number of loans employed in making Cashmere shawls does not exceed five hundred, and the shawl rarely net more than half as much is completed in a day, although the patience and perseverance of the artist in adapting the long composed of a number of separate pieces, which, after being completed in this, will scarcely be seen, particular defectiveness which is often to be observed in the real Cashmere. The most valuable shawls are those in which the figures of which the pattern is variegated are worked with wooden needles, and the shuttles, colors, and thread they are to use. During the whole operation the rough side of the shawl is uppermost, and the weaver frequently, during which the foreman never mistakes the most intricate passage. The shawl is to be completed in the following manner, by-woven pieces of which it is composed are taken to the man who set them together, and sews the whole together, so as to form a harmonious whole. At this time, also, the wool remaining over is pulled out, and sewn about a penny a day; and the experienced apprehendent who examines their operations is very little better off than themselves.

WE could give scores of instances of bad taste shown in the choice of pictures by our wealth. The difficulty seems to be to find many which are not. In the choice of paper for the walls of a room we are still worse off. Some find in most instances the covering of walls is only a background for pictures and furniture. Others, however, rooms may be seen hung with valuable drawings, papered with the most costly of flowers. The time and money of works of art are completely destroyed by such a mounting. In addition to the bad choice of the paper, such drawings is often done to prints and pictures, which now supply the place of the ancient tapestry, by the style of the frames.

THERE are above a quarter of a million of persons in England and Wales receiving parish relief, and upwards of a million and a half in Scotland. If we must 75 persons out of a hundred, or one person in every four, receive relief from a parish among them. WATER-SPOUT IN ALBEMARLE SOUND.

We illustrate on this page an incident which recently occurred in Albemarle Sound, North Carolina, near a portion of the Federal fleet.

On the afternoon of August 3 a heavy water-spout was observed forming in the vicinity of the fleet. The weather being stormy, and several others having been seen during the day, no immediate concern was manifested regarding it; but as it soon attained such gigantic proportions as to exceed any thing ever before witnessed, serious fears were entertained for the safety of the tugs and other small craft of the fleet. After taking a circuitous route among the vessels, fortunately without encountering any, it struck out for the land, the water boiling and foaming beneath it, and being apparently lifted to a great height. On reaching the shore it immediately burst, discharging what appeared like a solid body of water of immense volume. The accompanying sketch was made by an officer of the Shamrock immediately after the occurrence. During the performance of this irregular drama by old Neptune the Shamrock, Otsego, and Tacony were near at hand, while the Union sailors were silent but by no means uninterested spectators.

FARRAGUT'S VICTORY.

We give on this page, and on pages 584 and 585, illustrations of FARRAGUT'S recent victory in Mobile Bay. The sketch accompanying this description represents the shot and shell which were extracted from the sides of the Brooklyn after her engagement with Fort Morgan and the ram Tennessee, August 5, 1864. The cut at the foot of this page gives a view of the sinking Monitor Tecumseh. While FARRAGUT was making his entrance into Mobile Bay past Fort Morgan, the Tecumseh, proceeding on the left of the fleet, struck upon a torpedo and went down. The infernal machine exploded almost directly under the Monitor, whose side was lifted six feet above the water, when she settled so rapidly that only five of her crew, who tumbled out through her port-holes, escaped. The Monitors, in a casualty of this nature, appear to be perfect traps, out of which there are no loop-holes of escape except the port-holes. The Tecumseh sank at the beginning of the action.

The conflict with the rebel ram Tennessee, illustrated on page 585, was the most spirited naval engagement of the war; it is only rivalled in interest by the fight between the Monitor and the Merrimac, early in 1862. After the rebel gun-boat Selma had surrendered, and the Morgan and Gaines been driven under the guns of Fort Morgan, FARRAGUT ordered the whole Federal fleet to engage the Tennessee, and to close upon her as rapidly as possible. The order was none too quickly given, as the ram was uninjured by our fire, and in the rear of our fleet, threatening seriously to interrupt our progress.

At the time of the engagement FARRAGUT was passing the water batteries under Fort Morgan. The fire of all the vessels seemed to have no effect on the ram. When the order was given to run her down, the Monongahela, Lackawanna, and Brooklyn all butted against her, "and they might as well," says our correspondent, "have butted against the Crow's Nest on the Hudson!" The Monitors appear to have forced the ram to surrender; they made the splinters fly inside of the heavy iron and wooden armor of the Tennessee. The Manhattan sent a solid 15-inch shell through her side at a distance of twenty-five yards. The Chickasaw, also, did splendidly with her 11-inch guns. The Winnebago was less rapid in her movements. Probably the chief causes of the surrender of the ram were the wounding of Admiral BUCHANAN and the injury done to her rudder chains. The length of the vessel was 200 feet, her breadth 48. Her draught is 14 feet 8 inches.

SHOT AND SHELL EXTRACTED FROM THE "BROOKLYN" AUGUST 5, 1864. [SKETCHED BY SCHELL.]

The following description of the ram is given by a correspondent of the Tribune:

"In form the varies from the old Merrimac, though evidently a modification of that unfortunate and short-lived craft.

"Her armor consists of two and a half inch iron, in bars eight inches wide, crossing each other, and bolted down with one and three-quarter inch bolts, making five inches of solid iron. This again is backed by two feet of solid oak throughout the entire portion of the boat above the water-line, and extending some feet even below that. From her forward casemates forward, including her pilot-house, an additional inch of iron is given her, making six inches of plating, and an additional foot, making three feet of wooden backing at this part of the boat.

"Her gun-room, if that is the proper term to use, occupies about two-thirds of her length, and is constructed with a flat top, composed of two and a half by eight-inch iron bars, crossed and bolted together, forming a close lattice-work above her gunners, and affording ventilation while in action. The sides are inclined like those of the old Merrimac, and, as before stated, are composed of five inches of iron plating, backed with two feet of solid oak backing, through which, in the fight with our fleet, no ball succeeded in piercing. Her ports, of which there are two on ei-their side, and one fore and aft, are closed by means of iron shutters, which revolve upon a pivot in the centre of one side, and are worked by means of a cog-wheel on the inside in a very simple and expeditious manner. They are liable, however, to derangement, and in the engagement with our fleet two were actually so deranged as to prevent their being opened, while a third, the after one, was shot away entirely, the pivot on which it revolved being broken off, and it was thought that that the frequency of shell entered which wounded the rebel Admiral, as he was standing directly opposite, prevented its clear away some splinters with which it had been filled.

The two sketches given on page 581 illustrate in detail the conflict between Farragut's fleet and the rebel gun-boats. One of these gives the portion of the conflict with the ram, in which the Richmond most prominently participated. The other illustrates the fight between the Metacomet and the Selma, resulting in the surrender of the latter with 16 men, 18 of whom had been killed, and 22 wounded.

THE LOVE-KNOT.

TYING her bonnet under her chin,
She hid her raven ringlets in;
But not alone in the silken snare
Did she catch her lovely floating hair;
For tying her bonnet under her chin,
She tied a young man's heart within.

They were strolling together up the hill,
Where the wind comes blowing merry and chill:
And it blew the curls a frolicsome race
All over her pretty, pink-colored face,
Till, nodding and laughing, she tied them in Under her beautiful, dimpled chin.

And it blew a color bright as the bloom
Of the pinkest finch'es tossing plume
All over the pallid cheek of the perfect girl
That ever imprisoned a romping curl,
Or, in tying her bonnet under her chin,
Tied a young man's heart within.

Steeper and steeper grew the hill;
Madder, merrier, chillier still
The western wind blew down, and played
The wildest tricks with the little maid.
As tying her bonnet under her chin,
She tied a young man's heart within.

O Western Wind! do you think it was fair
To play such tricks with her floating hair?—
To play such pranks do your best
To blow her against the young man's breast,
When he so gladly aided her
And kissed her mouth and dimpled chin.

O Ellery Vane! you little thought
An hour ago, when you besought
This country lane to walk with you
After the sun had fired the dew,
What perilous danger you'd be in,
As she tied her bonnet under her chin.

QUITE ALONE.

CHAPTER XLV.

HIGH SCHOOL OF MORSEMANSHIP.

RANELAGH! Ranelagh! Are you quite sure! Ranelagh? Is the word no misprint, no clerical error? I think I hear the judicious critic ask this question as he reads the last chapter of my story, scratching his ear meanwhile. Then, he may haply fling the book by altogether. Ranelagh! A place to exercise human patience! Had I said White Conduit House, that might have been barely tolerable. But Ranelagh! Why, that was a place whither Grace Darling went when she was a beau, and the Miss Gunnings when they were belles. It was altogether an eighteenth-century place, devoted to powdered wigs, hoops, pocket, patches, brocaded sacks, clocked hose, high-heeled shoes, fans, smallswords, cocked hats, and clouded canes. The great-grandmothers went to Ranelagh in sedan-chairs, and attended by little black boys. A certain Mrs. Amelia Booth, wife of a captain in a marching regiment, and known to a certain Mr. Henry Fielding) capped there one night, more than a hundred years ago, in company with a clerical gentleman who had a few words during the evening with a British nobleman.

To which end, that I know well all about, and that there is reason in the roasting of eggs. The place was renowned to which Mr. Pilgrims repaired, after dining or sup with Park Lane, shall be Ranelagh, if you please. This is an age in which the exercise of severe discrimination in literature is necessary. Your contemporaries will forgive every thing but the naming of names. You may write and say the things which is not; but beware of giving utterance to that which is. You know that the Memoirs of the candid Tallyrand are not to be published until the year 1900; years have elapsed from the period of his lamented death. Some few of the contemporaries of Charles Surface, who might be recognizable, are still alive; and the candid creature could be discreet, even in the tomb. For a similar reason, the place I have in my mind's eye shall be Ranelagh. There are numbers of ladies and gentlemen still extant, and flourishing like green bay-trees, who have heard the chimes at midnight in Ranelagh's leafy orchards, and have occasionally taken slightly more lobster-salad than was good for them in those recesses. So, let the place I have in my eye be Ranelagh; though, if you choose to get a private Act of Parliament, or the Royal Permission, or a License from the Herald's College, or to exercise your own sweet will, there is nothing to prevent your calling it Tivoli, or Marlebone, or Spring Gardens.

Besides, did not a gentleman, a few pages since, make the profoundly philosophical, if not entirely original remark, that there was a river in Macedon and a river in Monmouth. How many Ponleys were there? There may have been Ranelagh and Ranelaghs. All were not necessarily patronized by Horace Walpole and the Misses Gunning. Is there not a London in Middlesex, and a London in Canada? A Bologne in the department of the Seine, and a Boulogne in the department of the Pas de Calais? An Aix in Savoy, an Aix in Provence, and an Aix in Rhenish Prussia? An Alexandria in the land of Egypt, and an Alexandria in the State of Virginia?

At all events, all the Ranelaghs are gone by this time—your Ranelagh and my Ranelagh. Yes: the pleasant place with the 1,000 lights, the thousand additional lamps are fled, and the garlands of flowers, real and artificial, are dead. The jubilee statues have entered on dust and their primitive gypsum; the trees have been cut down: their very roots grubbed up. Bricks and mortar invade the once verdant expanse of the Ramilies ground. No more balloons ascend from that Campus Martius. There are wire-cellars where once the lime-light artists and oxallerier where once the panoramas of Moscow raised its cupolas of painted canvas, profusely festooned with wych and cranberry, to the starlit sky. Pulled down, laid waste, and laid out in streets: such has been the fate of Ranelagh. Its present desolation of beds, scaffold-poles, and places where rubbish may be shot, seems even more dreadful than the late entire quadrangular silence. Somebody Else—that ruthless and immovable Somebody Else—has got hold of Ranelagh, and turned it to other uses. Alas! it, under its new aspect, be profitable to Somebody? It is certain that Ranelagh, as Ranelagh, never did pay Somebody.

Is it necessary to shed a few sympathetic tears over the parterres, the fountains, the umbrageous alleys, the labyrinths, the orchestras, the supper-arbors, the long ball-room—over the orchestra with its shell-shaped sounding-board, and the little lamps in front, where you promenaded the creaming stout in brown jugs which might once have been Toby Philpots, and have lived in the vale? I should say it were a little absurd, unfortunately, there is no time to weep. The Pilgrims and Madame Ernestine, professor of the high school of horsemanship, are waiting. Let others mourn the fiddlers who were wont to wear the cocked-hats: the tipsy, fraudulent waiters, always changing and always passive: the masters of the ceremonies, humble disciples of the school of the immortal S——: the money-takers: the gipsy fortune-tellers, and the prophetic hermit. They were all worthy folk, no doubt, but have disappeared. So have the petrified fish at five guineas each; the hot rolls, so thin that it resembled the leaves of some fatty sensitive plant, and curled into shrinking convolutions when you touched it; the rich punch, so called from its fumes inflicting on you next morning the worst tortures of the Tower of London and the Spanish Inquisition; and that remarkable rose -pink Champagne which never went round more than once, and never cost less than half a guinea a bottle.

It was M-Varicty, who, as Tom Tuttlehell correctly observed, had hit upon the notable device of opening Ranelagh in the morning, at a shilling a head. The experiment was disastrous—very expensive ended, in the long run, at Ranelagh in consequence. The economy movement was not destitute of a certain brilliancy. Tom Tuttlehell and M-Variety made much good sport at the beginning of the winter season. He had made up many parties, and Tuttlehell was one of them. He had interested himself with editors, and affably accepted at a supper of the elite of intellect held to inaugurate the new periodical skeeing, The Cat's Paw, the exception of the capitalist in the wine trade, who was losing his weekly hundreds in backing the manager of Drury Lane. Thomas Tuttlehell was M-Variety's dearest friend.

The manager was standing at the waterwicket, keeping, as was his custom, a sharp look-out both on the pay-place and the free-list box, as the party from the Pilgrims Club alighted from their cabs. Tuttlehell hailed him in many cordial pressures of the hand he bestowed on Tom, and how many sweeping bows he favored his illustrious friend with. M-Variety was a man in a chronic state of bankruptcy, but who constantly arose, smiling and cheerful, as though refused by all the world. Indeed, he was perhaps, a debtor who was so much beloved by his creditors. Those to whom he owed most money generally the most kind to him and refresh. It was the opinion of the capitalist in the wine trade—an opinion frequently expressed to be signed the weekly bill—that a man could be a good crying after spilt milk; that a man could not eat his cake and have it; that you could not always be turning over a new leaf many times a year; and that there was a deal of meat in the old saying, that the most fantastic capitalist would exclaim, "if Ranelagh was to be swallowed up by an earthquake next Saturday night, the world would owe Bobus's bill about the ruins (as patronized by royalty) to be sent in three o'clock in the afternoon and nine o'clock at night, cash in advance, before ever you saw me. He is a man of spirit, Sir, is Mac." So the capitalist went on signing checks and seeding in cases upon cases of the rose-pink Champagne.

M-Variety always looked after his small liabilities, and let the large ones take care of themselves. He who would owe much, and yet live undisturbed, should always pay his washer-woman. It is astonishing when you owe a man thirty-seven thousand pounds to find how eager he is to ask you to dinner, and to lend you another three thousand when he has made up his round sum. Mac always paid his small people. He never treated his underlings to an empty treasury. The ghost walked regularly at Ranelagh at three o'clock on Saturday afternoon, however spare the promenaders on Friday night might have been. Thus it came about that the small folks loved M-Variety, and that the master-carpenter—to whom he had presented a silver mug—took for his exertions in getting up the fire-work scaffolding for the panorama of Moscow—declared, with tears in his eyes, that the emperor was a tyrant and no better than a serf, and paid for, and that if timber ever ran short in the gardens, he'd cut down Besbey Park (at the risk of transportation for life) sooner than the governor should want it. And finally, as Mac, whether it was hail, rain, or sunshine with him, always entertained a genius of old pensioners, and took great care of an old grandmother (who considered him the brightest genius of any age) and two orphan nieces, somewhere in Hertfordshire, and was not, perhaps, on the whole, such a bad sort of a fellow.

"Tip-toppers?" whispered the manager to his friend, as he bustled officiously in advance of his guests.

"The very first," Thomas returned. "An earl, a baron, and a foreign count: no end of a swell. The conceited puppy," he added, musingly, to conceive that any slightly imaginative eulogium on Edgar Greyfaunt. It was a harmless peculiarity of our friend that he always gave his aristocratic acquaintances a step in rank. Thus, if you were a captain, he spoke of you as colonel; if you were an archdeacon, he made you a bishop.

"Sure, I'm very much obliged to you Tom," said our M-Variety. "Come and chop on Sunday?"

"Thanks. Can't promise, but we'll see."

"Well, I know you will if some one swell doesn't turn up. This way, gentlemen. You're just in time for the circus. Just a goin' to begin, in the slovenly."

"Who is this Madame Ernestine, Mr. M-Variety?" asked Sir William Long, quitting Lord Milton's arm to walk with the manager.

"Famous French equestrian, my lord. Just arrived from Paris. Turned all the people's heads there. Sir Lumley Greenbridge's wife—"

"I am Sir William Long," the baronet said, quietly, "and should be very much obliged if you would tell me any thing definite about this Madame Ernestine. I am very curious, indeed, to learn."

The manager indulged in a subdued—a very subdued—whistle. He glanced at the baronet's face, and saw that it wore an expression of earnest curiosity.

"Well, she ain't young, Sir William," he made answer.

"If she be the person I mean she must be forty years of age, or thereabout."

"You may bet your money on that horse, Sir William," interposed Tom Tuttlehell. "You'll excuse my familiarity, but I've always found the swells most affable. His Grace the Duke of Bogshire—here you are—owe me a week, thanks to my friend Tom Tuttlehell. Invaluable fellow, Tom. His grace wanted to drive his open-head drag in the Imperial lake, but I was obliged to refuse him, for fear of accidents, and the newspapers, and that sort of thing. Ah! and you've been a hard life now to me, Lord, and what a manager has to put up with. Those licensing m. gistrates are enough to worry one into the grave. Only think. That stupid old Sergeant Timberlake, the chairman, was nearly giving a casting vote against our shop, on the ground that we encouraged immoral, and that cold-blooded lamb, Lord Milton, actually voted lamb-like to drinking."

"Believe in my sympathy, Mr. M-Variety," said this Madame Ernestine, now. Not my that she is not young?"

"She's no chicken, and that's a fact; but this is, of course, strictly entre nous. Ladies in her profession are never supposed to grow old."

"Is she handsome?"

"Makes up uncommonly well at night: doesn't spare the 'slap,' you know, the red and white," responded Mr. M-Variety, diplomatically.

"Can you tell me any thing more about her? I have a particular reason for inquiring, far beyond any impertinent curiosity."

"All communications strictly confidential, Sir William," said the manager, bowing. "William, though it's against my rules. My standing orders to my stage-door keeper, when any persons ask questions by parties—and many have been asked by the very first in the land—about the ladies and gentlemen of the company, is to tell 'em that I'm not bothered with 'em. Now, to tell you the honest truth about Madame Ernestine, she's about the most mysterious party I ever knew, and I've had a few mysterious parties in my time, Sir William."

"I have no doubt of it, Mr. M-Variety; pray proceed."

"I can't make out whether she's a Frenchwoman or an Englishwoman. She speaks one language as well as the other. She comes in as a trooper and drinks like a fish, which ain't very uncommon in the horse-riding profession; but then she goes herself all sorts of fine-lady airs, and treats you as if you were a dog-mat. She says she was born in Switzerland, which was Englishman, who is dead, and that she is a lady in her own right. My treasurer, Van Post, won't believe it, and you'd find it rather hard to meet with a sharper customer than Billy Van Post. "If she's a lady,' says he, 'why don't she go to her relations?'"

"Is she talented?"

"Clever as Old Scratch, to whom, I think, she's first cousin. But, to tell you the honest truth, Sir William, she's too old for the kick-out business. At her time of life the swells don't care about seeing her jump through the hoops. It's time for her to cover up her ankles, Sir William. Tom Tuttlehell told her so, and she offered to knock him down for it; but we got her to listen to reason at last. You see, Tom found her out for me in Paris, and I pay him a handsome salary."

"But does it pay you to do so?"

"That's just it, Sir William. You'd hardly credit it, but it does pay uncommon well. That ingenious fellow, Tom Tuttlehell, put me up to the dodge of the high school of horsemanship which he knew was at Paris, and as he says, he's as clever as lying," pursued the candid Mr. M-Variety; "and it ain't far off from lying, any way."

"What can this mean?" Ranelagh asked himself.

"Just this: You've got a lady rider that's clever—first-rate, mind, but passy. Well, you just put her on a ridiculous flat and a side-hat, and you give her a trained horse and a sidesaddle, and she makes him go through all kind of capers to slow music, and the audience they go half wild with excitement. It's a new thing, Sir William, and tickles 'em. The British public are very capricious, and have got tired of the Three Graces on one horse, and the Swiss Shepherdess on her milk-white steed, and such like.

"And the high-school horse?"

"Perfection, Sir William. When first dug out Madame Ernestine in Paris she was very low down in the world, going round the fairs, I have heard say, as a posture-girl on a mermaid, or a giantess, or something not worth five-and-twenty bob a week, at all events. She was quite broke-in, Tom, and paid for having her to rehearse a play with the brandy-bottle. Well, Tom saw there was something in her, and that she was exactly the kind of thing we were looking for business, and he managed to pick up a horse from an Italian fellow that kept a wax-work show—Venti something his name was; and the horse and the madame have turned me in a pretty penny since I opened. I wish every thing else in the gardens had turned out as profitably," M-Variety added, with a half-sigh.

"And the madame, as you call her, is a success?"

"Draws tremendously. As I warned you, she's no great shakes as to youth or good looks: but for pluck, and general 'go,' she's a first-rate woman," the manager continued, confidentially, "may be considered a Ripper. Fear! She doesn't know what fear is. Five-barred gates! She'd take the wall of the King's Bench Prison, cheveux de frise and all, and leap over the Surrey Hills into Epsom. She's a Ripper, Sir William, and nothing but a Ripper."

"Is she alone—I mean, does she live alone?"

"Yes and no. Her husband's dead, she says. That I told you. The wax-work Italian says he's her uncle, but he's abroad. She has a French woman and the three children here. When she's broken the old one's head with a waterjug. Barring that, I think she's alone. Stay, there's a lady and that fine boy with her —a niece, or cousin, or dependent of some kind, though Billy Van Post, my treasurer, will have it that she's the madame's illegitimate. A quiet little girl she is, and would be pretty if she wasn't so thin and pale. Like a little ghost she is. The madame's a devil of a temper. Twice I've been obliged to go bail for her good behavior at Southwark Police Court with the and the water-jug and her dressers have fallen out."

"It is the countess," thought Sir William Long. "Poor little girl!" To Mr. M-Variety he went on, abstractedly: "It is pretty, very pretty, indeed."

The conversation to which I have striven to give coherent sequence had in reality been made up of disjointed fragments strewn about by the voluble M-Variety as they wandered through the gardens. Long before its close they had entered the wooden pavilion fitted up as a circus, and occupied a private box in front of the row's private box. Here Lord Carlton, after expressing to Tom Tuttlehell his opinion that M-Variety was worthy of patronage, and fellow, went placidly to sleep. Tom, who was one of the most placable of creatures, and had quite forgotten Edgar Greyfaunt's unmannerly slight, would have been very happy to entertain the young man with a lively description of the surrounding and company connected with Ranelagh; but the sultan chose to continue supercilliously silky, and Tom, seeing that he was merely wasting his breath, slipped out of the box and had a walk round the gardens, where he found numbers of people who fully appreciated and cheerfully patronized by his condescending to talk to them.

Sir William Long was too much engaged with his own thoughts to notice the departure of Tom, or of the polite manager, who, when Tom quitted the box, had gone to the door to look-ing at the audience in the hope, and with the expectation, that they were looking at and admiring him.—Sir William Long had ample scope to think. The memories came rushing over him. In the desert of a misspent life two or three oases started up. His remembrance went back to dinner at Greenwich, to a little timid girl who fell pretty and made playful love to, to kiss had primed her for the first waltz. How many years had passed since that dinner, and yet how many hundreds of times he had re-culled it; how vividly he could recall its salient incidents now! Why? It was but an ordinary tavern festival. It had been at scores of similar revelries, in company as good, as bad, or as indifferent, since. There had been nothing in the tavern of the common. Nothing but that child who had sat by his side. And what was she to him: to him, a gentleman of wealth, title, and ancient descent? If she lived, and were indeed this Ernestine's dependent, she could scarcely be a woman even now, and he was worn and grizzled. Why should he thought-dream it again and again, to the childish playmate—the playmate but of an hour—whom he had kissed in the tavern of the common.

"Here is the high school of horsemanship," remarked Mr. Greyfaunt. "What a dreadful old hard-mouthed Bucephalus-habit to be sure! who looks like Queen Boadicea addressing the ancient Britons."

The four Shepherdess had whirled round the arena on her milk-white steed, scattering artificial flowers out of a kind of decorated umbrella, and, using gratuities of unlimited tan into the eyes of the groomlings. The Three Graces, in very short skirts, and somewhat fat fleshings, had likewise made the circuit of the ring on their solitary steed. The clown had uttered his usual dreary wittisms; and his colleague, with a deadly foe, a French gymnaste, attired in garments of pasti-colored fine, had tied himself into several knots, grimaced between his teeth, knocked the back of his head against the small of his back and uttered the customary ejaculation of "Lo, la!" to the immense delight of the audience. French grotesques were novelties in those days, and the mountebank in question was exceedingly popular.

The legitimate British clown stood apart, watching the success of his alien competitor with intense disgust.

"That fit for a Hilingfish king, is it?" muttered the Britisher. "Wot's the use o' me a-goin' to the 'ouse of Guelph, that's to go down at Windsor Castle before the royal family and the nobility and gentry. It's enough to make a feller go to the 'ouse of Brunswick, or return Methody patron at once. I'd rather be a barker to a show-shop in the Cut than demean myself like this."

Here the volatile foreigner, whose head was turned by success, and who was plainly presuming on his popularity, came up to the British friend with his tongue out and "I say, minhere—" The clown, whose cockscomb was out of joint, answered to him by the back of, or attempt a little harder than he would have done to an English colleague, and grumbling, "I'll punch your head for the frowsers, if I don't," submitted to be touched up by the riding-master's whip, to thrust his hands into the pockets of his spangled pants, turn in his toes, make a grimace, and to propound, for the seventeen hundredth time, one of the seventeen conundrums he had carefully studied from a text-book, bought at the stall, as the outset of his professional career.

I think it is subsequently to the performance of Herr Mooney, the spangled contortionist, who achieved such fame through his elegance, and to swallow himself, that the celebrated trick act of the Young Straggler, from the Imperial Circus Samaritand, took place. Something that appear, you recollect, as a British sailor, from which, by continual flinging off his outer garments into the ring, he was successively transformed into a parish beadle, Punch, a Scottish Highlander, Massaroni the Brigand, the Emperor Napoleon, and Cupid, God of Love. It was just after Straggler's second recall, amidst thunders of applause at the close of his performance, that the bond, which had been constantly repeating, times and again, those good old jogtrot airs traditional in all circuses I have ever seen all over the world, and which seemed to have been expressly composed for horses to canter to, addressed itself to a very slow and almost lugubrious performance. And then the heavy curtain, which veiled the entrance to the circus from the stables were drawn aside, the barriers were thrown open, and Madame Ernestine, in a splendid velvet riding-habit, a shining beaver, a silver-gray veil, and waving an ivory-mounted whip, made her appearance on her celebrated trained steed—a magnificent chestnut mare.

The high school of horsemanship required some taste to appreciate. At first the performing it bored you somewhat. A long time elapsed before it seemed to be coming to any thing. The first time some of the trained dressed rehearsed the belief that she had got a stone in her foot, and was making sundry buttonless efforts by ways to start it, and to pave the impediment out. Then she slowly backed on to the edges of the ring among the orchestral paraphernalia, causing the wind instruments in the lower rows to shriek. After that she reared up, until her fore-hoofs seemed in dangerous proximity to the chandeliers, and her long sweeping tail lay almost on a level with the dust of the arena. Then she curveted sideways; then she went through a series of dignified steps, now approaching a gavotte, and now offering some resemblance to the measure de la cour. And then the musicians struck up a livelier strain, and the trained steed began to prance and to canter. The canter broke into a gallop, interspersed with sudden checks, which threw you, with renewed gallop, with desperate plunges, and which concluded with a terrific high-flying leap over the barriers. The audience shouted applause. The grooms clambered on to the barriers, and held up between them a scarf breast high. The trained steed took it easily, and bounded back into the ring. And then the music became soft and solemn and subdued again, and the docile creature subsided into gentle amblings, and almost imperceptible gambades. Such was the high school of horsemanship. Such was the high school of horsemanship, as the scarf went left out; but it still culminates in a sensation.

Sir William Lone cared very little for the high school of horsemanship; but he never took his eyes off the horsewoman. She rode wonderfully well. She was evidently very powerful of hand, and had complete command (the which she exercised sparingly) over her horse; but her seat—it means were at the same time replete with grace. She flinched not, she faltered not when her charger was cavorting on a bare bolster-cloth of the centre of gravity. She and the horse seemed one. She must have been Lycus's sister.

She was, more certainly, the countess who once used to live at the Hotel Rataplan, the once fashionable lady who had dined at Cutwig & Co.'s, and had left the child at the Maresnest's. She was the lady of the Three Roses.

Yes," William said to himself, "it was she." Woefully changed in many respects she was; by no means younger, she had by many years the old traits; there was the old manner; and, at the heat and height of her horse-tricks, when the animal she was exercising reared, and the circle at topmost speed, there were audible, above the sibilant slash of the whip on the poor beast's flank, the same shrill tones by which she strove to him to still further rapidity. And there were the same tones which William Long had heard years ago, when the impetuous woman was angry or excited.

She had more than reached middle age, for, by her features, it was not to be said that her beauty. Beneath the paint and powder they must have been swollen or haggard, flushed or pallow. You could not tell. But, by the gas-light, the precise nature of the change which had come over her, or how she would look by day, was carefully studied by the stores to excite the admiration of his alien competitor.

voice was that I heard in your dressing-room? Had you not a child—a daughter—years ago? She must be grown up by this time."

The countess made him an ironical courtesy. "Merci du compliment, monseigneur," she sneered. "Yes, I know well enough that I am growing old. Du reste, let me inform you that I am not in the habit of bringing my fille de chambre"—she laid, perhaps intentionally, a stronger emphasis on the word "fille" than on those which followed—"and that if you will be good enough to take care of your own affairs, I shall have much pleasure in attending to mine. I come alone or not at all. Am I understood?"

"Perfectly. Brava! you are quite the old countess—I beg pardon, the young countess—we used to know and call Semiramis. Come alone, if such is your will. Now, good-by until after the fire-works."

He was retiring, when she recalled him.

"Stop, mauvais sujet," she cried, "have you got a billet de cent francs about you par hasard? I want to buy some gloves.

Sir William laughed. "You will scarcely find the Burlington Arcade at South Lambeth," he said, as searching in his waistcoat-pocket he brought out some loose sovereigns and dropped them into the woman's outstretched hand. She just nodded her thanks, and going into her room shut the door. The performances in the circus were over, and the work-people were turning off the gas. The baronet had some difficulty in groping his way to the door.

"She has not changed a bit, save in looks," he soliloquized; "what a devouring harpy it is, to be sure! If ever the horse-leech had a fourth daughter the countess must have been the one. How hungry she used to be in the old days after money!"

Madame Ernestine, on her part, was also soliloquizing. "Ah! I am Semiramis, am I? Ah! I am asked to supper because it is thought I have a daughter. Ah! pieces of gold are flung to me with a taunt, like pennies to a beggar. Little devil"—she said this savagely, and not to herself. "Thou art sticking pins into me on purpose. Quick, my pink dress; quick, or I shall strangle thee!"

FARRAGUT.

Hits is a heritage of deathless fame
That shall grow brighter with each rolling year;
On History's page shall live no grander name,
None that his countrymen will hold more dear.

Hail to the Viking, he whose praise is heard
Borne from our lips on every wandering breeze!
His name to-day is as a household word;
Hail to the greatest sailor on the seas!

Oh never through all time shall he forget
His last brave deed, now told by every lip,
When on the mizzen, 'mid a storm of shot,
Lashed in the rigging of his stanch old ship!

Give ear, ye winds, that lift the deeds's sander,
Give ear, ye breezes, that wander far away;
Bear the great Viking's fame to farthest lands,
Tell how he passed the forts in Mobile Bay.

Oh, what to him the battle's roar and crash,
Or what his ears the cannon's fiery breath,
Though round him, in his place, at every flash,
Shrieked the fierce iron messenger of Death!

His is a heart that knows no thought of fear,
No dread of Death amid the battle's strife:
His noble ken scarce knows what fear is,
Than say ties which wed him unto life.

Such stuff are heroes made of—when they die
The nation mourns, such man as for a friend;
And in a nobler Pantheon, filled high,
Transcends of voices in one anthem blend.

Long may he live to hear us speak his praise!
Our children's children shall be taught his name,
That through the growth of undiscovered days
Shall shine upon the rooster-roll of fame!

LOU VENESTRE.

THE softened splendor of an April sunset was streaming across a southern landscape as Lou Venestre, leaving her mettlesome steed sharply, and then holding the rein with a little but firm and assured hand, let him climb over a space that left her small and slight figure far behind.

Her dark eyes flashing with excitement and eagerness, and her black curls floating back in jolly contrast to the mowy plumes of her riding-hat, the girl was just such a bright and sparkling picture as one likes to look upon in that misty sunset glory.

Scarcely pausing for a little darkey to throw open the avenue gate, she entered through it, and by the very steps of her father's house, where several gentlemen stood talking earnestly. There reining him in so suddenly that he almost fell upon his haunches, she called out—

"Gentlemen, have you forgotten how to hurrah? Sumter is ours!" And she lifted her plumed hat, waving it.

Before they could respond, her horse—already so restive as to almost defy control—had caught the gleam of the floating feathers, and, mad with fright, wheeled and, in spite of all her efforts to restrain him, shot off at a rapid angle down the ascent upon whose summit the house stood.

The gentlemen sprung and the negroes ran in all directions. Lou, finding her self powerless, her strength was failing her, and the reins were slipping through her little fingers, when a strong hand fell upon his bridle, and clucked the frightened animal so quickly and so firmly as to leave him trembling in every muscle. In another instant she stood upon the ground, a little whitefaced, but in no danger of fainting. Lou Venestre was not one of that sort.

Berrian Knowles, catching the direction she was taking, had darted at a thought across the garden, and intercepted her.

They were at some distance from the house, and the others, taking the route they did, had not yet come up. While he waited for Miss Venestre to recover her some what shaken equanimity, Knowles, letting the horse find his own way back, stood with his arms folded and his gray eyes fixed upon the distance.

He looked young—a sharp, clear-cut face, though decided as it was handsome, with a nervous mobility just now about the mouth, and a kindling light in the keen eyes that belied the carelessness of his attitude.

Miss Venestre was herself very shortly; enough so, at any rate, to say, with a slight impatience, yet feelingly—

"You have saved my life, Berrian, and you stand there as though it was the commonest of incidents."

"Do I?" he said, in much I did, you know. And I was thinking how much more unmanageable a steed than yours our unhappy South had just mounted. Did you hear anything from Sumter?"

"That Sumter is ours?" said the girl, a sudden, eager glow upon her beautiful face. "Mr. Nugent told me; I was coming from town. The news came by telegraph. It is flashing the length of the land by this time. May it strike as much consternation to cowardly Northern hearts as it does exultation to ours. Gentlemen"—for the rest had come up by this time, and were listening to the excited girl, forgetting in their eagerness to congratulate her upon her safety—"Gentlemen, shall we have that cheer now?" And again the white plumes waved over her head.

The gentlemen responded in an excited and somewhat clamorous fashion, in which, however, Berrian Knowles did not join, but stood apart with his brow knit and his lip curling.

Miss Venestre turned hurriah with the rest, which, enthusiastic as she was, one might have expected. Her lips were smiling; but though she was not looking at him, she was conscious of the half contemptuous observation of young Knowles, and was saying to herself,

"He has never been the same since that six months at the North. I dare say now, judging me by his pet Northern standard, he considers my conduct highly unfeminine."

"Knowles don't seem to appreciate the news," said one of the gentlemen, glancing toward Berrian. "Why, man, this blow virtually makes an independent nation of us. It's the inauguration of such days as the South never saw—a glorious victory."

"One hundred men against ten thousand!—you may call that a glorious victory, I don't," said Berrian Knowles, bluntly.

There was more commotion in the ranks of the others as he spoke, and Miss Venestre's face flushed, but as the argument seemed about to leap into stormy words, she lightly led the way to the house, her hand within her father's arm.

Berrian did not follow at once. His blood was hot, and he waited, coming finally to the door, only to say good-night to Lou.

Miss Venestre was not in the room. The gentlemen were talking excitedly, and Knowles was quite sure he caught an echo of his own name as he crossed the hall. He hesitated, then made his bow, and with a hand familiarly on his shoulder urged him toward the others, saying,

"I have been defending you, Knowles, but I'm glad you've come now to speak for yourself. These gentlemen have some of them been trying to persuade me you're not sound on Southern rights—eh?"

The young man's eyes glowed wide and bright.

"Who says that?" he asked.

"There, didn't I tell you so?" said Venestre, sound and stanch. Of course he'll stand by us."

Berrian knows colored. He looked at him a moment, simply that he might not speak too excitedly to Lou's father.

together, and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, as I fancied myself 'wagging my pow i' the pu'pit,' as Burns says. Besides, the peccavis is on my side now, for litigation is flourishing here.—The following superscription to a letter tickled amazingly the clerks of our post-office the other day:

"I sweit at the dove your curse purvue,
Les nought your speed restrain,
Until you reach Mar Lee Harry,
In Newfield, State of Maine."

I NEVER think of poor FITZ-JAMES O'Brien without recalling the touching letter which he wrote the morning before he was committed to the asylumfor his right arm, which resulted in his death. He had been a brave officer, and he met his death as bravely as he could. In one of his little poems, which he gave me many months before he joined the army, but which was mislaid among some other manuscripts until a little while ago. It is now for the first time published, from his neat and legible manuscript. To my conception the lines are exceedingly graceful and spirited:

TO A CAPTIVE SEA-GULL.

Bird of the wild far-sweeping wing
Why art thou here?
Who chained thee thus, thou Ocean-King,
To exile dark and drear?

Thy home is where the free winds sing,
And the tumbler-tones of billows ring
Through crystal caves rocked with fear!

Did not thy proud heart burst—
Thou reckless rider of the stormy main—
When o'er thy unsullied plumage first
Was flung Man's chain?

Oh! thou whose infancy was nursed
Mid all the freedom of the skies,
How could thy spirit grips
Life o'er again?

Tempests were at thy birth, and the white waves
Sprang up rejoicing round thy rugged home
And as a baby, from deep-mouthed caves
Wild ocean-songs sound come,
Bathed in the breakers' foam,
Rocked midst the storm on the swelling sea.
Never was wild bird's infancy
More bright or free!

No more—sad prophecy—ah! never more
Will joy of thine unbind thy frozen heart.
The unreposing ocean and dark shore,
The giant cliffs—the cavern's hollow roar,
Now of thy prison life form no part,
All prisoned, pining, wretched as thou art!
Existence is a waste. Thy soul lies dead.
The strong wing thy wing have melted there,
Drooped is that glorious head,
Stained is that bosom once to pure and fair—
Dimmed is that proud bright eye.
Thy home is the bleak sea—
Better thy last breath had been sighed
Where all was free.
Better that death-wounds were triumphantly
Swept o'er thy pride,
Than to a louse existence thus to cling,
And hear the wild winds mock at thy unlifted wing!

CAN any reader tell me who is the author of the subjoined pregnant sentences? In consideration of thought and felicity of expression I have seldom seen their equal:

"Death is continually walking the rounds of a great city, and sooner or later stops at every man's door. But, after all, the shortest life is long enough if it lead to a better; and the longest life is too short if it do not."

THERE is something exceedingly soft sayings, not to say positively ludicrous, in the illustrations which are sometimes made use of by good and faithful ministers of the public administration. The reason of this I take to be the enthusiasm of the moment—a sort of bewildering conflict of the mind for the immediate and forcible pointing of a moral.

The following instance in this kind, although not clerical, was related to me by a friend, who was both an eye and ear witness of the scene.

The subject of the "utterance" was a delinquent who had "backslided" three times within a twelvemonth. He had been a friend of humanity and forgiving temper in the congregation, who was anxious that he should be reinstated in the church with which he was related.

In the course of his remarks he made these observations:

"Brethren, you remember the parable of the barren fig-tree, which our blessed Saviour spared one year more. Let us pray about him, and 'hoe' around the roots of the tree?' Our erring brother here is an epitome, as it were, of the barren fig-tree. He has backslidden three times. He has cumbered the ground space, the world and the things thereof; but he is now penitent, and means to be, and I have no doubt will be, a good man. I hope he will be. He will be received again on probation. Suppose he has been heretofore a barren fig-tree? Let us try him one year more. Let us dig about him, and lay on manure, and so bring him up to the full stature of a perfect man."

This eloquent advocacy restored the backslider, nor hoe he since, in a single instance, said my informant, "gone out of the way."

ONCE upon a time "John Phœnix" (the late Lieutenant Captain Derby) was going up to Sacramento from San Francisco, and it so chanced that two steamers, running side by side, were engaged in racing. When these boats had been running for about sixty miles, "tight and tight, and nip and tuck," passengers gathered in knots about the deck, discussing the comparative speed of the two steamers.

"Do you think the other boat has gained upon us within the last fifty miles?"

"I think she has, somewhat, although I can't hardly tell how much. But, as I said before, I think she has gained."

"Well, how much do you think she has gained?"

"I may be wrong, as I have not lately accustomed myself to 'average' distances; but I think that within the last fifty miles she has gained about an inch!"

The several knots of passengers speedily dispersed upon hearing this remark, except that Mr. John laughed in his sleeve at the sudden manner in which he had discomfited the persistent inquisitors.

A little characteristic specimen of Phœnix's love of fun occurred at West Point, on the occasion of a lecture upon Astronomy. The lecturer was in the habit of assuming that all his students were totally ignorant of the very first principles of any particular branch of science which he might be discussing. It happened, on a certain occasion, that the lecturing upon the Moon, and Phœnix, who was at the head of his class, with two or three others, determined to balk the Professor in his style of teaching. So he began:

"Gentlemen, our lecture this evening is upon the Moon; one of the most interesting subjects," etc., etc.

"You have all seen the moon?"

"Yes," said Phœnix, "I have never seen it."

"What!" said the Professor; "never have seen the moon?"

"No," the first members of the class declared they had never seen that planet, and persisted in the expression of their perfect ignorance of its character.

The "premises" of the Professor were removed, his "bare-line" was gone, and he collapsed into utter confusion.

WHALING AT THE CAPE DE VERDES.

LIFE in a group of islands on the coast of Africa, between the tropics of Cancer and Capricorn. The monotony of our everyday life is sometimes broken by incidents that cause more or less excitement and interest among our not very extensive community of Europeans—such as the arrival of the mail steamer and the receipt of news from home, which is no slight pleasure to Englishmen living abroad. Sometimes we are visited by Uncle Sam's new man of war, with the stripes and the bloomshouts of the Confederate cruisers. Once we were favored by a flying visit from a Confederate cruiser who made his appearance one morning in our offing; but as we had a Northerner at anchor in our harbor at the time the would-be visitor merely peeped at us from the offing, and finding that he was her stern as she stood away again to sea. We are not so far off the coast but that at times we hear curious tales of the buccaneering doings of battles round and about the European settlements between them and the Europeans; and we occasionally see curious things in the guerilla way on the main-land. Now and then we are visited by travelers who have lived much among the negroes, and have gone out in quest of the gorilla, or have once seen a skull said to have once been the property of a real living specimen of that tribe. We have heard exciting stories, extraordinary escapes, narrow expeditions, the capture of slaving vessels with their human freights through the vigilance of her Majesty's ships. But as my object in writing this is to entertain whiling expedition in which I once took a part I will proceed to give some account of it.

It was a fine summer's day; the thermometer stood at about 80° in the shade, a moderate breeze blew over the red-colored land and blue-colored waters of our bay, when I left my bed and breakfasted, and was looking out from our verandah on the bay, with its dazzling sandy beach which extends round its border, when I noticed most favorable and convenient position for the purpose. Directly afterward several boats were seen to put off into the bay, rowing with more energy than is customary among them, for at the best they are on most occasions the reverse of energetic. The boats pulled, and in a direct course for the leeward side of our bay, instead of following the usual track parallel by boats passing and repassing within the harbor. My curiosity was raised to a high pitch to know the cause of so much confusion; but the surprise was quickly removed from my mind when I perceived, floating very placidly on the surface of the water, an immense long black-colored object, which I at once knew to be a whale. The boats were soon then playing with their young, or "calves," as they are called, during the visits which they make to our waters during the months of winter between January and July. Presently I saw the foremost boat had reached the whale, which we conjectured was either dead or fatally wounded, being a boat to approach so near without appearing to move. On looking again through my glass I noticed that the boat was actually made fast to the monster, and that several other boats which had reached the scene of action had followed on to the first boat, and that the whole corrige was now proceeding at a very slow, funeral-like pace through the water with the whale in tow astern.

I proceeded to the landing-place, and not being able to resist the temptation of joining in what offered to be an exciting expedition, I pushed into a boat that then happened to be leaving for the general rendezvous. On reaching the scene of action I found that the whale was moored loosely in two or three places, and that in its side was sticking a harpoon. The boats were now being towed along after the whale, being made fast to it by the piece of line joined to the harpoon in its side. The whale was about sixty feet long, and was much exhausted, and still quite hors de combat. The boats continued to arrive from the shore and from the ships in the harbor until about fifteen to eighteen were assembled round the whale, who continued to behave most unofficiously. We formed a motley throng, and looked every inch the assemblage I anticipated that we were composed of Englishmen, Americans, Portuguese, Germans, and our natives, making up together quite a Babel of languages. Soon a grand attack was commenced; the whale began to move along "owly as the boats closed around on all sides. Cow-hars, boat-hooks, long knives, and a hatchet formed our arms, and away we hacked and slashed, cutting holes in the body, and then inserting the cross-bars and working them to open and deepen the holes thus formed. The whale appeared to take but little notice of our doings, and after taking two or three turns in the shallow water of the bay commenced to make for the bay, make off to sea, moving along rather faster, at about three or four miles an hour. Most of the boats now fastened on, one after the other, in order not to have so much rowing to do, while two of the natives mounted on the whale's back to work away with the cross-bars. The whale appeared not to like fun, for the whale now gave a plunge and dived down; the natives' bars were first seen floating, and then as the whale descended, on the surface they were rescued by the boats around. Soon afterward up came the whale itself, and spouted out a column of water that rose to about the height of ten or twelve feet, and happened to be blown over a boat containing two German captains, who were much disgusted with the unpleasant odor of the water.

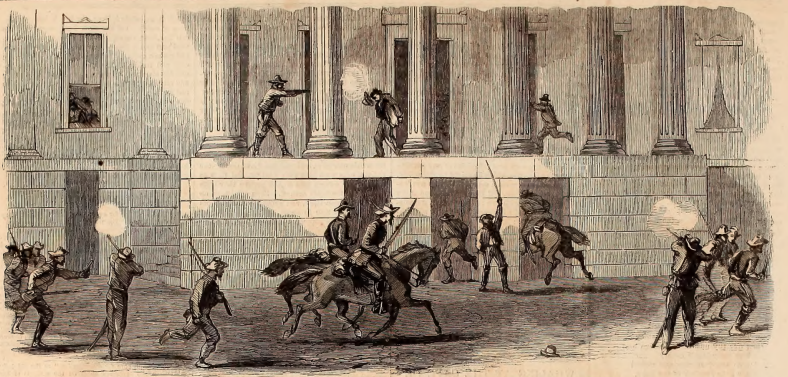
We were now fast approaching the mouth of the bay; the sea began to rough on, and we began to think of our return. Hereupon, on we went, the natives crying out now and again that the whale was coming up to breathe, as twice it dived down, and as whales are known to go down and remain swimming under water, when well, for as long a period as an hour, and frequently when harpooned by the whalers, considerable apprehension was manifested, and knives were ready to cut the short rope with which the first boat in case our whale should have an idea of making a prolonged stay below; but it appeared unable to stay a long time, probably the first operation: its stay did not exceed half a minute, the longest time that it was under water. An Englishman in one of the boats inserted an oar in the animal's mouth as it swam along, in a vain attempt to reach its throat, and so to dispatch it; but the whale proceeded ahead, not appearing to notice this movement. On we advanced, the whale appearing not to be any nearer its dissolution in consequence of our grand combined attack on it. We had now gained three miles from the landing-place. Several boats now returned to shore, others remained and continued the chase. The sea was now very rough, the whale could come up to be. come better acquainted with it by occasionally sending the crest of a wave into our boat.

The operation of cutting and hacking the whale were now principally given up, through the sea running so high as not to allow of much execution being done, the natives still insisting that the whale would not live much longer. We, the lookers on, were now anxiously hoping that it might soon die as we knew that it was proceeding for an indefinite period to sea. Just at this moment a whaling boat hove in sight, which was a source of satisfaction to us. After a hurried meeting to kill the whale, and after having boiled up the blubber to give five barrels of oil to the natives; the natives held out for more, and, therefore refused to give more, until the whalers, seeing that the whale would not be killed by the natives according to the plan pursued by them, after another twenty-four hours, when it would probably be some eighty miles away, and also fearful of losing the whole, agreed to let in charge of it, they decided to kill it, which they did most unmurrily. In went the long lances wielded by the whalers, and in a few minutes a high spout stream of blood once or twice, and the whalers soon became the victors. The natives returned to shore, and the whalers stood away their prize to their vessel, which awaited them off the coast of our island in a small bay. Now commenced our return to shore, which we reached at dark, we had all to take a turn at the oars, for our men were fagged. Those of us not accustomed to rowing fared badly, and were glad to see the welcome arrival ashore, for the shape of blisters on the hands and drenched garments, that we had formed part of the expedition: and thus arrived ashore without any mishap.

We afterward heard from the master of the whaling vessel that the harpoon that was found stuck in the whale's side was fired by the inscription of a whaling vessel that was engaged in fishing for whales at an island some sixty miles off, consequently our whale must have traversed that distance (and more, for probably it did not come direct from the island in our bay. We also heard that it yielded upward 22 tuns, or 440 gallons, instead of about 50 barrels, which it would probably have yielded had it been originally captured in good health, instead of being badly wounded and ill.

The whale was one of a species called by the whalers Humpbacks, and sometimes Blackfish, and yield, on the average, about 40 or 50 barrels, or 2000 to 2500 gallons per every full-grown fish. The Humpbacks are usually accompanied by females (or male whales), from the fact that the cows are more frequently met with near land than the bulls, as they frequent the shallow inlets, and the coast generally, to play with their calves (or young); and the whalers, making an island or other similar place a rendezvous, wait for the harpoon to appear in smooth water than in rough water, or where there is a heavy sea running.

The plan generally adopted by the whalers in harpooning the whales in our waters, which is during the breeding season, is thus: When the whales, which generally go in "schools" of from two to six, are playing with their young in the smooth water of the bay,



FORREST'S RAID INTO MEMPHIS—THE REBELS AT THE GAYOSO HOUSE.—[SKETCHED BY GEORGE H. ELLSBURY.]

FORREST'S RAID.

ON Monday, August 22, the rebel General FORREST made a daring raid into Memphis, Tennessee, which is illustrated in the accompanying sketches. The expedition was commanded by FORREST in person, and consisted of portions of eight or nine cavalry regiments, mostly from Tennessee, and numbering from 1200 to 2000 strong. Arriving at Beal Street, the rebels divided off in several squads and struck for the Gayoso House, Hospitals, Irving Block, and General WASHBURNE'S head-quarters on Union Street. The latter was first visited by a force of about two hundred, under Lieutenant-Colonel JESSE FORREST, who entered and found it deserted, the General and his staff having but a moment before escaped. Jesse captured the General's over-coat, and started for the Gayoso House with his valiant horsemen, who rode right into the office of the hotel in search of General HURLBURT, who had also escaped. A portion of the rebel force then proceeded to break open Irving Prison, in order to release the prisoners there confined.—But the guard resisted them, and was assisted by the fortunate arrival at the right moment of the Eighth Iowa regiment. About 6 A.M. the rebels left the town, finding it growing too hot for them, having accomplished the capture of 200 citizens and about 100 horses, and having butchered all the negroes they could find in in the streets. There was little plundering; indeed the rebels had orders not to dismount under penalty of being shot. The rebels suffered heavily. Their object appears to have been the capture of Generals WASHBURNE and HURLBURT.

MAJOR-GENERAL WRIGHT AND STAFF.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

GENERAL WRIGHT AND STAFF.

We give above portraits of General WRIGHT and Staff. General HORATIO GATES WRIGHT, a native of Connecticut, became a Cadet at West Point in 1837, and graduated with the rank of Second Lieutenant of Engineers in 1841. He was appointed as Acting Assistant Professor of Engineering in that Academy in 1842, a position which he occupied for a year, when he was made Assistant Professor. In February, 1848, he was promoted to be First Lieutenant in the regular army. He entered the war at the beginning, and was given the rank of a Brigadier-General. He was one of the most efficient of the general officers connected with the Port Royal expedition; and in March, 1862, he was engaged in the capture of Fernandina, Florida. Having been promoted to a Major-Generalship he was, in August, 1862, assigned to the command of the Department of Ohio. Upon the reorganization of the Army of the Potomac General WRIGHT's Division was made the First Division, the Sixth Corps, under General SEDGWICK. When SEDGWICK was killed in May General WRIGHT succeeded to the command of the Corps.

GENERAL JOHN W. GEARY.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL JOHN W. GEARY, whose portrait we give on this page, is a native of Pennsylvania. He was Lieutenant-Colonel of ROBERTS's Pennsylvania Regiment of Volunteers in the Mexican war. He was in command of this regiment in the battle of Chapultepec, and was wounded in the action. Notwithstanding this he resumed the command that same day in the attack of De Belen gate. He was elevated to the rank of a Colonel November 3, 1847. The next year he was appointed Postmaster of San Francisco.

General GEARY entered the present war as Colonel of the Twenty-Eighth Pennsylvania Regiment. In the latter part of 1861, his regiment, attached to General BANKS's command, was posted in the vicinity of Harper's Ferry on the Upper Potomac. Here GEARY was engaged in some pretty rough encounters with bodies of armed rebels, from five hundred to a thousand strong. In March, 1861, we find him Acting Brigadier-General at Leesburg. During M'CLELLAN's peninsular campaign GEARY was stationed with his brigade in the vicinity of White Plains, Virginia. It was about this time that he received his commission as Brigadier-General, commanding the First Brigade of the Second Division of the old Second Corps. This brigade GEARY led in the terrible battle of Cedar Mountain, where he received his second wound. Afterward GEARY's command, together with WILLIAMS's and GREEN's, constituted the Twelfth Corps. This corps in the battle of Gettysburg, July, 1863, held the extreme right. GEARY's command was transferred to Ten-nesse last winter, and has been covered with glory in a series of battles extending from the storming of Lookout Mountain to the late severe conflicts about Atlanta.

INS AND OUTS.

I WALKED hurriedly away from our village post-office, for the rain was beginning to fall sharply. I had a letter in my pocket for Squire Brinkley's daughter. The old gentleman had given it me in charge, being "afeared none of the Squire's folks would be down that night."

I had not been at the Brinkleys since Henderson Reese went away to Boston. Which of the daughters of Necessities let me say. Is the Squire's door?

I could not by the glimmering lamp-posts that the address on the envelope was not in Mr. Reese's handwriting. Little wonder that many a young man had been engaged—Henderson Reese and I. I was proud, trifling, and passionate, sparring with impatience the control he would have exercised. One day, under the shadows of the old apple-trees down by the brook, after some bitter, unjust words of mine, we parted. During the winter I did not go to singing-school. Mr. Reese did; and there were blents to tell me how he was keeping company with Squire Brinkley's daughter.

Just before he went away to Boston, to be in business with his uncle, the whole village rang with the engagement between Henderson Reese and Maggie Brinkley.

Miss Scudder, with her thin nose and pocked chin, made it her business to come up to Aunt Elvira's to tell me of it. I was washing tea-cups. As soon as I saw her picking her way through our kitchen-garden, I knew what was in it. A knife-and-fork-ivy-native of the hindles of a couple of the tea-cups, and before she had passed the turnip-bed I was ready for her. She came hurrying into our kitchen. Aunt Elvira was up stairs making beds. I wiped a chair for her, and before she could seat herself I said,

"So the Squire's daughter is engaged to one of my old lovers, Miss Scudder. Well, I guess he's as fine a fellow as ever walked the village green."

The spinster looked aghast.

"How can you, Miss Malen!" she said, elevating the pinked chin, the thin nostrils resembling a spread eagle. "Now do tell! Why, law me! don't you feel dreadful? Not a bit, hey? Why all the villagers are saying you will be a-spoiling your eyes crying for him'....

Almost on this word I went down the lane leading to the Squire's house. I entered by the kitchen door, for it was open a crack, and my shoes were muddy.

The Squire and his wife dozed over the dying embers.

"Here is a letter for Maggie," raising my voice to arouse them.

Squire Brinkley rubbed his eyes vigorously with his hard knuckles, and poked the old tabby cat from his knee.

"Why, bless me, Permelia, wake up! it's Miss Malen Dole. Have you been long, wife? It's Maggie's letter."

Mrs. Brinkley took off her spectacles like one in a dream, wiped them on her apron, and slowly adjusting them, looked at me, only as yet half awake.

"Did you say a letter, Magdalen? Who'd for?" asked the Squire. "From Boston? Then it's for Maggie, sure. Thain't none of Reese's writin' though; half an eye tells me that. Maggie orter be in. She just stepped in to one of the neighbors's one of the children was down with scarlet fever."

The garden-gate swung to with a sharp click. Mrs. Brinkley went toward the door to meet her daughter.

Maggie came in, a shawl over her head, her curls streaming, and bright with the night-rain. Her all lighted on the letter in her father's hand first thing. Her face became quite pale. She glanced nervously at me. Then she said out quite distinctly,

"Magdalen's brought you a letter. Tain't Reese's writin.' Seems to me one orter come along from him. I thought he'd write; he's writ nigh a month, ain't it?" said the Squire.

Maggie turned quietly toward the light, and tore open the letter.

"Don't go, Magdalen," her father said. "Wait a bit, and I'll see you home with a lantern."

My hand was upon the door-latch. Maggie was looking toward us: the letter had fluttered to the floor.

"He is dead. A stranger writes."

She said it quite simply, but her face was pale as a snow-drift. The pretty sparkle of her life seemed suddenly gone.

I don't think any of us for the moment quite took in what she said. She was so very quiet in her manner, but when she stretched out her arms toward her mother and uttered, "Mamma, mamma, I am so weary," we all three sprang, as though the lightning of God had smitten us.

Through that night we watched by her bedside. She did not speak or notice any of us, but kept her face turned to the wall. We could see that her eyes grew darker and brighter, and that a fever burned fiercely in her cheek.

At daybreak I stole out and went home. Aunt Elvira was up and nervous about my absence. I talked so fast that she only partially understood anything when I hurried away again to Squire Brinkley's house.

Maggie was delirious.

"It came on soon after you went out, Magdalen," half sobbed Mrs. Brinkley. "For a spell she was just as quiet as a mouse, not even a move of one of her little hands; and when the doctor put his finger on her wrist to feel of her pulse, she began to struggle and moan, and then burst right out in this frantic way."

Maggie was talking rapidly, still unconnected sentences.

Mrs. Brinkley covered her face with her apron and cried softly.

Dr. Bullson, the family physician, bent anxiously over Maggie and forced a liquid through her clenched teeth. "The medicine will soothe her presently," he said, in a comforting voice, turning to Mrs. Brinkley.

"Permelia," whispered the Squire to his wife, "hain't Magdalen better take a leetle rest? Consider Jane Maria has come to help. Magdalen looks dreadful white and shaky."

I found Jane Maria in tears in the long sitting-room. She came hastily toward me and grasped my hand.

I whispered that she was wanted in the sick room.

She looked thankful that there was something for her to do. "Poor Cousin Maggie," Miss Magdalen!" She broke down then, and just touching my cold cheek with her quivering lips hurried away.

I did not see Maggie again for days. Two weeks passed, three. A change, but not an improvement, was all the information I could gain. No one was allowed access to the house. Jane Maria was not visible even at the well or at a window. Miss Scudder canvassed the matter until the sight of her grew intolerable.

The first week in August came. One morning I waylaid Dr. Bullson, as he came over the fields from the Brinkleys, and pleaded hard that he would give me some definite information respecting Maggie.

"We hope she will be better soon," was all he would say at first.

I urged the matter passionately. He wavered. Breathlessly I waited for him to speak, but he did not. Silently he turned with me and retraced his steps to Squire Brinkley's house. We entered by the front door noiselessly. He stood for a moment, running his eye over the garden.

"Can you call Miss Magdalen, any little thing—a flower even, or a branch of leaves, which was a favorite with Maggie," he asked, musingly.

I drew from my belt a freshly-picked bunch of wild flowers, holding them up without speaking.

"Yes, yes! will you take them up to Jane her room, she is alone and quiet now, give them to her and call her by her name in a quiet, natural tone of voice."

My blood seemed turning to ice, a thousand fears took hold of me.

Dr. Bullson laid his strong hand upon my shoulder.

"That letter containing the news of Henderson Reese's decease was too great a shock for her brain. She lost her reason. It is not a hopeless case by any means. Her mind will be restored to her as suddenly as she was bereft of it. If you will be strong and cool during the interview, which I will allow you now, you may prove of great assistance."

"I am cool," I whispered.

He led the way quietly.

A soft, dim light shone on our ears. I shuddered, for the sound came from Maggie's chamber.

Dr. Bullson scanned my face gravely.

"Go," he said, pointing with his finger at the door. "You will be brave and calm. I can quite trust you, Miss Magdalen. I read your mother's spirit in your eyes."

I went.

Maggie was crouched in one corner of the little bedroom. As I closed the door she raised her head with the quick motion of a bird and stared fixedly at me. A flush of pleasure stole over me as I met that dull, unmeaning gaze.

I picked these pretty purple blooms in the June. "It's words, Maggie. I laid them on myself."

Slowly she raised herself to her full height, and, without removing her vacant eyes from my face, came creeping toward me. Down on my knees I sank, lips apart. One step more and I could feel her hot breath upon my cheek.

Thank God! I was not recoil from her. I threw one arm lightly around her slight form, and called her Maggie, dear Maggie.

Under the blue lavender-under the green boughs where the green leaves throw their shadows," she said, looking at me piteously.

I nuzzled my head with my hand and drew her head gradually to my bosom. It rested there quietly. I watched the heavy lids droop slowly over the dull blue eyes, and myself to bear her weight, which pressed heavier and heavier.

Scarcely daring to breathe for fear of awakening her I took her up cautiously in my arms and laid her down upon her bed.

Mrs. Brinkley's mock eyes overflowed, and her thin, sallow cheek flushed gratefully, when I went to find her, and told her that Maggie was sleeping as sweetly as a babe. She took both of my hands and pressed them, but could not speak.

Dr. Bullson had been waiting for me. Mrs. Brinkley went to her daughter's room.

"You will let Magdalen see my daughter every day?" she pleaded, in a choked voice.

Once more he came forward, and pressed my hands before going to watch beside her child's bed.

Dr. Bullson brought me the news that Maggie's mind was now as one drinks some, and then I told him all that transpired in Maggie's chamber.

When I called faintly, Maggie looked at me. "You need some rest yourself, Miss Magdalen. Go home now. To-morrow you may come again."

"And Maggie?" I faltered.

"If this sleep should prove a long, unbroken one, all may go well."

We stood shutting up the house for the night—Auntie and I—when a breathless lad darted along the peach orchard, whistling sharply to attract our attention.

"Miss Bold! Miss Bold! be that you, Miss Magdalen?" He sprang impatiently upon the piazza.

"Maggie I thought I should be too late," he panted, "so I made a short cut of it through the brook meadow, and up your orchard."

"Golly! such a run though! I set every thing squawking and hollering. Here's a scrap of paper Miss Jane Maria gin me to gin you, Miss Magdalen. It's a note to Miss Ally, ain't it? Short cut sticks now, 'cause I'm late in doing up the chores round the barn-yard."

"A note from Jane Maria this time of the night!" jerked out Aunt Elvira, contemptuously. "Some of her hoarding-school airs, I'll warrant."

"Somebody has arrived. Is in this very house. Oh, Magdalen, do come quickly!" it ran.

"Auntie," I began. A numbness was creeping over my heart—words failed me.

"Well," she dryly responded.

Mechanically I stretched out the note to her. She would not touch it, but glanced it over as I held it.

"Just as I thought," she exclaimed, with warmth. "Some of that Boston-bred timidity. A poor, wayfaring man wants, I suppose, a mouthful of something to eat, and a corner in the barn to lay his head in for the night. Squire Brinkley and Permelia are asleep, maybe. The saints know they need a little rest after such constant tending of their daughter; and that silly girl, instead of putting before the man a platter of broken victuals, and showing him a place in the barn where he can sleep, must needs bounce upon you in this hideous style. How sensible folks, like Squire Brinkley and his wife, can rear such fool of a girl round their house is more than I can understand. Don't dawdle, Magdalen. Shut the blinds."

I did as soon as enough. I had needed something to rouse me, and drive off the dead numbness at my heart. Nothing could have done it so effectually as one of Aunt Elvira's domestic things. Whether directed at myself or somebody else it mattered little; the effect was the same.

Jane Maria met me at the well, in her cousin's yard.

"I saw you coming down the road, and came out to meet you, for fear you would be dripping back-et, and forced upon me a cup of cold water.

"Magdalen! Magdalen! can you guess?" she exclaimed, in a low, tremulous whisper, as I drank the water. Her very lips were white. She clasped her hands excitedly.

I was not prepared to give the particulars of Mr. Reese's death, I answered.

"My God!" she exclaimed; "then you don't know that Henderson Reese lives—is in our house this very minute."

She made a hasty step forward, and then her arms almost fell to her side. "And I was so full for you suddenly," she muttered. "I have killed her!"

But I put her away from me with sudden strength. My eyes devoured her face. "Go on," I articulated; "tell me more."

"Yes, yes, I will; only don't look at me in that way, Magdalen, I shall die pleaded. "I was the only one up in the house when he came, excepting little Dickey, who was late in doing up his outdoor work. I was in the Brunz back, and I was fearful he would awaken Maggie, who has slept easily since you were here this morning. I went out to still the noise, and him jumping about a gentleman, as though he was at his wit's end for joy. When I came nearer, I screamed louder at what then I thought to be a ghost, for I thought it was Henderson Reese's ghost. He was standing there, right under those blue boughs; but do, Magdalen, come in and see for yourself—makes me creep all over to see it shining on your white face."

"And he lives! he lives!" I said, grasping at her arm.

"Yes, Magdalen; now please don't stare at me so. You see he was at a boarding-house, and was taken down with cholera. Mrs. Cook, the landlady, called a doctor at once. He pronounced it cholera. The rest of the boarders got into a panic and left the house. Reese's room-mate, a Mr. Lucan, was away from the city at the time, but he came back next day, when the Irish girl told him at the door that Reese had come in, his own things had been sent away from the house, for Mr. Reese was dead and buried with the cholera, and only Mrs. Cook and Biddy to the house. This Mr. Lucan had seen Maggie's picture. Mr. Reese had shown it to him one night, and he knew the name of the village where she resided, and it was he who had penned those hasty lines about Mr. Reese's death. It turned out that it was only cholera after all, but typhoid fever set in in its worst form. Mrs. Cook nursed him as though he were her own flesh and blood. Mr. Lucan still feeling toward him, although his sickness had broken up her house, and she a lone widow. She was in market one morning, looking for a nurse for him, when she almost ran against Mr. Lucan. She stopped to tell him that Mr. Reese was better, and begged him to recommend one. In all traces of fever had not disappeared, and there could be no danger of infection. Mr. Lucan grew pale as a cloth, such sorrow-ful recognition of him it came out how the panic-stricken Irish girl had misinformed him, and what he had written to Miss Brinkley in consequence. It was a long, long time for him, when she almost ran against Mr. Lucan. She stopped to tell him that Mr. Reese was better, and begged him to recommend one. In all traces of fever had not disappeared, and there could be no danger of infection. Mr. Lucan grew pale as a cloth, such sorrow things. My manner toward her unconsciously softened. Before there had been a dearth of sympathy; now a bond existed.

The October winds blew with fitful eagerness. Maggie was regaining strength and elasticity of body. Her mind was perfectly clear. Mr. Reese had said he should not leave her yet; he would wait until November. They came to see me sometimes, and I went there too. Matters went on smoothly enough until one day.

I had been after a rare Eastern lily which Mrs. Brinkley had promised me.

"You like high colors, Magdalen," she said, tapping a pot which held a scarlet geranium. "I shall add this to the flight."

Mr. Reese stood listlessly by the window, watching the falling leaves, waiting for Maggie to ride with him. Maggie stood before the glass opposite me, putting on her hat. As Mrs. Brinkley spoke Henderson Reese turned from the window, and breaking off a full cluster of the rich scarlet blossoms, laid them against my cheek.

"You are so pale this autumn," he commented. "Am I?"

"I hope you are well," he continued in a grave voice.

"Perfectly, thank you." I turned away, for Maggie was all ready to go.

Mrs. Brinkley went to the window to see them drive off.

"Come into the orchard, Magdalen," the Squire called out to me, plenty of fruit there. I should like to send some to Miss Elvira. You must select it."

Dickey was filling up a basket. Suddenly he ceased whistling, and looked toward the road.

"What's ailed them hack?" he exclaimed.

I followed his glance.

Maggie beckoned to me from the low carriage.

"You must come with us," she said. "Yes, Magdalen, I insist. You must. Dickey can carry the fruit and flowers home for her, can't he, mamma?"

"Certainly, my love," said Mrs. Brinkley, smiling kindly at us from the doorway.

I was sorely puzzled by Maggie's manner. Still I hesitated, thinking home duties. Maggie made a gesture of entreaty. Her pretty lips had grown quite pale.

I sprang in.

"Let us drive to the Darlington grove," she said. Mr. Reese turned and looked at her. "You are in a strange mood this morning, Maggie," he said, smiling.

She averted her face, and sank back wearily in the carriage, not speaking again until we stopped under a fine growth of beeches.

She sprang out first, and walked swiftly over the brown crisp leaves.

Mr. Reese waited to fasten the horses. When he joined us, I could see that Maggie was obliged to lean against the tall trees for support. Her eyes still sent upon the misty hills miles away.

"What are you dreaming about darling?"

She started, and shrank, as though his words had hurt her. A bright color dyed her cheek, and vanished. A few eager steps brought her close to his side.

"I have never quite filled your heart," she began, rapidly—her eyelids steady, and her voice a flame. "I am sorry, but I did those blossoms against Magdalen's cheek, a little while ago, I read the truth. We are all wrong just now; Magdalen, you, and I. I love each other still—and—please God—I will not stand between you two."

"Hear me," she continued, as Mr. Reese would have interrupted.

"God God! I will not, Maggie," he broke out, vehemently, "never, never have I loved even Magdalen Reid as I do you at this moment!"

"At this moment," she repeated, softly, with a strange look of record upon her face.

Mr. Reese caught her convulsively to his breast. "God help me to become worthy of the love of this noble woman. Maggie—my treasure—dearer than life itself!"....

They were married in November. Mr. Reese would not be put off. He took her with him to Boston.

Aunt Elvira and I still live at the little cottage. Miss Sandie grew out that Doctor Rollston is to marry the meek little dressmaker over the way.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

The Secretary of the Treasury gives notice that subscriptions will be received for Coupon Treasury Notes, payable three years from Aug. 15th, 1864, with semi-annual interest at the rate of seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum—principal and interest both to be paid in lawful money.

These Notes will be convertible at the option of the holder at maturity, into six per cent. gold-bearing bonds, payable not less than five nor more than twenty years from their date, as the Government may elect. They will be issued in denominations of $50, $100, $500, $1000, and $5000, and all subscriptions must be for fifty dollars or some multiple of fifty dollars.

As the interest is computed from August 15, persons making deposits subsequent to that date must pay the interest accrued from date of note to date of deposit.

Parties depositing twenty-five thousand dollars and upward for them Notes at any one time will be allowed a commission of one quarter of one per cent.

Special Advantages of this Loan.

IT IS A NATIONAL SAVINGS BANK, offering a higher rate of interest than any other, and the best security. Any savings bank which pays its depositors in U. S. Notes considers that it is paying in the best circulating medium of the country, and it can not pay in any thing better, for its own assets are either in Government securities or in notes or bonds payable in Government paper.

Convertible into a Six per cent. 5-20 Gold Bond.

In addition to the very liberal interest on the notes for three years, this privilege of conversion is now worth about three per cent. per annum, for the current rate for 5-20 Bonds is at this time about nine per cent. premium, and before the war the premium on six per cent. U. S. stocks was over twenty per cent. It will be seen that the actual profit on this loan, at the present market rate, is not less than ten per cent. per annum.

Its Exemption from State or Municipal Taxation.

But aside from all the advantages we have enumerated, a special Act of Congress exempts all Bonds and Treasury Notes from local taxation. On the average, this exemption is worth about two per cent. per annum, according to the rate of taxation in various parts of the country.

It is believed that no securities offer so great inducements to lenders as those issued by the Government. In all other forms of indebtedness, the faith or ability of private parties, or stock companies, or separate communities, only, is pledged for payment, while the whole property of the country is held to secure the discharge of all the obligations of the United States.

SUBSCRIPTIONS will be received by the Treasurer of the United States, at Washington, by several Assistant Treasurers and designated Depositaries, and by all National Banks which are depositaries of public money, and ALL RESPECTABLE BANKERS AND BANKERS throughout the country will give further information and AFFORD EVERY FACILITY TO SUBSCRIBERS.

AN INTERESTING REPRINT.—MESSRS. J. E. TILTON & CO., will publish, in a few days, "Broken Lights," by Frances Ellen Burnham, with a preface by the gifted Theodore Parker, and as the writer of the Introduction to his Works published in England. A premature and elegant writer thus speaks of it:

"This work is in the nature of a review of the whole late religious movement, of which the "Essays and Reviews"—Bishop Colenso's book, and Theodore Parker's writings, and Jordan's Life of Jesus are portions. It is very interesting and very able. The writer does not distinctly state her own position; but it is pretty clear that she goes as far as any of the writers she comments on."

A SINGLE BOX

Brandreth's Pills

Contains more vegetable extractive matter than twenty boxes of any pills in the world besides: fifty-five hundred physicians use them in their practice to the exclusion of other purgatives. The first letter of their value is yet scarcely appreciated. When they are better known sudden death and continued sickness will be of the past. Let those who know them speak right out in their favor. It is a duty which still save life.

Our race are subject to a redundancy of vitiated bile at this season, and it is as dangerous as it is paw-lent; but Brandreth's Pills afford an invaluable and efficient protection. By their occasional use we prevent the collection of those impurities, which, if taken in sufficient quantities, cause so much danger to the body's health. They soon cure liver complaint, dyspepsia, loss of appetite, pain in the head, heart-burn, pain in the breast-bone, sudden faintness, and costiveness.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

A HYMN FOR THE NORTHERN PEOPLE.

SEPTEMBER 11, 1864.

GREAT God of Battles, lift we unto Thee
A people's voice in gratitude and praise,
Thou, who unsearchable in all Thy ways,
Ordainest victory.

To Thee we bow, lend unto us Thine ear,
Clothe us, O Lord! with thy protecting power,
And unto us in this our thankful hour,
Great God in Heaven, draw near!

Bend down upon us Thine all-seeing eyes,
Thou who in ages past Thy throne didst set
With myriad stars, and see our altars wet
With blood of sacrifice!

Reach unto us, O God! Thy bounteous hand,
Full of all blessings with the closing year,
And scatter like the good seed far and near,
Throughout our bleeding land!

Forgive our foes, restore to them their sight,
Who in blind wrath unsheathed the civil sword,
And in Thy boundless mercy, O good Lord!
Reveal to them the light!

Forgive our sins—so were we taught to pray—
Cleanse us from guilt; allay our many troubles;
Wipe from the people's eyes the scalding tears,
O turn our night to day!

Announce Thy coming, Lord! show us that sign
Seen in the prophet's vision long ago,
How long, O Lord! from out the press must flow
The nation's blood-red wine?

Give unto them, the rulers of our land,
A love of right, of justice, and of Right:
May they be upright in Thine own pure sight:
Give each a firm right hand!

Let War, and Pestilence, and Famine cease
From off the earth! O Great God! set in this world here,
Ere yet the Christmas chimes sound sweet and clear,
The voice of Christ say "Peace!"

THE SIMPLE ISSUE.

THE Presidential election turns upon a question as simple as it is momentous. Shall the American people relinquish the effort to maintain the authority of their Government, or shall they persist? That is the question, and it has but two sides. Whoever believes that the Union and Government should be unconditionally maintained will vote for LINCOLN and JOHNSON, all others will vote for M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON.

The Chicago Convention resolved "that after four years of failure to restore the Union by the experiment of war, * * * * justice, humanity, liberty and the public welfare demand that immediate efforts be made for a cessation of hostilities with a view to an ultimate Convention of all the States, or other peaceable means, to the end that at the earliest practicable moment peace may be restored on the basis of the Federal Union of the States." In other words, the slave-system having risen in insurrection against the American people, they are to confer themselves conquerors and to believe that justice, humanity, and liberty require that slavery should have increased existence. That is the platform of GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN.

The Baltimore Convention resolved "that it is the highest duty of every American citizen to maintain against all their enemies the integrity of the Union and the paramount authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States; and that, laying aside all differences and political opinions, we pledge ourselves as Union men, animated by a common sentiment and aiming at a common object, to do every thing in our power to aid the Government in quelling by force of arms the rebellion now raging against its authority, and in bringing to the punishment due to their crimes the rebels and traitors arrayed against it." In other words, the American people have not failed, and do not intend to fail, in the conflict with the insurrection of Slavery. Justice, humanity, and liberty require not that it shall be strengthened, but that it shall be destroyed by every constitutional means. That is the platform of ABRAHAM LINCOLN. Which has the true ring? Which speaks the resolution of a great and brave people, and which the base submission of a cowed and craven nation? Which is the spirit of BANCROFT and SAMPSON, of PERRY and DECATUR, of Gettysburg and Vicksburg, of the Weldon Railroad, Mobile, and Atlanta, of GRANT, FARRAGUT, and SHERMAN; and which that of BENEDICT ARNOLD, whose treacherous heart told the same people in 1780, after four years of war, that their Government was a tyranny that defied the land with blood, and that he, BENEDICT ARNOLD, wished to lead Americans to peace?

GENERAL SHERMAN.

THE victory at Atlanta crowns one of the most daring and extraordinary military campaigns in history. "Since the 1st of May," quietly says General SHERMAN on the 3d of September, "we have been in one constant battle or skirmish, and need rest." A glance at the map shows what these words mean. It shows the points from which he moved and that which he has gained; the first was long considered impregnable, and became ours a year ago: the second was held by the rebels as scarcely less precious than Richmond, and is now lost to them. But these great results have been attained only by great sagacity, the most incessant labor, and invincible bravery. The steady advance by direct assault and masterly flanking of unassailable points; the protection of an enormous line of communications; the safe crossing of rapid rivers; the pushing on energy to his fortified bags; the repulse of all his fierce assaults, and the final severing of his army, with his defeat and flight with an army that can not but be terribly demoralized—all prove that when we have at last learned to make war, and that at the West, as in the East, we have "a great captain."

It was mainly to General SHERMAN, said General GRANT in his report of the battle at Shiloh, that I owe the victory. At Vicksburg he was the right hand of the Lieutenant-General; and at Atlanta he fulfills the highest expectation of his senior and the gladdest hopes of his country. The fall of Atlanta is a confirmation, in thunder-tones, of the noble words written in January, 1861, to the Governor of Louisiana, when he was Superintendent of the State Military Academy, and began to see the inherent infirmity of the Union and war were at hand. That letter, recently republished, has the clear ring of its late dispatches. General SHERMAN knew that war was coming. He knew that secession would be war, and that the war would be vast and terrible. With the prescience of genius he said when in command in Kentucky, "We need not be panicked thousand men;" and the Secretary of War at that time thought him crazy, and relieved him of his command out of regard to his disordered wits.

But surely we may rejoice that we have emerged from the dark days of doubt and inefficiency. Surely we may offer thanksgiving that the great armies of the American Union are now commanded by leaders who are not only the most skilful, daring, rapid, tenacious of soldiers—whom neither hot nor cold guns appall—but also men who are devoted in every fibre of their frames and drop of their blood to the faith that the experiment of war to restore the Union is not a failure, and that no other effort for an immediate cessation of hostilities should be made by the loyal American people except renewed and overwhelming vigor in the war to confirm the absolute supremacy of the Government.

THE EFFECT OF THE NEWS FROM SHERMAN.

THERE is not a man who did not feel that M'CLELLAN's chances were diminished by the glad tidings from Atlanta; nor any one who does not know that if SHERMAN had been defeated, the friends of the Chicago candidate would have felt surer of his success. When people acknowledge that if SHERMAN had been nominated General M'CLELLAN did at Chicago, that "the experiment of war" to maintain the Government and restore the Union is a "failure," how can they be glad of the news of victory and vital victory which belies their theory? No unconditional Union man could have asked a more significant commentary upon the true character of the Chicago movement. For suppose the great M'CLELLAN nutification meeting had taken place upon the Saturday the news of SHERMAN's glorious victory was received, like a soaking storm it would have fallen upon an assembly whose cardinal principle is a "denial that triumphant success can be made the cessation of hostilities!" SHERMAN has done more, in his capture of Atlanta, for a cessation of hostilities than VALLANDIGHAM and his Convention could do in twenty months of abuse of the Administration and of the war.

If the American people were craven; if they were so utterly humiliated and prostrated that they could hear of the success of our soldiers only with abject regret; if they were really willing to surrender the victory of their Government and laws at last for the wretched mockery of a cessation of hostilities!" SHERMAN has done more, in his capture of Atlanta, for a cessation of hostilities than VALLANDIGHAM and his Convention could do in twenty months of abuse of the Administration and of the war.

"CONSERVATIVE" ARGUMENTS

THE "Conservative" campaign has opened in a perfectly characteristic manner. At the meeting of exultation in the Park, on the evening that the news was received, one of the orators of the party who are so anxious that the laws shall be respected and personal rights secured, urged his "Conservative" friends

"... to form 'White-boy' clubs in every ward, and protect the freedom of the ballot. If there should be opposition to the freedom of election, he hoped they would call all who opposed them from pen the right of the poor man, and he was elected GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN, he would hold the white man above ABE LINCOLN and his nigger."

* * * * *

"Once a poor man could walk the streets free and speak his mind, but under the rule of that ignoramus, ABE LINCOLN, he was afraid to speak, gentlemen, that you are the Government, and not that scoundrel at Washington.

* * * * *

"Will you desert the brave of South Manhattan, whom ABE LINCOLN has sought to degrade, that he might make you and I lower than his niggers? (Cries no, no.) No. God tells you that you have your honest face tell me you won't. When you meet your Abolition friends in the street don't look upon them with scornful eye, as old ANE and his crew have done (for I hold old ANE to-day to be a bigger coward than even JEFF DAVIS.)"

Of course where such things are openly said in public meetings it is evident that free speech has been totally abolished; as when an Iowa paper calls the draft "a bloody monster," it is clear that a free press has ceased to exist.

These "Conservative" speeches in favor of the election of General M'CLELLAN have been promptly endorsed by the "Conservative" papers, one of which says:

"We will strip from ABRAHAM LINCOLN the false garb of humanity in which he has long clothed himself, and show up, among other things, the infamy—yes, that's the word, infamy—of the WHITE HOUSE. If necessity requires, we will add Lincoln's photographs, in this city and elsewhere, to attest the truth of what we say. We have no fears to meet with publishers or booksellers on account of ABE LINCOLN'S advent, but fostered there, because of the disgrace it would bring upon so many innocent persons."

Here is that freedom from personality and decorous discussion of principles which are always sure to be found in the mouths and on the pens of the "Conservative" party, and this is the most obvious and natural course of those who wish to go on their knees to rebels and ask upon what terms they will allow this Government to be carried on. "Conservatism" naturally calls JEFFERSON DAVIS "President DAVIS," and the President of the United States a scoundrel, traitor, and ignoramus, because it hates the cause represented by one and loves that of the other. Are not these "Conservative" arguments and appeals such as every unhearted American citizen sees to be most welcome to every enemy of the Union and the Union party? Are they not those which only resource is an appeal to the basest passions of the most ignorant and brutal men, very likely to save the dignity and honor of this nation?

DOUBTS REMOVED.

IF any one had been in doubt of the real significance of the policy which General M'CLELLAN represents in this canvass, he was relieved by reading the New York Daily News on the day after the nomination. That paper is the Northern organ of the rebellion, whose policy on the North is "peace." A "peace man" is well understood to be a friend of the "Confederacy," and the "peace" organ says: "We accept the platform adopted by the Convention as a great triumph for the peace party.... The nominees of the Chicago Convention stand committed to a course that is undisguisedly and unequivocally traced in accordance with the popular sentiment of opposition to the war." The News will support General M'CLELLAN because he stands upon a "peace" platform, and by the side of GEORGE H. PENDLETON, who is the man of all men whom the News would have nominated, because he is "a consistent champion" of the "peace" sentiment.

Does any man, however friendly he may have been in his judgment of General M'CLELLAN, believe that the New York Daily News has at heart the true honor and dignity or the permanent, because just, peace of the country? Can such a man forget that Mr. VALLANDIGHAM moved to make M'CLELLAN a nominal unanimous? General M'CLELLAN was nominated by a peace convention, and though he were the most resolute member in the country, if he were elected he could not escape the influence of the party which elects him. No voter who wishes the war vigorously prosecuted until the rebels are to be beaten will vote for General M'CLELLAN, because he knows that he is the candidate of those who wish to stop and ask the rebels what they will do. Every person who is for war in the land will vote for M'CLELLAN, and his election would be a sign of the popular will that immediate efforts be made for a cessation of hostilities.

That is the policy which he can not escape, should he be elected; and no one who does not favor that policy can honestly vote for him.

ON A LATE LOUD NOISE

THE loud buzz and hum and clatter of the Chicago Convention, and of the M'CLELLAN ratification meetings, might induce a heedless observer to believe that they truly represented the opinion of the American people. But that was all supposed we had been deprived of our liberties without knowing it, and had yielded to a tyrannical despotism which we believed that we were maintaining our own lawful Government. Such a chatter about despotism and despots might make an observer imagine that the universal desire of the country is to put down a great conspiracy is striving to overthrow the Government, but that the Government has the unbalancing effrontery not to yield to its assailants. The noise of the politicians at Chicago, contrasted with the settled patriotism of the American people, recalls the famous figure of BURKE: "Because half a dozen grasshoppers under a fern make the field ring with their importunate chirk, while thousands of great cattle, reposed beneath the shadow of the British oak, chew the cud and are silent, it is not to be imagined that these who make the noise are the only inhabitants of the field; that, of course, they are many in number; or that, even if they are more than the little, shrivelled, meagre, hopping, though loud and troublesome insects of the hour."

AN EVIDENT TRUTH.

THE Copperheads, who insist that this war is a war waged by the President for the sake of emancipation, now assert that he is pledged to continue it for that purpose even after the submission of the rebels. But when the rebels have submitted against whom can war be carried on? It is useless to speculate, to affirm or deny that the President will or will not continue the war after the rebel submission—simply because he can not.

The war is prosecuted for the maintenance of the Union and Government. When the rebels, by yielding, submit to the Constitution and all laws and executive acts in accordance with it. Whether the emancipation proclamation so accords is a question which the President has himself left for the Supreme Court.

It is impossible honestly to mistake the President's position upon the Slavery question. His letters to Mr. GREELEY and to Mr. HODGES, and his various messages and speeches express it as plainly as words can. "I am naturally anti-slavery," he writes to Mr. HODGES. "If slavery is not wrong, nothing is wrong. I can not remember when I did not so think and feel. And yet I have never understood that the Presidency conferred upon me an unrestricted right to act officially upon this judgment and feeling.

.....And I ever that to this day I have done no official act in mere deference to my abstract judgment and feeling on slavery."

So in the manifest—"To whom it may concern"—the President states what he understand to be the conditions upon which the permanent peace is possible. In that paper he takes the initiative, and says that whoever is authorized by a power which can control the rebel armies to make a proposition embracing the integrity of the Union and the abandonment of slavery will be heard. There is no bar in this, no limit. He does not say that no other proposition upon the same authority will be heard. But to end all moaning diplomacy and intrigue he frankly states the terms upon which, in his estimation, the American people can have peace.

But peace is always at the discretion of the rebels. When they lay down their arms and return to obedience to the laws the rebellion ends. Or course the Government must decide when fit to call that the rebels have laid down their arms, and it will take good care not to be betrayed by any false pretenses. But it can not fight without an enemy. And when the rebels leave the constitutionality of the executive acts where the President leaves it, to the Supreme Court, there will be peace, which will be long or short as the Court sustains or annuls the Proclamation.

But the purpose of the rebel leaders is much more earnest than Copperhead doctors believe; and they will yield when they are conquered, not before.

A SLANDER EXPOSED.

NEWSPAPERS have a bad habit of reporting what they wish to have believed as upon unquestionable authority, and it is often impossible to trace the most injurious and false statements made in this way. But General "BLIND" SMITH has lately effectually exposed this trick, and in a manner which is of the greatest service. One of the slakest and most hackneyed charges against the President is the assertion that he constantly interferes with military movements, and is the moving cause of all mishaps and disasters in the field. Even General GRANT'S campaign in the Wilderness was declared at that if he succeeded it would be on account of the President, but if he failed it would be because the President had meddled with his plans. When General BUTLER'S movements were apparently less vigorous than his friends desired, knowing all the intentions of the campaign, thought they ought to be, we were told that such were the consequences of the President's insisting upon retaining civilians in military commands.

In order to damage the Union cause a story of this kind was lately told, in which the name of General SMITH was used. The General immediately wrote a letter, in which he says:

"In your issue of the 24th is a statement from Washington which demands notice from me, especially as it is produced by the remark that it is given upon 'authority which may be regarded beyond contradiction.' The writer states that upon my return to the front I called upon General GRANT, paying my first duty, and then proceeds to say

"'Upon this General GRANT produced an order or letter of instruction from the President for the withdrawal of General BUTLER in full field command, from which he had been relieved by order of the Secretary of War, Mr. LINCOLN adding to General GRANT substantially as follows: Having retained General BUTLER in his former command as a favor before the Secretary of War left to order, you will oblige me, personally, by exerting yourself to avoid all cause of difference or irritation with Major-General BUTLER, at least until after next election.'

"I had two interview with General GRANT after my return, at which no one was present but ourselves. At these interviews no order or letter of instructions of any description from the President was produced by General GRANT, nor did he state or intimate that he had received such order."

The General proceeds to correct some other misrepresentations of his conduct and that of General GRANT at the same interview.

This unqualified contradiction of an incessant slander disposes of all the brood.

A VISIT TO THE PRESIDENT.

THE Grant County Herald, a Wisconsin paper, contains the following letter from Judge JOHN J. MILLER, giving an account of a recent interview with President LINCOLN, of the Soldiers' Retreat near Washington:

"WM. ELE-GORMAN RANDALL and Judge MILLER" entered a neat, pleasant room, and found Mr. LINCOLN alone in the centre. Directly opposed from an adjoining apartment a tall, stout-built, fine-looking man, apparently forty-ward, his gait astride, rapid, and strolling, ample modern-standing over with whiskers, and Brierian arms, with a face radiant with intelligence and manliness.

"The Governor addressed him: 'Mr. President, this is my friend and partner, Judge MILLER, from Wisconsin.'

"'I am glad to see my friends from Wisconsin; they were the banner State in the Union.'

"'I could not leave the city, Mr. President, without hearing words of truth and wisdom from you. Upon you, as the representative of the loyal people, depends, in a great degree, the existence of our Government and the future of America.' [Profound attention by political sages.

"'Mr. President,' said Governor RANDALL, 'why can't you vote everybody a pay bounty for a furlough? It would reinvigorate you.'

"'Ah,' said President, 'two or three weeks would do us no good. I can not fly from my thoughts—my anxieties in the great country fellows me wherever I go. I don't talk it is painful to my feelings to talk. Then, I am not free from interruption, but I can not but feel that the cares of one of this great nation will be relieved in November. There is no programme offered by any wing of the Democratic party but that must result in the permanent destruction of the Union.'

"But, Mr. President,' said General MCCLELLAN is in favor of crushing the rebellion by force. He will be the Democratic candidate.'

"'Sir,' said the President, 'the slightest knowledge of arithmetic will prove to any man that the rebel armies can not be destroyed with Democratic strategy. It would sacrifice all the white men of the North to do it. There are now in the service of the United States near two hundred thousand able-bodied colored men, most of them under arms defending and acquiring Union territory. The Democratic strategy demands that these forces be disbanded, and that the musters be conciliated by restoring them to slavery. Then, the white men who now are prisoners to escape, are to be converted into our enemies to fill the vain hope of pleasing the guerrilla-cuff of their masters. We shall have to fight two nations instead of one.

"'You can not conciliate the South if you guarantee to them ultimate success: and the experience of the present war proves their success is inevitable if you fling the conquering hero of millions of black men into their side of the scale. Will you give our enemies such military advantages as finance armies, and then depend on ceasing, flattery, and concession to get them back into the Union? Abandon all the posts now garrisoned by black men; take 200,000 men from our side and put them in the battle-field or com-field against us, and we would be compelled to abandon the war in three weeks.

"'We have to hold territory in indemnt and sickly places; where are the Democrats to do this? It was a free fight, and the field must be won. The arguments put down this rebellion by fighting against both master and slave fight down the rebellion before victory is possible.

"'There have been men base enough to propose to me to arrange matters on the basis of Jeff Davis and Alex Stinkes, and thus win the respect of the masters they fought. Should I do so I should deserve to be damned in this and eternity. I am not capable of such a act. I suffer with friend and foe. My enemies pretend I am now carrying on this war for party purposes. I expect to be as long as I am President it shall be carried on for the sole purpose of restoration. My duty forbids me not to attempt to the restoration of the Union. I will abide the issue.'

"I saw that the President was a severe joker, but a man of deep convictions, of abiding faith in justice, truth, and Providence. He was a statesman, not a politician, not an ontologist. As he warmed with his theme his mind grew to the magnitude of his body. I felt I was in the presence of the great statesman of the age, and that these huge Athanasian shoulders were fit to bear the weight of mightiest measures. He was honest, honest, republican simplicity, his guiding sympathy for those who should hold their own labor as the most sacred inheritance of self in his concern for its welfare, could not but inspire me with confidence that he was Heaven's instrument to conduct his people through this sea of blood to a Canaan of peace and freedom.

J. T. MILLER."

"PEACE MEN."

WHY do you fret, O cowardly North!
When we are your masters still?
We'll count the votes that you are long
On the summit of Bunker Hill."
For three long years have we met the foe—
We drive them before us still;
Yet they do claim slaves up in the North,
Though not upon Bunker Hill.

We've talked of the black men trodden down
Death in the hot fields of cane,
But oh! (shame on the dastard race!)
Those Northern slaves are white.

Our Southern brothers have the like
The lash and the chain controls,
But these white men are master's heels,
And freely offer their souls.

You may seek on the battle-field in vain
For these white slaves of the South—
They dare not follow our brave boys there
No more to be enslaved—
They dare not share in such noble toil,
Though not upon Bunker Hill.
So they cower themselves with the Quaker garb,
And lastily cry for peace.

When the roll of honor that Fame prepares
Is held in the great world's gaze,
And men shall read the glorious deeds
Of the heroes of these great days,
We shall see the cowards of Freedom's host
As the pages we unfold,
Traced with the lasting pen of truth
In letters of infamy.

And Fame has another book in press
For the world to read some day,
Of those who their country's cause forsook,
And fled from their duty away.
Of those who would aid a traitorous crew
To deluge the land with gore—
They sought the dark cave of infamy's foes,
And peace shall be theirs no more!

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

SHERIDAN'S MOVEMENTS.

THE interest in the military movements now centres upon General Sheridan. His army has an important mission to accomplish, and the Government expects him to conflict with Early's army. The rebels are aware of this, and it is for this reason that a strong Confederate force is still kept in the valley. It was thought a few days ago that Early had withdrawn from Richmond. Both Sheridan's advance develope the enemy in full force north of Winchester. On Saturday, September 3, Crook's command, together with the Nineteenth and Sixth Corps advanced to Berryville. The engagement of cavalry which occurred between the Twenty-third and Thirty-sixth Ohio, on the right, was severe and bloody. The latter were repulsed.

THE CAPTURE OF ATLANTA.

A dispatch was received, September 4, by the War Department from General Sherman, dated September 2, announcing the capture of Atlanta. The rebels evacuated the army from Atlanta during the last week of August, and transferred it to the south side of the West Point road, from which an advance was made upon the Macon Road in the afternoon of September 1. The rebels in force on the road near Jonesborough on the right; another under Schofield, Thomas, and McPherson, in the centre, and Blair, on the third column, under Thomas, pushed up to the road at Jonesboro by the centre. A part of the rebel force entered Jonesborough was thus cut off from the main force at Atlanta. The General-in-chief commanded that, who had intrenched himself on the road north of Jonesborough, but was compelled to evacuate. The rebels advanced upon the road, and destroyed it between Jonesborough and Rough and Ready; and on the 1st of September Jefferson C. Davis, commanding the Fourteenth Corps, attacked and carried the rebel works at Jonesborough, capturing 10 guns and 1000 prisoners. The defeated rebels moved south to Lovejoy's Station, and Sherman, on the 2d, occupied Atlanta. After up the magazines at Atlanta, and evacuated that important position last night. Our troops are now engaged in pursuing General Slocum, commanding the Twentieth Corps, having been sent to capture his last train of about 1200, and says, "We have possession of over 500 rebel dead, 200 wounded, and over 1000 well."

A later dispatch from General Sherman states that the enemy destroyed seven locomotives and eighty-one cars loaded with ammunition, small-arms and stores, and left fourteen pieces of artillery, most of them unspiked, and a large number of small-arms. A large number of deserters were coming into our lines.

The defeat of McCook and the capture of Stoneman completely destroyed General Sherman's cavalry force, and taking advantage of this weakness, Wheeler, Forrest, and Morgan appear to have formed a junction for the purpose of destroying the railroad between Chattanooga and Nashville. Hitherto General Sherman has found it unlikely to take care of these raiders, who will only be able to effect a temporary injury.

DEFEAT AND DEATH OF JOHN MORGAN.

General Gillem, commanding a body of Union troops in East Tennessee, has achieved another victory over John Morgan and his guerillas on the 6th inst. Morgan's force at Greenville was surprised, Morgan was killed, his staff and one piece of artillery captured, and his force dispersed, with a loss of between 10 and 12 men.

CAPTURE OF FORT MORGAN.

FORT MORGAN surrendered August 23 with a garrison of six hundred men, seventeen guns, Flags and two Colors. Sixty guns were taken, but these had been spiked by the rebels, although not rendered useless. Sewage arranged their vessels and batteries so as to invest the fort on three sides, leaving open only a railway by the entire that it was impossible for the enemy to work his guns. The bombardment commenced on the morning of the 22d and continued all day. In the evening a shell exploded in the magazine and set on fire. The next day at 2 P.M. the fort surrendered.

DEMOCRATIC NOMINATIONS.

On Wednesday, August 31, the Chicago Convention nominated General GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN as the Democratic candidate for President, and the Hon. George H. Pendleton for Vice-President. In the first ballot 202½ votes, Guthrie stood ahead of Pendleton on the first ballot, receiving 65 votes, and Pendleton received 54. On the second ballot all the other candidates were withdrawn, and Pendleton received 174 votes, and on the third unanimous was made unanimous. The Convention received itself into a permanent body, and General Seymour was appointed chairman of the Committee to tender the nomination to General McClellan.

THE DRAFT IN NEW YORK CITY.

THE War Department has credited New York city with 18,449 men under the call of the 18th April, 1861, to February 24, 1864. There was a surplus over the last draft of 1,127. Jersey City, together with the town of Hoboken and 1616 recruits enlisted under the last call, making 2,743. The quota assigned to the 4th is 2,134, leaving a balance in favor of the Government of 1114 men. There will therefore be no draft in this city.

CAPTURE OF THE "GEORGIA."

By a telegram dated London, August 25, we learn that the United States Steamer Georgia had captured the rebel privateer Georgia twenty miles off Lisbon. At the time of her capture she was under the British flag.

THE VERMONT ELECTION.

VERMONT, in her election on the 6th inst., carried the Union ticket by a largely-increased majority as compared with that of 1863.

FOREIGN NEWS.

EUROPE.

THE Spanish Government has issued more stringent regulations in regard to vessels entering within the jurisdictional waters of Cuba and Porto Rico. These vessels are now required to hoist their flags. Her Catholic Majesty's Minister to the Netherlands has left the Queen, in bringing the preceding dispositions to the knowledge of our Government, has declared that the Cabinet at Washington will find in the measures adopted a fresh proof of the sincere friendship which the Queen entertains for the American nation.

The chief topic of interest in England is the British fete. The ceremony of laying a corner-stone for a monument of Cobden, in Dublin, has excited the indignation of the Belfast Orangemen, who have broken out in the most outrageous manner against the Catholics. The riot commenced in burning O'Connell in effigy, and proceeded immediately to open violence and bloodshed, and became so powerful at length that it required a military force to put it down.

The Evening Star of Berlin discusses in a very elated tone the Danish-German war. It considers Germany to be between Prussia and Austria. It exclaims: "No more Olmütz, no more of Austrian influence in Germany and Austrian flags shall float side by side. The silliness of the Western Powers in trying to keep Denmark in the power and public right of Europe, has become so silent and mute that one might say that the diplomatic relations of Europe are completely routed. It is not at London or at Paris, but at Vienna and at Berlin, that the destinies of Europe are now decided."

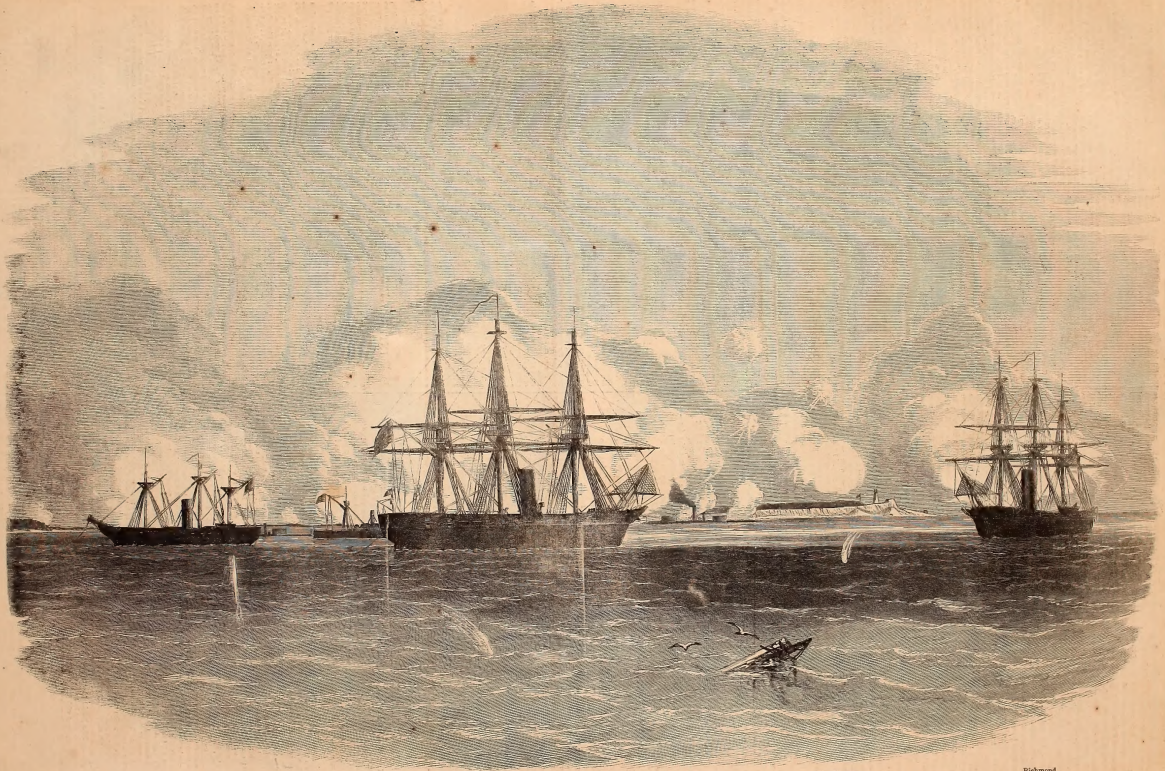
INTERESTING ITEMS.

AN instance of the danger of too hasty interments lately occurred at Vienna. The lady's niece, in the establishment of the Brothers of Charity in that capital, the bell of the dead-room of which is fitted with a chain from which the attendants proceeding to the place to ascertain the cause he was engaged in the case of the vigorous ringing. men pulling the bell-rope. He was removed immediately to the hall of the dead, and is now perfectly well.

DR. ——'s friends had long been desirous to engage him to sit to Sir Joshua Reynolds for his picture, but he could never be induced to do so, but declared that it should be done at the expense of others, and thinking the idea a joke he left it to them. The gentlemen of the party indeed to comply, chiefly to oblige those, the expense of which was to be defrayed by them. Every one, and was very anxious to be permitted to make an engraving from the picture when finished. The present picture is a bad sitter, and had not been able to satisfy himself with his likeness, and therefore declined to sit. Sometime after he vanced, Hoarse fell into a train of thought in the attitude in which he is represented in the picture, and when he awoke, without saying a word, turned the canvas upside down, and began to work at the other side, which was free of the former figure, and so proceeded to lay on over the former picture, the head of which, when next opened to the walls of the Council Chamber of the Royal College of Surgeons.

The practice of eating at night by candle-light is one of the day is generally considered a very bad one. Nevertheless it is actually necessary in the present state of society. Habit exercises the greatest influence over us. A gentleman, who has been in the practice of taking food at a certain hour of the day or evening, while in good health, feel hungry at that hour. Indeed, it sometimes happens that when accustomed to dine at a certain hour, and that has been long accustomed, and infirmity has frequently been forced to abandon the habit of taking a meal, he will, quietly dinner, which, with most people, is the chief meal of the day.

The phrenological school, Fowler's disciples, are the most precise and positive in their opinions. They hold that mind is analogous to friendship, blue to love, as suggested by blue eyes and the azure sky. A bunch of violets would, therefore, tell a lady's sweetheart that friendship is all he has a right to expect. Yellow is paternity or maternity; it is the yellow ray of the spectrum which causes the germ to shoot. Red figures ambition; indigo, the spirit of truth;



ADMIRAL FARRAGUT'S FLEET BOMBARDING FORT MORGAN, AUGUST 22, 1864.—[SEE PAGE 598.]

REAR-ADMIRAL FARRAGUT.

We publish on this page a portrait of Rear-Admiral DAVID G. FARRAGUT, the victor of New Orleans and Mobile. He was born in Knoxville, Tennessee, about 1803. A sailor from his ninth year, when he became a midshipman, under Commodore PORTER, on the Essex, he was present at the battle of Valparaiso. At thirteen he was placed in command of a prize-vessel; and at the close of the war of 1812 he was sent to school, and thence into the navy. He then married a Southern lady, and settled in Norfolk, Virginia. When the Expedition against New Orleans was resolved upon FARRAGUT was selected as its commander. He entered the Mississippi River, passing forts Philip and Jackson March 24, 1862, and the next day took possession of New Orleans. He took an important part in the reduction of Port Hudson, and his late achievements in Mobile Bay have made him the first naval hero of the age.

THE view of PETERSBURG given below is taken from the Richmond side of the Appomattox. The railway bridge across the Appomattox is seen toward the left, and a large factory beyond. The river is navigable only below the bridge, as there are rapids above. Petersburg is contemporary with Richmond, both cities having been laid out in 1733, and having continued to be rivals in commerce, until Richmond acquired a special importance by being made the capital of the State. The population of Petersburg was about 12,000 before the war. It had six churches, several large cotton and tobacco factories, and was a place of considerable trade, exporting flour, cotton, and tobacco. As early as 1645 a fort, called Fort Henry, was erected at the falls of the Appomattox, on the point where Petersburg now stands, for the defense of the neighborhood against the Nottoways and other Indian tribes. Soon after this, PETER JONES, one of the first settlers of Virginia, established there a trade with the Indians. The place where he fixed himself was precisely where the two principal streets now meet, and was in consequence called Peter's Point, but the name was afterward changed to Petersburg. Two suburbs have since been incorporated with the city, one called Pocahontas and another Blandford, at which latter place are the ruins of an old church, and which, being on high ground toward the southern side of the town, must now be much exposed to the Federal fire.

Petersburg was occupied at one time by the British troops in the Revolutionary War. Then approached by the same route now adopted by the Federal Generals—namely, by way of James River to City Point, where an army was landed, under General PHILLIPS, in 1781, and marched into the city. While General PHILLIPS lay ill of a bilious fever at Bolingbroke House, the Americans, under General LAFAYETTE, commanded the town from Archer's Hill, so that poor General PHILLIPS—of whom JEFFERSON said, "he is the proudest man of the proudest nation upon earth"—was conveyed to the cellar for safety, where he exclaimed, "Won't they let me die in peace?" However, not the cannon-ball but the fever terminated his existence, and he was buried in Blandford churchyard. One week later Lord CORNWALLIS entered the town from Wilmington, on the south, by the same line on which the Federals are now threatening the town; and his Lordship fixed his headquarters at Bolingbroke House.

BOMBARDMENT OF FORT MORGAN.

WE give on page 596 an illustration representing the commencement of the BOMBARDMENT OF FORT MORGAN by the army under GRANGER, and by FARRAGUT's fleet. The action commenced at daylight, August 22. The practice was excellent, almost every shell bursting in the fort. The Richmond, Brooklyn, Lackawanna, Octorara, and Monitors commenced the bombardment on the part of the navy, shortly after the three batteries opened. All the vessels except the Octorara and the Monitors lay off and used only their Parrott rifles. The action continued all day on the 22d. A conflagration raged in the fort all night, and at 2 P.M. on the 23d the fort surrendered. Next to Fortress Monroe Fort Morgan was considered the strongest work on the Southern coast.

GEN. GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN.

GEORGE BENTON M'CLELLAN, the Democratic candidate for President, whose portrait we give on pages 600 and 601, was born in Philadelphia December 3, 1826, and is now thirty-eight years of age. His father was an eminent physician and surgeon, and was professor in a medical institute of that city. Hardly had the infant been born before the distinguished surgeon announced the event to his pupils. Scales, it is said, were brought from the neighboring grocer to weigh the child. All the weights were placed in one dish and the baby in the other, but the child moved not. The doctor threw in his watch, keys, lancets, etc.; but GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN still overweighed them all. Heavier weights were added, but the string broke, leaving the opposite balance still unmoved.

At the age of fifteen he entered the University of Pennsylvania. Three years later he entered the Military Academy at West Point. From this institution he graduated with high honors in the summer of 1846; was assigned to duty with a company of engineers, and before the close of the year was ordered into actual service on the line of the Rio Grande. We were then at war with Mexico, and the battle of Monterey had just been fought when Lieutenant M'CLELLAN reached his post. In January, 1847, he was ordered to Tampico to help in the organization of SCOTT's army. On the staff of Joseph M'CLELLAN and BEAUREGARD, HEINTZELMAN and MAGRUDER, KEARNEY and PILLOW, SEDGWICK and RENO, REYNOLDS and LEROY JOHNSTON and JOSEPH HOOKER, GRANT and LEE fought side by side and for a common cause. Now these couples stand separated, meeting in the stern and bitter antagonism of civil war.

At the battle of Contreras M'CLELLAN was bevetted First Lieutenant of Engineers for gallant and meritorious conduct; for similar conduct at Molino del Rey he was offered the brevet of Captain, but declined it, and declared that it was not due to him; but he earned the distinction in the storming of Chapultepec.

In June, 1848, Captain M'CLELLAN was ordered to West Point, where he remained three years in command of a company of sappers and miners; then he was removed to Fort Delaware to superintend the construction of the works, and the next year he joined the expedition which was then organizing to explore the territory of the Red River under the command of Colonel MARCY, whose daughter M'CLELLAN afterward married. Promoted to a First Lieutenancy in the First Cavalry in 1855, M'CLELLAN, together with Major DELAFIELD and Major MONTHEAL, attended a committee appointed by JEFFERSON DAVIS, then Secretary of War, to proceed to Europe for the purpose of studying the war of the Crimea. In 1857, at the request of the Emperor, he published a report of the armies of Europe, and then resigned his commission in the army.

Having successively occupied the situations of Engineer and Vice-President of the Illinois Central Railroad, he was, in 1862, elected President of the Eastern division of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad, when he removed to Cincinnati. Shortly afterward civil war broke out, and GEORGE DENNISON, of Ohio, appointed M'CLELLAN a Major General of Volunteers to command the contingent of that State, consisting of thirteen regiments.

M'CLELLAN's subsequent military history is familiar to the country. His rapid and successful campaign in Western Virginia; his labors after the dispiriting reverse at Bull Run in the organization and discipline of a great and efficient army; his appointment to the chief command in November, 1861; his disastrous Peninsular campaign—which has elicited more discussion, political and military, than any other topic of the war; his high position from command, his restoration to the command after Pope's defeat, and his important victories at South Mountain and Antietam, where in six weeks afterward, his second deposition;—these successive events form General M'CLELLAN's military career, though many of them emphasized in a great deal of mystery, are before the people.

General M'CLELLAN's next appearance is as the candidate of the Democratic party for the Presidency. The platform of the party which nominated him is said to embody a peace-and-compromise platform. It declares explicitly in favor of an immediate armistice, which will restore to the rebels all which they have lost, and which will leave the question of States which it advocates results in Union or not it still declares for peace. It says distinctly: "The experiment of restoring the Union by war has proved a failure." M'CLELLAN's exposition of his own views in his West Point speech is just as explicit in the opposite direction. He says:

"To efface the insult offered to our flag, to secure ourselves from the fate of the divided Republics of Italy and South America, to preserve our Government from destruction, to enforce its just power and laws, to maintain our very existence as a nation, these were the causes which impelled us to draw the sword. Rebellion against a Government like ours, which contains the means of self-adjustment and of gentle remedy for evils, should never be confounded with a revolution against despotic power which refuses redress of wrongs. Such a rebellion can only be justified upon ethical grounds, and the only alternatives for our choice are its suppression or the destruction of our nationality. At such a time as this, and in such a struggle, political partisanship should be merged in a true and severe patriotism, which thinks only of the good of the whole country. It was in this cause and with these motives that so many of our comrades have given their lives, and to this we are all personally pledged in all honor and loyalty. Shall such devotion as that of the soldier dead be of no avail? Shall it be said in after-ages that we locked on the vigor of our youth and the flower of our age? Shall all these noble lives freely given we hesitated and failed to keep steadily in our sight the end for which they fell, to bleed, and give or lose, true hearts than this?"

Holding these views, it is not surprising that GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN has it in his power to-day, by a bold and Jacksonian announcement of them, and by a complete repudiation of the Chicago platform, to wield a larger influence in favor of the Union and of a lasting peace than is in the power of any other single man. But this position would, without much doubt, insure his succession to the Presidency is a minor matter; but it is of infinite consequence that the country should know that whether GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN or ABRAHAM LINCOLN be President of the United States there shall be no concessions made to armed rebellion, and there shall have laid down their arms and sued for peace.

GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN.

We give on pages 604 and 605 sketches illustrating General GRANT's campaign. The view of CAMPS BEYOND CHANCELLORSVILLE is located just above Dutch Gap at the bend of the river. This bend is commanded by the rebel batteries at the Howlett House, and it is to avoid these that FARRAGUT has been cutting a canal across FARRAR's island, around which the river bends. Admiral LEE has sunk obstructions at this point to prevent the approach of the rebel fleet down the river.

On the same page we give a sketch of GENERAL WARREN'S HEADQUARTERS at the Weldon Railroad, on the WELDON RAILROAD, August 27. The Fourth Wards made the attack on the Fifth Corps. Another sketch on page 605 gives a view of FORT HELL, on WARREN's old line before he transferred his corps to the Weldon Road line.

PICTURES.

I.

A silver thread among the hills,
Gleaming down the hollows;
A babbling brook among the fills,
In sunny recesses it rises:
A broad stream flowing through the plain,
In the land of the fruitful West:
A river rolling to the main,
Bearing navies on its breast:
And the great broad sea with its thousand shores.

An infant, with a tinkling toy,
In its mother's bosom fondled:
A chubby, bright-eyed, radiant boy,
On his father's knee dandled:
A youth in learning's eager chase,
While Truth's broad scroll's unfurl'd:
A man with anxious, careful face,
Bent 'neath the load of the world:
And Death's great sea with its silent shores.

BEN'S BEAVER.

A FRONTIER settler in the woods of Canada has need for a team of oxen, and he has none, poor lad. We had been five years on our Canadian farm, and we had "a frame house" as fairly fitted for two families as two flies. Four rooms above for each other, a two dwellings joining in a semi-detached villa. My eldest brother had the wife of his choice and two fine boys. We had three boys in corn, grass, fruit, and kitchen garden. This conquest of the woods made the two brothers next to the eldest very independent. They were both a wealthy couple. I remember when Walter, the eldest, now eighteen, said to my father, "Give John and me ten shillings each to buy oxen, and we will work a team for each of you. We will give you a receipt in full for our inheritance."

And we may well do so, if you have your health and can fetch your food from home for a while," said my mother.

The next week, that the two boys started, each with an axe and a knapsack, for a place called Hungry Hollow, which was fifteen miles further east of our home. The tract of land, comprising a fine waterfall, had been bought by a man named Burgess, and he intended to build a flour-mill on his own name; but he lisped and called himself Thuggs, and other folks called him what he called himself, and because he had a great many acres of a very lovely valley which is now a beautiful and prosperous village, long ago emancipated from forest trees, bears, bearers, blackened stumps, and its bad name.

On the mill-stream, where now stand the mills of my city victorious, Thuggs had built a sawpit and a box-trap. He was a baby beaver, or he might have known better than to intrude into the small room that became his prison when the door was open. The colony of beavers that had built near where the saw-mill now stands had been fastened out of their house, and all shot, by my brother, while they were trying to get in at their own doors. They were not worth the skins, for the rats would then brought a very high price. Not one was left alive except baby Brownie, who was given to Ben by reason of his youth and his tameness. He had went over to see the beavers' house, built of small trees, or saplings, which they cut down with their chisel-like front teeth, and floated into position in the water. The dam, as well formed as if man had built it, the warm dry rooms of the dwelling with their soft lining, the treasures of bark and hallowed roots for food in winter, all were wonderful to me. The boys had watched them at work for some days in the early summer mornings. Having shot them, they had seen them cut down saplings to repair damage purposely done to their dam. They had floated these to the place where they were wanted, and then, lifting the stick upon the fore-leg, as a man carries a burden on his arm, they had put it in its place, very much after the manner of a monkey. Many have said that the beaver carries burdens on his tail, and that he uses it as a trowel. My brothers were not able to verify these assertions. They were of opinion that though the tail may be used sometimes to beat the animal, like a fifth leg, or to hammer their work into place, yet that it is not used as a trowel or a raft. Perhaps the time they followed them was not long enough to see them.

I took notes of Brownie for a long time, and he soon grew to be a big beaver and very tame. He was one of the most powerful and affectionate pets in the world, and, though he ate bark and bulbous roots readily, his favorite food was bread and milk; if it was warm-milk it was a special and delightful treat.

One of our neighbors was remarkably fortunate in finding horses that had gone astray. On being asked for the secret of his sagacity and luck, he said: "I always leave myself a horse, and think of what I would want if I was one, and where I would go to get it." If I could fancy myself a beaver, I might hope to explain the habits and the doings of Benjy. He loved my brother so dearly, that Alice (my brother's wife) was almost jealous of him. It was impossible for them to separate or hide from him. On one occasion Ben left home to go to Plattsburg and Whitehall, on Lake Champlain. This lake is nearly one hundred miles long, and has many charming boat landings on both sides; being at its widest not above six miles across. The beaver was left at home, but when Ben got up to his room at the St. Alban's Hotel, he was met by Brownie, who showed no signs of fatigue, and indulged in the most extravagant expressions of joy. Ben rewarded his attention with a dish of bread and milk, of which he ate about one half, and then laid himself to sleep on his master's feet, and changed to his master's feet when my brother was in bed. In the morning Ben missed him, and the remaining portion of the bread and milk. "Brownie has gone home," said Ben to himself. That night he staid at Plattsburg, on the other side of the lake, and he retired to his room, after taking supper in the ordinary dining-room, there he found Brownie on his valise again. Again there was a hearty meeting, and an eager consumption of bread and milk and sweet-apples. This time there was none left for breakfast. Still Brownie disappeared early, and set out by Ben resolved that ball was he again visible. It is to be noted that in all the distance traveled by this beaver, from our home, three miles from Brooks and a small creek took him to St. Alban's, and after that he had the lake. The beaver is a poor traveler on land, and does better in the water by day. Much of the work of beaver colonies is done in the night. But Brownie followed his master by day, and made the same speed as the best walker, and always knew where land. The animal has powerful means of water locomotion in the hind feet; his tail he uses as a rudder.

Who or what told Brownie that Ben was to land at Whitehall I can not know, but there he was, ready to pay his respects to his master's pocket for the sake of a sweet-apple.

My sister Alice, some years after, when she married Ben to reform him of his passion for four-footed pets by furnishing substitutes; but he went on the principle of "the more the merrier," and kept dogs, cats, only he read babies and bevers instead of celestial beings. I remember Mrs. Ben's rueful expression of face as she saw the first baby. "Oh dear! Brownie is a nuisance. He has built a dam in the parlor, of the fire-irons and fender and a music-stool. He has made a beaver-house of them at the back of it with two ottomans, and lined them with the leaves of my last music-book. And then he spoke to me, dried to knock-apple, and I had to get up for his master's possession. But he is welcome to them now, for who would eat them after he has messed them over! Indeed, Ben, he is a nuisance."

"We are all nuisances sometimes," said Ben, "beavers, babies, and grown men and women."

"Ah! but Brownie can't speak for herself and Brownie, and not for me and the babies, Ben," said Alice, laughing.

"Look at him!" said my brother, as Brownie combed himself with the claws of his hind foot, chasing his tail and scratching as a cat or a dog. We all did look at him, and we all forgave his mischief, and admired his neatness, sagacity, and affection. All the world loves the pets and favorites when they serve or amuse sufficiently to pay their way.

The end of poor Brownie was tragic, and no settler in Canada has been more sincerely mourned. To this day a tender sadness fills my heart when I think of him. He was killed by a hunter for a wild beaver, when the hunter was on an excursion with my brother in the backwoods. He was shot, brought home to us, and had it stuffed, and to this day it is kept as a parlor ornament in my brother's Canadian house.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A YANKEE has invented a new and cheap plan for lodging. One of his lodgers remonstrated, but when such a hearty meal—the mesmerized being satisfied from sympathy.

An old gentleman who has paid some attention to small matters, says he always watches with much interest the manner in which a young man ties his cravat to see if he is falling and drawing rooms of the hotels at the sun-side at this season of the year. "If you see a lady arise enter and depart a little in advance of their husbands, be sure that you will see a gentleman offer attention'ons. If, on the contrary, the husbands take the lead, you may rest assured they take the lead in every thing else."

A young minister, in a highly elaborate sermon which he preached, said several times, "The commentators do not agree with me here." Next morning a good woman came to see him, with something in her apron. She said to the minister, "Sir, I have brought you a present of a fine one; and as he said 'the common tares did not agree with him,' he had sent him some of the very best kidneys."

Hope is the dream of those who are awake.

The Dayton Journal states that Fernando Wood in a fine fenzy, during his speech made recently in that city, said that if by offering up his own life he could stop the bloodshed that is now afflicting the country, he would cheerfully do so. An appreciative Irishman in the crowd earnestly responded—"It wod be mighty cheap."

A Dutchman was relating his marvelous escape from drowning. After telling of his companions were lost by the upsetting of a boat, and he alone saved, "And how did you escape from dat?" asked one of his hearers. "I did not go in the pote," was the Dutchman's pald reply.

A Gascon nobleman had been reproaching his cowardliness. "I owe you nothing," said the nullified young man. "So far from having nothing," replied the other, "you owe me all you had never been born. I should at this moment be the author of your existence."

"How far is it to Taunton?" asked a countryman, who was walking exactly the wrong way to reach that town. "Your twenty-four miles, honored sir," said the lad he asked, "if you go the way you are going now; about a mile if you turn round."

"I was never on intimate terms with the princess," said a burglar who was used as Queen's evidence against Fagin. "But you were sometimes," replied the judge, "when he was robbing a house to drink a gentleman's champagne and go to bed with his sister, without having a card of thanks on the dining-room table. He brought distinction on the profession."

When is the mother of a large family like a ship at sea?—When she's upset by a squall.

Why is there no occasion for a finis-player to go to Germany?—Because he can stay at home and breathe a German air.

The clergyman who "came to a head" in his discourses was much disappointed to find no brains in it.

"I can't say I admire your style of acting," said a landlady to a strolling player when she caught him stealing the spoons.

Boys can head often play the game of pitch and toss. "Even at six, my children."

NATIONAL CONSUMERS.—To keep a Spectator's Lyre fresh properly is considered to be the Art of Ledger-de-Main.

"Is my wife out of spirits?" said John, with a sigh, As he met a neighbor of a temperance bent.
"Quite out, Sir, indeed," said her maid in reply,
"For she drank every drop of it last night."

An Irish gentleman, parting with a lazy servant-woman, was asked, with respect to her industry, whether she was hard to handle? "Handle, is it?" said she, "I'd as soon be, sir, not at all; she'll frequently be knocked down sided by the very side of it."

"Sir," said a barber to an attorney who was pending his head, "you have not an ill thing in the discovery region." The lawyer, pronouncing the place good, dispensed with the operation, and told the man to send word he had to pay office I'll return the three and fourpence."

A merchant his labor will often discard,
If he finds a fault in his clerk;
But a clerk—and its case is uncommonly hard—
Will continue to work though it finds a fault in his master.

A certain young clergyman, modest almost to bashfulness, was once asked by a country sportsmen, of a considerable degree of eccentricity, to go out shooting, and in a tone of voice sufficient to catch the attention of the whole company. "Sir," replied he laggard that he declined to such extreme old age?" To which question the clergyman replied, "Perhaps they would do pigeon."

Franklin was once asked, "What is the use of your discovery of atmospheric electricity?" The philosopher answered the question by asnking, "What is the use of a new-born infant?"

A painter who was well acquainted with the dire effects of a bad lot had written him some money, he called a lawsuit, and another who had lost one. He painted the former with a dirt, and the latter with a shirt.

Coleman, the dramatist, was asked if he knew Theodore Hook. "No," replied the wit; "Hook and Eye are old associates."

A gentleman asked a friend, in a very knowing manner, "Pray, did you ever see a cat-fish?" "No," was the response, "but I've seen a rope-walk."

"Well, neighbor, what's the news this morning?" said a neighbor to a friend. "Why, there just bought a stock of flour for a poor woman." "Just like you! Whom have you made so happy by your charity this time?" "My wife."

"What's in your mind let no one know,
Nor to a friend reveal it;
For when your friend becomes your foe,
He'll use it well to steal it."

"The British Empire, Sir," exclaimed an orator, "it cuts on which the sun never sets." "And one," replied a listener, "on which it never rises, just laughs a stock of flour for a poor woman." "Just like you! Whom have you made so happy by your charity this time?" "My wife."

Some persons can neither stir hand nor foot without making it clear they are thinking of themselves, and laying little things by for exhibition.

A scholar having fallen into the hands of robbers was fastened to a tree, and left so nearly a whole day, till one passing by inquired, "Sir, why are you there?" "I suppose I must be false, which saith that the tide certainly for no man."

A lady, whose fondness for generous living had given her a flushed face and ruddened nose, consulted Dr. Sangrado. "Madam," replied the doctor, after she exclaimed, "Where, in the name of wonder, Doctor, did I get that red nose?" "Out of the decanter, madam," replied the Doctor.

A traveler, when asked whether in his youth he had gone through college, was in the habit of saying that it was a small village between Wigan and Preston.

A gentleman at a musical party asked a friend, in a whisper, "Is that performer playing the violin or scraping the music." "Between the bars," replied the friend.

A traveler relating his adventures, told the company that the natives of a certain island in the South Seas had a singular way of saluting each other. "Instead of shaking hands, as we do, they rub noses." "Ah, indeed!" said he, "I've run, and they run after us."

MRS. Bray relates the following of a Devonshire physician, who, having been called to see a patient in a fever of whist: One evening, in the midst of a deal, the doctor fell fast asleep in his chair, overpowered with the company. Was he alive or dead? At length he showed signs of life, and, rehearing the last feed him which had possessed him at the moment he fell into the fit, he exclaimed, "What is trumps?"

MR. Smith passed a pork shop the other day.—Mr. Smith whistled. The moment he did this every sausage in a string fell flat. As a note to this we would remark that the day before he lost a Newfoundland dog that weighed sixty-eight pounds.

An Irishman once ordered a painter to draw his picture, and to represent him standing behind a tree.

SEASONABLE WORDS.

"And a word spoken in season, how good it is."

A gentle to a little child
In kindly accents given,
Lest we with angry words should blight
The lily buds of heaven.

A loving to the bright-haired boy,
Upon whose sunny face
A brave and noble beauty sets,
Its purest seal of grace.

A tender to the blue-eyed bride,
Who from the mother nest
Flies to the wooing land of a love,
Warm fluttering at her breast.

A portion to the wayward youth,
The lark by tempests tossed
Oft comes to harbor, while the ship
Lens tempest-tried be lost!

A cheery for the white-haired man,
The frost upon his brow
May hide as warm a heart as thine,
Though winter crowns it now.

A timely to the wearied soul,
Beneath life's noonday sun;
That fainting sinks upon its way,
Ere yet the goal be won.

Good words, three words, good deeds, kind deeds;
Oh! 'tis a glorious part
To shed upon our fellow-man
The sunshine of the heart.

Then, though the chain that binds us here
By Death's wide be riven,
Its golden links shall join again
God—benitfied in heaven!

QUITE ALONE.

By GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA

CHAPTER XLVI.
LILY'S NEW LIFE.

A BREATH of her old life had blown on the faded cheek of the horse-riding countess. The boon companions of by-gone times, the opportunity for looking lazy-tongs, and laughing dissolvent, had returned once more. She painted and decked herself with a will; for she knew how select were her audiences, and how easy was of their plaudits. To think that she—who had been the leader of that kind of fashion which fashionable writers are ashamed to own, and to follow, and bow down before with servile reverence—should have been but an hour ago doomed to caper on a wooden horse for the amusement of an amphitheatre full of plebeians, admitted for sixpence in addition to the ordinary price of entrance to the Cirque! To think that on a very long since her worldly estate should have been even more debased, and that, raddled and tattooed, and with feathers on her head, she should have been shown, as a mock savage, for a few hards, on the boards of a French booth!

So the evening is gone to her support, and the horses are safe in their stables. The last Roman candle has smouldered out, and very ghastly and gallow-like in the moonlight looks the iron frame-work of the fire-works. A faint odor of burning yet lingers about them, and the night breeze stirs shreds of cartridge-paper, half consumed to cinder, which have fallen in the thickets of Ranelagh. You might fancy that there was some huge Place de Grève, where criminals had been broken on the Catherine-wheel, or hanged upon gibbets, and their bodies afterward given up to the flames. But it was only the corpse of Pleasure that had thus been burned to ashes.

The countess came to her temper, the perishows and fiddling-tents are shut up, and Ranelagh is left to darkness, to the night watchman; and to Lily Flora.

Lily did not live in the gardens, but she and her—well, her guardian, her protectress, her mistress, for they were generally the last to leave the place. The countess was generally so much exhausted by her exertions in the high school of horsemanship as to require a long period of rest in her dressing-room before she went home. Sometimes restoratives stronger than eau-de-Cologne had to be administered before she felt strong enough to retire to her domicile. The countess was—and to say so truly—not under her use of stimulants. As she had attained middle age, as her husband was dead, and she had no particular character to speak of, it may not be indiscreet to avow, once for all, that she was in the habit of taking a great deal too much brandy-and-water. She said it did her good. The doctor said it did her harm; but, at any rate, she took it.—Could. It did not improve her temper. Her fun waggish at the best of times, it now bordered very closely on the fiendish. Her powers of tongue were by no means diminished; yet she seemed to distrust them, and her abusive eloquence was by no means rarely backed up by blows. She was frequently provoked into striking those who offended her; and who could avoid giving offense to that terrible countess? I have heard that the children of the man who makes birch-brooms have usually a bad time of it; and there is considerable risk in residing with a lady of violent temper addicted to drinking, of equestrian pursuits, and part of whose necessary equipment is a riding-whip.

Lily often thought of that dreadful night in Paris, when the Italian met her in the Elysian Fields. Was its judgment on her for running away, she wondered, that her imaginary evasion had been followed by so dire a bondage? Perhaps. Her terror had been so excessive, her despair so great, that it was only in a dim and fragmentary manner that she could recall the incidents of her capture. She had fainted somewhere, that she knew. On returning to consciousness she had found herself in a filthy little room, stretched on a wretched mattress laid upon the floor. The Italian was crouched on a stool by the fire-place, smoking, and a toothless ragged old woman was gathering over some evil-smelling mess in a pipkin on the hearth. The room was seemingly Signor Ventimillon's studio; for, about, were a number of unfinished wax torses, some with wigs and some without, some horrid in hirsute adornments in the way of whiskers and mustachios, and some bare and grinning like corpses. Arms, legs, hands, and feet, appertaining to celebrated characters in ancient and modern history, littered a row of shelves and a rough deal table, together with certain pots full of color, and bits of lace and tinsel. A faint odor of garlic, even more than of cooking than that of the stew in the old woman's pipkin, pervaded the hovel.

There came from an inner room a woman with her hair hanging over her shoulders, a half-washed face—for fantastic streaks of paint were still visible on her cheeks and forehead—and an old petticoat and shawl hastily thrown over a theatrical tinsel and flounced dress. Tarnished sandals were plainly visible beneath her dress. She held in one hand a flaring tallow-candle, and in the other a glass of cognac liquor.

She knelt down by the side of the still half-fainting girl, and held the glass to her lips.

"Drink!" she said, in English; "you want it this instant. It will do you good. Drink! or I'll strangle you."

Lily could not but obey. The strangely-accoutred woman looked so fierce and spoke so sternly. She swallowed a mouthful of the liquid, which was nauseous to the taste, and scorching to her throat, and was, indeed, brandy mingled with water. After a short time she felt better, though dizzy.

"And so I have found you at last, little runaway," the woman went on. "I could have sworn it was you in the booth. Your dark hypocritical little eyes of yours at once. Ah! I have had a fine chase after you, cunning little fox as you are. Where have you been all these years, you crocodile? Come, confess. Let me know all about it. Speak, or I beat you."

Nervous and shattered as she was, Lily could at first give scarcely a coherent reply to the question with which the woman appeared to have overwhelmed her. Though she had a vague and alarmed dread of whom she might be, she was not prepared for the fact of Mrs. Bunny's identity. rogate her. In fact, she could only tremble and palpitate like a little bird fresh caught in the hand of a strong man.

The woman made her drink more of the liquid. Lily pleaded that it nearly choked her, and turned her head away from the glass. Whereupon, though it seemed to set her brain on fire, she really felt stronger for it, and, after a time, could speak. The woman was, in fact, somewhat soothed by asking her if she remembered Miss Bunny-castle's school at Stockwell, the dinner at Greenwich, the steamer, and the journey to Paris, the Pension Marcassin. Yes: Lily remembered all these. What next? the woman asked, threatningly. Well, she had been living at the residence with Madame de Kergolay: all save her love for Edgar Greyfaunt.

Why had the husband of the lady who had been so kind to her? Lily experienced much difficulty in explaining that part of the matter. How could she tell this woman bits of glass lacked the hard and bitter truth. The woman would not believe that she had found herself in the Champs Elysees by accident. She had run away, she said: of that she was certain. Lily, blushing and addressing herself entirely to Mrs. Bunny herself. Why had she fled? The woman asked her again and again, in tones which each time became more menacing, with her clenched right hand at last, and might have brought it down heavily (for she had been partaking freely of the stimulant which she had found herself in the hands of the Italian, and found benefit in it), but the Italian muttered something from his stool, and she desisted. The girl sought to pacify her. She tried to explain to her protectress that she had been ungrateful to her benefactress, that she had lost her affection, and that she saw nothing before her but sudden flight.

"Ungrateful! I can well believe that. To whom had thou not been ungrateful, little spawn of evil? Ungrateful to me! Ungrateful to the same story—ingratitude, ingratitude!"

Anyway she, the Wild Woman, had done a great deal at one time to earn a return of gratitude!

"Then is some man at the bottom of this," she said at last, rising as if wearied with further cross-questioning. "Thou art just the age to make a fool of thyself for the sake of some pair of blonde whiskers. Never mind, little one; we will wait. Sooner or later, by fair means or by foul, we will have the secret out of thee."

She let her be at last, and the girl sank into a long deep slumber. Waking toward morning, she found that the sorry Signor, half tipsy, and that she might never wake again, once more sank into sleep. Excitement, fatigue, and the liquor they had made her swallow had been more than opatos to her.

She was kept close prisoner in the hovel the whole of that day and the whole of the next. The fetes still continued, and her tyrant was called upon to enact, during at least sixteen hours out of the twenty-four, the part she was so admirably qualified to fill: that of the Wild Woman. Lily used to look upon it in the morning with a curiosity that was mingled with terror as she arrayed herself for the monstrosity of the day. It was as a mummer's dress. How soiled and faded the fleshings were! How frayed at the wrists and armpits! How they bulged into ugly creases at the knees and elbows! How splay-footed the sandals looked, how coarse and garish the embroidery! She had no time to pink her fleshings, but rubbed powdered vermilion into the parts that were discolored, just as she rubbed it into her face. There were patches of the latter, however, that required orpiment, and cerose, and bismuth, and ochre, and chrome yellow to be laid on in gorgeous streaks, and half-moons, and dabs. Was she not a Wild Woman of the Prairies? Before she daubed on her war-paint she would anoint her face and hands with a tallow-candle.

"No cold cream for me now, little angel," she would say, with a horrible leer, to the wondering girl. "Watch well what I am doing. It will soon be thy turn to paint and dress, and woe betide thee if thou makest blunders. Observe, the candle first; the tallow, c'est du suif, de chez l'epicier, tout de bon. And I, who have covered myself with pearl powder—la vraie perles d'Orient—who have basked in eau-de-Cologne and milk of almonds, and who have found, when I have done dressing, the bouquet left for me at the door of my loge by the duke or the ambassador's envoy, the bouquet with a diamond ring in a bodice. 'Ore non! c'est a crever de rage!"

Then she would drink a little brandy, and a little more, and more, and console herself, and begin to sing.

When she was fully accounted in all her paint, and all her feathers, and spangles, and tawdry, twopenny splendors, she would, after surveying herself in a broken bit of looking-glass, come forward to Lily and pose and grimace before her with the great wooden club and foil paperscovered knitchet that went to make up her paraphernalia.

"Am I handsome, à cette heure? Am I graceful? Am I majestic? Am I La Belle Zigueza, who has turned so many hearts?" she would cry, ironically.

Lily did not know what answer to return.

"You say nothing. You despise your maman protectress. Ah! you disdain me, do you, Mademoiselle la Comtesse Barone—Princess de Kergolay—Mademoiselle la Marquise de Carabas—Quatre sous? We will soon take your pride down. Quick, trolley. Down—je-me-oui is gentille. Give me some brandy, do you hear?"

Lily poured out for her into a glass that was without a foot some of the poison the woman liked so well.

"Ah! that is good," she would say, drawing a long breath. "Ca tue à la longue, mais ca donne de courage—de courage!" And then she would throw back her long hair, now coarse and ropy from inculture, and flecked with gray. "A bientôt, my pretty one. Vive la joie! Vive la rug-rug! Dire que j'ai été une mîadi—la femme d'un gentilhomme. C'etait de la crane bete de jeune homme. Coquin que je suis! Apour mari. Yes, he was a scoundrel, but he was a gentleman, and I was his wife. I used to ride in a carriage and go to the opera with ostrich feathers in my head. I used to wear diamonds. Look at my hands now, you wolf cub!"

Rude work had spread the muscles, swollen the knuckles, roughened the skin, and covered the backs with hard knots like unto the roots of trees. They had once been handsome hands; but they were discolored now, and chapped and washed by cosmetics, under mockery of her former state, she still had her fingers covered with rings; but they were paltry baubles, not worth the coin some of the bits of glass backed with tinsel and set in hoops of brass, which left green stains upon her flesh.

She would sit there at night, tired, dusty, perspiring, the ruddle on her face muddled into one cloudy morass, and more than half intoxicated. The Italian's favorite mark would come with her, and he who wore the suit of armor. There was another knight, too, a bilateral knight, backed fellow with a heavy fringe of black whiskers beneath his chin, and a huge fur cap and velvet pelisse trimmed with white mice, marmots, hurdy-gurdies, and Savoyard boys. He went by the name of "Lorgano di Barbaria," and was other. Lily was one of his dancing children the second day, a wobegone little object from Chamberg, aged about eleven, very wasted and small, and with a consumptive cough, and crouched down in a corner, cuddling a diminutive monkey, who was, as to his upper parts, clothed in the same way as the master, in a scarlet regime, and, as to his lower, after that of the Sultana Scheherazade, as seen in illustrations of the Arabian Nights. And of the same family the wobegone little boy from Chambery seemed passionately fond.

While the girl and the Wild Woman were wrangling over their brandy and tobacco and dominoes Lily ventured to approach the little monkey with a crust in his hand a piece of bread, the remnant of her coarse repast.

The Wild Woman saw the action. "Young robber," she cried out. "Attends, je vais te donner une tripée. Ah! I have the double six." But the monkey took no notice of Lily's patronage of the Savoyard.

The girl was very glad. She made the boy feel, and was glad to see that he first of all took care of the monkey, whom he addressed as Cupidon, and whose white teeth were soon chattering over a piece of crust. Lily, growing bolder, stroked the long lean paw of the ape, and even mustered up enough courage to scratch his bullet head. He resented this liberty somewhat, and might have bitten the girl, but for a warning cuz at his chain on the part of his master. Then he continued his domestic life, and the life of the Savoyard's friendly but uncleanly shirt, there to dwell in passive dreams, perhaps, of its primitive fleas, and the happy days when he hung on to the limbs of trees by his prehensile tail, watching his great uncle as he had cocoa-nuts at the head of the intrusive traveler. Still absorbed as he was in the pleasures of warmth and rest from labor, Lily could see his little bright eyes twinklingly watching her from under the waistcoat of the Alpine boy.

"Where do you dance?" asked the Savoyard.

"Dance?" quoth Lily, opening her eyes.

"Harve I see you with a tambourine and red shoes, doing the Inforcati?"

Lily told him, gently, that it must be some other girl.

"How much did your padrona give for you? My padrone said six hundred francs for Victore Emmanuele [the names of all Savoyards are either Victor Emanuel, Charles Albert, or Charles John]. My father bought two cows and six goats with my price, and will of Cogne himself, the blood-sucker, who had lent him money to raise his crop. Does your padrona beat you? My master used me up with a chain. Lucky the boy from Genoa, who died, tried to poison Gorgano' in his petit verre. When they washed him for burial his body was all blue."

They were a curious trio—the girl, the Savoyard, and the ape.

On the morning of the third day the Wild Woman came to Lily's bedside, and said, "Marsh!" The girl had nothing to pack up, and still wore the modest little bonnet and shawl she had had on when she ran away from Madame de Kergolay. The Wild Woman had discovered her locket, and, not without tears and entreaties on Lily's part, had wrenched it away from her, and had nothing now that belonged to her in the world, and was Quite Alone.

The Wild Woman's traveling dress was a faded tarlatan gown, and a more faded scarlet shawl, with a bonnet inconceivably battered. She did not fail to remark, however, as she bade Lily array herself, that she had been for the habit of wearing velvets and cashmeres, and a bird of paradise plumes in her bonnet. And then she waved, and took in little marriage.

The Italian wax-work man, who was either the Wild Woman's husband, or some relative, must, had he known it, have been a fool to be of the party. He was not so very ill-conditioned a fellow, and was passing kind to Lily, never failing to compliment, and, if not to caress, to interfere if the woman offered to strike her. The Wild Woman's temper, especially toward evening, when she had partaken more generously of cognac, was very uncertain; and there was no knowing when the blows might begin to fall.

They went by means of a steamer down with the wax-work and the scenery and appointments of the Wild Woman (for the latter was a joint concern, and Ventimillon appeared to be proprietor of them both), to a place called Pontoise, France by distance, and famous as near as for Dijon. They halted by night at mean inns, where sometimes they obtained a couple of beds—sometimes a mattress and sometimes not. And the countess—that is to say, the Wild Woman—camped out in a barn. The toothless old woman had been left in charge of the booth as the quey in Paris, but Lily had always, however small and miserable it might be, a room to herself. The Wild Woman never failed, likewise, in the precaution of taking away Lily's clothes, and the candle, and locking the door after her, when she retired for the night.

The girl fell into a state of semi-lassitude and apathy. She did not seem to care much what became of her. She had lost her locket. Her horizon was bounded on all sides by the Wild Woman and the Italian, and beyond them she could discern nothing. She was not especially desirous to die; but she was not particularly anxious about living. She was not even acutely unhappy. She was quite subservient and resigned: only numbed, and chilled, and torpid.

There were fairs on the road; and at some of these the Wild Woman gave her performance, and Signor Ventimillon exhibited his wax-work. On these occasions Lily was always carefully locked in her room, and got neither dinner nor supper. But when she returned at night, the woman not very sober, now grumbling, now chuckling over the receipts of the day and evening.

It was at a place called St. Esprit, and when Lily had been locked up many hours on a hot August afternoon and night, that Lily—just that kind of loneliness when you begin to hear strange noises that have no foundation save in your imagination—heard a big cough over the wax-work, and, though terrified at the miserable auberge the party had put up at, came into the room. "I have got something for you," she said, triumphantly.

The country girl had two red elbows and a face like a mountain, little pig's eyes, and matted hair whose roots were within an inch and a half of her eyebrows. She brought with her a bottle of wine, and, seemingly, was not unaccustomed to the use of garlic as a condiment with her meals.

"I have key, little one," she continued, "and something else, too. Attapez." And from beneath her apron she drew forth a mighty slice of bread covered with blackberry jam.

Lily was really hungry, and only too glad to eat the bread and jam. She had scarcely declivered it, when the girl whose face was like a tomato said—

"Why don't you run away? I would, if I were you. I know those wretches treat you cruelly. I have heard them abusing you at night, after I have gone to bed. Cruel, impetite. I have got fifteen francs saved up to buy me a garden cress. Put my hirvoire will give me another. I am sure if he is obliged to sell himself as a substitute in the conscription so do so. Take my fifteen francs, and run away from these bad people."

But rather was Lily to run now?

Lily heard the good-natured country girl out, and thanked her for her bread and jam, but she bade her take back the key, lest she should get herself into trouble, and told her that she had no thoughts of running away. No one meant to treat her unkindly, she said, and, if she was unhappy, it was her own fault. She was, in truth, too weary to fly. She did not care much what became of her. The first hour of captivity was very awful; you rage and scream, and feel as though you could hang yourself to your dungeon bars, or dash your brains out against the walls; but days, weeks, months, years pass, and at last you hear your durance with a dull apathy that is well-nigh utter indifference. It does not so much matter. A year the more or a year the less does not count. At last, when Lily knew the cell door is opened, and you are told that you are free, you are in no very great hurry to move. Her nurse had mentioned here to stay; she should you not stay here a little longer? Prisoners have been known to memorialize their jailer to be allowed to stop, when their time-bell has arrived, and at last they have had to be turned out of the prison by force. There are times when you might leave Gondomar and his enses dawning suffering. The victim sleeps at the stake. I have heard of a convict who committed suicide because the end of his term was rapidly approaching; but I think you might trust a hundred convicts with razors to shave themselves every day for a year without them of them cutting their throats.

Lily was not in chains, and her window was not barred; but she was a captive nevertheless. She had resigned herself to it, and waited submissively enough for what was to come next.

The hostess of the tavern where they lived at Dijon treated her meals after the first few days she suspected the good nature of her servant girl. The Wild Woman had told her that Lily was a notorious apprentice, abstracted a sent on not learning to dance on the tight-rope, and inveterately addicted to running away. The hostess, who was much to do with the public banks in her time (her husband had been a paillasse, and her eldest son was a ventriloquist, while her youngest daughter would of all have fully believed this story, and looked upon Lily as a very atrocious young criminal indeed.

"If you are determined to run away," she would say, "my faith, I would arrange you. You should learn to dance as the bears do. Ya petite rebelle va! Ecrais sa tete a la musique d'un bon martinet. I'd lay a strap about you, that's all!"

Lily did not think it worth while to bandy words with this woman, who was stupid and violent, and given to rubbing too much rouge.

"Sulky young baboon," the hostess would continue, shaking her forefinger at her. "At thy age, too. Almost a woman. And not very bad-looking, either," she added, in an under-tone to herself. "Dost thou know what will come to you for running away? The police will get hold of thee, and thou wilt be sent to prison, abolument comme une coureuse. Is it so very fine, then, to shake one on the toes? Bah! when I was half thy age my father made me swallow a Turkish cimiter and the sabre of a cuirassier; and before I was twelve I was practicing the back somersault on a spring board into a pond of water, to prevent breaking my bones when I fell."

A fortnight elapsed before the Wild Woman came back; but she retained radiant. They had been to Paris; to the fair of Saint Cloud Rouge. Ventimilloni had run over to Geneva, where, in those days, and may be, for aught I know, to this day, there is a public gaming-table. Luck was in his favor, and the Italian had won heavily from Indeed Napoleon. He had come back to Lyons, dressed up the Wild Woman in satin and velvet, bought her a bonnet with a bird of paradise plume in it, covered her neck and neck with cheap jewelry, and taken her over to Geneva. Luck had gone against him there, and with a very few Napoleons remaining from his winnings, he was prepared mood-ily to return to the place whence he came, and take to the two-horse business again. But the Wild Woman—Madame la Comtesse in future, if you please—had been experiencing the smiles of fortune, while on the unhappy Ventimilloni she had so suddenly scowled. Madame had not ventured any thing beyond a few five-franc pieces on the red or the black; but she had won an old, a very old acquaintance at Geneva. Whence it arose that she returned to Dijon radiant.

"Up, paresseuse!" she cried to Lily. "Up, and get your maid together. We are going back to England and to life."

The girl, who passed most of her time now crouching listlessly in a corner, regarded this command as a literal one, and stood up in obedience to it. Madame seemed to recollect that the rags she had spoken of were already gotten together, and that Lily had no others.

"Did ever one see such a tatterdemalion?" she grumbled. "I must go to a revendeuse à la toilette, and get her some clothes to travel in."

Lily was locked up for the last time; but within an hour madame came back with a fat old woman who had a limp and the appearance of whose splay, slowly crawling feet, in their roomy black list slippers, looked like a pair of turtle in mourning for their brethren who had been made by cruel ejicures into soup. The fat old woman carried a big bundle beneath each arm, and Lily was speedily equipped in some faded but decent second-hand garments. The countess sat by, inspecting the proceedings, and tapping the floor impatiently with her parasol. It was the second time, Lily remembered, that she had so been fitted out under inspection. The last time it was by Cowley & Co.

Ten days afterward they were in London. The Italian staid behind. He seemed to bear separation from the Wild Woman—the countess, I mean—with great equanimity. She had for him, and had had always, the haughty and insolent indifference we feel for a person whose grade is beneath ours, but who is useful to us. Even for her brother she had treated the wax-work man du haut en bas.

"When I pay you a visit in London, my empress, the Italian had remarked, showing his white teeth, "you will have some macaroni for your Angelo, your Angelino, your Angelotto—is it not so?"

"That depends," she answered, tossing her head. "Can you let me have any more money?"

"Not a halfpenny, my dove. I have spent millions as there are in my name. I have but four Louis d'or left, and I must have crowded houses at the show for a fortnight, or I shall starve."

"That is your affair."

"Yes, my affair, that is my affair"—and the Italian showed his teeth again—"what a pity I did not put you on a pair of pastboard wings, and make you fly instead of a Wild Woman! Well, I am not angry with you. Donna è mobile. When you are tired of England, and have had enough of living upon too many potatoes (you are too fond of cognac, my Zenobia), you will be glad enough to come back to Master Angelo, and grate the cheese for his macaroni."

"I hope not."

"Yes you will. Till then, farewell. Take care of the Poverina"—this was Lily, and he patted her, gently smiling the while—"and keep your hands off her. England is a good country, though the sun never shines there, and there are lots of police. Ah, there, there, la Giustizia never interferes with you, unless your passport is out of order."

"I shall do what I like with my own."

"Precisely. Don't ill-treat your cat, or your dog, or whatever else is your own, then. Go, and be happy. Don't make me jealous with those eyes out, if you can help it. What is his name? Il Signor Toutlecilo—what is it? Dio mio! what a barbarous name for a man!"

"His name is no business of yours. Tu m'embêtes, Ventimilloni. Que cela finisse!"

And so parted. The Italian was never a loving vagabond, not over-scrupulous as to morality; but he was a good-natured kind of fellow, and, when he showed his white teeth, looked quite amiable.

This is how Lily came back to England, and became acquainted with Ranelagh. She had become the attendant, the dresser, the drudge, the life-saver, the Lily of Mr. Ranelagh's friend Ernestine, the lady who was creating so great a sensation in the high school of horsemanship.

OUR LOST BOY.

"My dear, I assure you I have not the least idea where he is."

"I told this to Mrs. Dobb on her return at ten o'clock at night. You see, cousin Bob drove up to the house just after tea, and invited my wife to go for a ride behind his hays. Bob drives a fast and handsome span of bays, and a ride behind them is a treat she is always delighted to enjoy, particularly as I do not keep horses myself. Keep a cow, but she is not good to either ride or drive. It is a pleasing trait in my wife's character, that she always allows me to permission before going to ride with Bob. On this occasion she said:

"James, Bob is going to drive me out to the Grove and back. I shall be gone long."

"All right, my dear. I permit you."

"Oh, thank you, I'm sure! Permit!"

And then she went.

I was left in sole charge of the house and the four little Dobbs. Bridget had gone for a walk with one of her cousins, of which she has a number, and I instructed the children in the matter of behavior, and then entered my study and went to writing. I am writing a book of those babies again until about last nine. Then I shut up my study and went to look after them. I found little Susie curled up on a sofa in the parlor, fast asleep. Sallie had gone to bed, and tucked herself nicely in with her boots on. Neil was on the ball-stairs, sleeping like a top. And Fred was—

I hunted the house all over, from cellar to garret, and found every body but Fred. Search as I would, I did not know where Fred was. So when Mrs. Dobb came home, that is what I told her.

"James, do you want to frighten me to death?"

"No, my dear; that would be too horrible."

"Then where is that boy?"

"I give you my word I don't know."

"Why, where can he be go?"

"My dear, if I knew where he went I should go after him immediately."

"Oh, dear! was there ever such a man? And I have just got home alive, after being run over by the cars."

"You don't tell me! Are you hurt much?"

"Well, we just escaped. The locomotive came so close to us that it took my breath away, and Bob had to put his arm around me to keep me from swooning."

"Revel expedient!"

"And he said I trembled like a leaf. And now I come home only to find that you have lost our boy, and to be frightened to death again."

"Now, my dear, you are too severe. I lost the boy? I didn't lose him."

"Then I ask you again, where is he?"

"I'll go and find him."

"Find him!" said my wife, with a perceptible accent of incredulity. "We shall never find him this night."

Nevertheless I lit a cigar, exchanged my slippers for boots, put on my coat and hat, and set out in the night to beat the neighborhood.

I walked around the square, examining the gutters carefully, and looking over fences into people's door-yards, but I found nothing but a large number of dogs, which barked at me as if I were a burglar.

Turning under a street-lamp, I saw two female figures approaching, and grasped my stick to be prepared for the worst. They proved to be Mrs. Dobb and Bridget.

"Can't you find him?" said my wife, in tremulous tones.

"Why no, my dear, I haven't found him yet, but I dare say I shall."

"James, what makes you be so calm?"

"James, what's the use in fidgeting?"

"And that darling child may be floating in the river, with his poor little face turned up to the stars, and his father talks about fidgeting!"

"You horrify me, Susan. I will go right down to the river and look about it."

I walked off sobbing.

It was a long walk to the river, and smoking is favorable to thought, so before I got to the water's edge I had concluded that there was little probability Fred would be found there. What should he go to the river for? However, I stood on the dock and looked up and down the stream, but I could see nothing floating.

A man came off a canal-boat near by, and I asked him if he had seen a little boy around there without any cap on.

"Boy, yes," he said; "I have. How old a boy was it you wanted, Sir?"

"Oh, about six or seven years old," I replied. "I never can remember those children's ages exactly. My wife says if I had a thousand children I couldn't remember their ages; and I dare say I couldn't. "How was this little boy dressed that you saw?" I continued.

"I didn't notice partic'lar. He was purty rugged. He axed me for some cold wittles, and I gave him in charge. If I'd only knowed y' wanted 'im!"

"Then he isn't stopped?"

"Oh, your boy! Have y' lost your boy, Sir?"

"Yes, he's got away somewhere. I was afraid he might have fallen in the river."

"Prapa he have. A many boys git drownded in the river."

"Good Heavens! I hope not."

"Oh, but they do! Now I think of it, my old woman said she heard something about a boy in a barrel. You know a bit might a have fell in that way."

You can not conceive with what a cheerful sprightliness the wretch advanced this proposition.

"I'll tell you what it is," said I; "if you'll get a boat, and row up and down the river and look, I'll give you ten dollars if you find him."

"Ten dollars! Is that a fact?"

"So much the better."

"I tell you what," said the man, "if you don't mind givin' me a dollar afore I start, I'll git a best and make a hunt for that. I wouldn't care to go otherwise."

I gave him a dollar, and saw him set out in a leaky boat which required a deal of preliminary bailing-out and paddling to last I saw of him.

After waiting a long time on the dock I went on the canal-boat and put my head in at the cabin door. There was a fellow burning on a table, but nobody was there. Descending into the cabin, I took a card from my pocket, and sat down to write a word of information to the man against his return with the lost boy, when I was startled by a loud scream close at my back. Turning, I beheld a feminine head at the cabin door, and two eyes glaring at me as if I were a ghost.

"Don't be alarmed, my good woman. I wished to leave a note for your husband, who is out looking for my boy."

"Where's yer boy?"

"I don't know where he is. He's lost. Your husband is out on the river in a boat looking for him."

"Drownded?"

"I hope not. Your husband spoke of your bearing a splash in the water, or a cry of distress, a little while ago, and—"

"That his gas. I hain't heard nothin'."

"Why, he told me you did."

"He's gittin' back. He much d'ye pay 'im?"

"I paid him a dollar."

"That's enough."

"Enough for what?"

"For a lie. He's gone down the river t' drink yer health."

"You don't mean to say—"

"Yes I do. You may's well go home."

And home I went.

"Have you found him?" asked my wife, her pale face greeting me at the door.

"No, my dear, not yet. I didn't know but he had come home. What time is it?"

"It's after eleven; and eh! where is that poor child?"

"I'll go out again, dear;" and I started, with a weary sigh.

"James!" called my wife.

"Well, what is it?"

"Hadn't you better take the dinner-bell, and rouse up the neighbors? Who knows but he has gone in somewhere and gone to bed?"

"Fudge!"

"How can you be so heartless as to say fudge at such a time as this?"

And Mrs. Dobb began to cry.

There, I knew it. It is my great to cry Susan. I said fudge, but of course I didn't exactly mean it. But don't you know that if our boy was at any of the neighbors' they would send him home?"

"Well, I don't know what harm there would be in just ringing the dinner-bell."

"I shouldn't want any body to go ringing bells, through the streets after I was shed, Susan."

"They might well ring bells if they had lost their children," persisted my wife.

"Well, I'll go to the police-station and set the police after him. They'll find him easily enough, and bring him home in the morning. You go to bed and don't worry."

"Oh, James, how can you be so calm I never can understand! But you don't love your children as their mother does. I shall not sleep a wink till I find that poor boy again."

"Well, good-night, dear. I'll be back in an hour or so."

And off I went, with a fresh cigar.

Confound the boy, he should have such a lecture as he would remember, when I got him again—straying off in the night in this way, and making his poor father tramp the town after him.

Wherever I saw a light—in drinking saloons and so on—I stuck my head in and inquired if they had seen a stray boy. I got all sorts of replies, and in one place a bibulous young gentleman invited me to "come up and drink on it" but I didn't find my lost lamb.

At the police-station I left a description of my boy: blue eyes, curly hair, six or seven years old, tow'l waist, drab pants embroidered around the bottom, and blue-and-white plaid sack-coat. I received the assurance that lost children almost always turned up all right in the morning, and that my boy should be brought home as soon as discovered.

My wife was still up when I got home.

"Have you found him?"

"No, my dear—I give him up."

"James!"

But I've set a policeman after him—a big fellow—six feet at least—big as two of me. He'll find him."

After which confident statement I began to undress myself.

"Are you going to bed?" asked my wife.

"Why, of course I am. I'm sleepy."

"Was there ever such a man?" groaned Mrs. Dobb.

I went to bed. I could not coax Mrs. Dobb to do likewise. Ah, how refreshing the soft couch was! I thought I had been a little hasty, and had become quite oblivious of worldly cares, when that unhappy woman came into the room, lamp in hand.

"James!"

"Eh! What now?"

"What time did you say Freddie went out?"

"I said I didn't know, my dear."

"What were you doing?"

"I was writing all the evening."

"What time did you take tea?"

"When I got through writing; about half past nine."

"Did you search the house?"

"Yes, dear, I searched it all over. And now I'm sleepy. Good-night."

"Did you look down cellar?"

"Yes; I looked every where."

"Did you look in the barrel?"

"In the barrel? No. What's the use? He couldn't get in there. The door's fast."

But nothing would do but I must get out of bed now, and go and overhaul the barn. I did; and I looked through all the outhouses, but there was no boy.

"Let's search the house again, James."

"Why, what's the use? I have. And I dare say you will have searched it."

"Of course we have. Do you suppose we could sit here idle? But I want go over the house again. It will help pass away the time, and I can't sleep."

"I can pass the time very comfortably asleep, my dear," I said, with a heavy yawn.

"Oh, you can do any thing! I believe you could sleep if it was judgment-day."

"I very likely might, Susan, if I was as sleepy as I am to-night."

Of course you know we went over the house again. We inspected the wood-pile, and we looked under the sofa and bed. We examined the closets, and we opened all the trunks. We overhauled the pantry, and we looked under the library, where a cat could hardly get to sleep.

"James, I want to know where you were when that boy went away?"

"Why, I told you I was in my study, writing."

"Go in and show me."

"Oh, vexation! Won't you ever let me go to bed?"

I went into the study, and sat down at my round table.

"There!" said I. "Here is where I sat. The lukstand was here; the lamp was here: the dictionary was under this leg, and the other foot was stretched under the table—so!"

Ah!

My naked foot touched a soft lump under the table. I looked under. There he was. Curled up on the floor, fast asleep.

"Come out here, you rascal!" said I; and I drew him forth, rubbing his little eyes with his two little fists.

"Oh, you darling, darling child!" burst forth my wife, in ecstasy, as she folded him in her arms; "where have you been?"

"My dear, that's superfluous! He's been under the table, clearly enough."

"Be quiet, James."

Crawled under there in one of his sly moods, I suppose, to give papa a surprise, and dropped asleep. I hadn't scrutinized the unconscious."

"The dear child!"

"And has been snoozing away like a little pig while I have been ransacking the town, raising lemen, invoking policemen, and all but ringing dinner-bell, my dear."

"And good enough for you," said Mrs. Dobb. "I will take bette. care of my children next time. I go out for a ride with cousin Bob."

"Oh, confound cousin Bob!"

HON. GEORGE H. PENDLETON.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

HON. GEORGE H. PENDLETON.

GEORGE H. PENDLETON, the Democratic candidate for the Vice-Presidency, whose portrait we give on this page, was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, July, 1825. He was elected a member of the State Senate of Ohio in 1854 and 1855, and was the subsequent year chosen as representative of his district in Congress, and has held that position ever since. Personally Mr. PENDLETON is a man of pleasant manners, and has always been popular with his associates. His sentiments are in perfect harmony with the principles of the Chicago Platform. Unlike Cox and other representatives of his party, PENDLETON is sincere in his political faith.

GENERAL JEFF C. DAVIS.

WE give below a portrait of General JEFFERSON C. DAVIS, who lately distinguished himself in the battle of Jonesborough, Georgia. He was a native of Indiana, and graduated from West Point with the rank of Second Lieutenant of the First Artillery, June 17, 1847. In February, 1852, he received a First Lieutenancy. He was one of the officers under Major ANDERSON'S command at Fort Sumter. It was General DAVIS who, in September, 1862, shot General NELSON at the Galt House in Louisville. General NELSON had insulted DAVIS, and the latter was acquitted of the murder. He was at this time a Brigadier-General. He has enjoined the war as Colonel of the Twenty-second Indiana Volunteers. In March, 1862, while yet a Colonel, he was given a Major-General's command, and took an important part in the spring campaign in the Missouri Department, which culminated in the battle at Pea Ridge. He commanded a portion of General BELL'S army in the Kentucky campaign against General BRAGG; early in 1863 he occupied Shelbyville, Tennessee. In General GRANT'S Western campaign he took an active and prominent part; and in the Atlanta campaign he has deserved an honorable mention. When General PALMER resigned he assumed the command of the Fourteenth Corps, and it was in the exercise of this command that he fought the late decisive battle of Jonesborough.

A GALLANT EXPLOIT.

We give on our first page this week an illustration of one of those brave actions which have conferred distinction and honor upon our private soldiers, but which have most frequently passed without any an occasional record. At the battle of Ezra Church HARRY DAVIS, a soldier belonging to the Forty-sixth Ohio regiment, advanced far to the front under the fire of rebel batteries, and reaching over the breast-works of the enemy, grasped the colors of the "Thirteenth Tennessee from the hands of the rebel standard-bearer and brought them off as a trophy. Two weeks ago we gave the portrait of Captain DAVIS, who had distinguished himself thus by a gallant action; and we deem it proper that the private soldier also should receive the merit due to his bravery.

THE REFUGEE.

A FRIEND and I were strolling down
The gay and crowded street,
When with a pale and sad-eyed one
It was our chance to meet.

My friend had bowed to ladies fair,
Who passed and were forgot;
He bowed to her, and on his cheek
I saw a crimson spot.

And yet it was no flush of shame
Upon his cheek that burned;
His look was soon as sad as hers;
To look at her I turned.

Her years they might have been two score,
Her step was sad and slow;
Not sorrow-bowed—but that pace
At which all mourners go.

Though poor, around her yet these was
That nameless grace, which says,
Even to careless passers by,
"I have seen better days."

Tell me," said I, "why you, who wear
A soldier's name and sword,
Cannot meet one who passed us by—
Passed us without a word."

His eyes flashed flame. "My blood," he said,
"It near to madness stirs
To meet that sad, that patient one,
And think what wrongs are hers.

"Two years ago—alas, how changed!—
A fond, proud wife was she,
And mother, too, of three fair sons—
Three fairer could not be.

"Her noble husband to his flag
And to his country true,
Was foully slain, at midnight, by
A cruel traitor crew.

"Slain, not in open, manly fight;
But on his own hearth-stone
She saw his life blood ebb away,
And heard his dying groan.

"She heard the troopers' curses deep
Re-echo through the hall;
She saw the lurid flames spread fast,
She saw the roof-tree fall.

"When morning came, half crazed she stood
Then shrieked and—not long,
Gazing with tearless eye upon
A mass of whitened bone;

"All that was left of him whose love
Had made her life so sweet
Now mingled with the ashes of
Her home now at her feet."

"But where were they, her noble boys,
In this her hour of woe?"
"Ah! they had sought the battle-field
Ere fell this fearful blow.

"Two were with Grant when Vicksburg fell."
"The other, where was he?"
"Another flag above him waved
At Richmond, under Lee.

"And him she mourns as worse than dead,
For in this deadly strife
He battles on the side of those
Who took his father's life.

"Bright-eyed, glad-hearted, once she dwelt
In lovely Tennessee;
Slow-paced, sad-eyed, sad-hearted now,
She's here a Refugee."

THE WOMAN IN BROWN.

"MONEY! More money? Mrs. Wilde, I am perfectly astonished!".

"It isn't for myself, Eugene," faltered the timid little wife, flushing up to the roots of her hair; "but the ladies in the church are trying to make up a little sum for the poor soldiers in hospital, and—"

"Twen-ty-five dol-lars!" slowly enunciated Mr. Wilde, as if every syllable were a hundred-pound weight held up by the unfortunate lips. "For the soldiers! Do I pay taxes, Mrs. Wilde, or do I not? Are my resources drawn upon by the Government, every day in the year, or are they not, for this very object? I am not made of gold, Mrs. Wilde, whatever you may think; I assure you that it is only by the practice of the most rigid economy that I am able at the year's end to bring my expenses within my annual income. Besides, I very cordially disapprove of these outside charities. It's Government's business to provide for the sick soldiers; I can't afford to pay the debts of the whole War Department; and what's more, I won't!"

Eustace Wilde was standing in front of a garetclear coal-fire, on the hearth-rug, buttoning up his gloves for the daily down-town jaunt that opened his day's business, a handsome, stylish-looking man, with a silky black mustache and a pretty figure, attired in garments that fitted him as only Broadway suits can fit; while Maggie, his wife, sat before the centre-table pouring over some bills of dry goods, with deep lines cuffs, and a little white collar tied with moire-colored ribbon. She had a very crowd face, puckered, as it were, about her hair and bright hazel eyes, in whose translucent depths there lurked just a gleam of piquant fire: but somehow there was a weary, care-worn look about the delicately-moulded features, a tired droop of the lashes and a dark ring under the eyes that made one instinctively remember Martha's words of old, "burdened with many cares."

She took up her little porte-monnaie with a disappointed look, and threw it in the pocket of her thick silk apron.

"What shall I tell the Committee, Eustace?"

"Tell them, Mrs. Wilde," said her husband, dogmatically, "that at the present scale of prices economy is the duty of us all. The soldiers will, I have no doubt, be cared for by the proper authorities. I must decline to subscribe. You observe, my dear," he added, glancing at a bank-note that lay on the shining damask table-cloth, "that I have already placed housekeeping funds for the week at your disposal. I must beg of you to use proper discretion in its expenditure."

"Five dollars is not enough, Eustace," said Mrs. Wilde, with a stolid courage born of desperation.

"Not e-nough?"

Maggie raised her eyebrows a little impatiently.

"If you think, Eustace dear, that you can buy the butcher, settle the baker's account and the iceman's bill, and then leave enough for daily marketing expenses, I should like to have you try your home and take charge of the finances yourself—that's all!"

"My dear, you must purchase cheaper articles."

"But, Eustace, you know how fastidious you are about your meals."

"That has nothing to do with the question," said Mr. Wilde, a little shortly. "We must economize, my dear—we must, indeed."

Maggie Wilde colored, and bit her lip. Economize!—when she had sat through all the sunshiny hours of yesterday over a very wash-basket mending little dresses, and darning tiny socks, and retrimming her own bonnet to save unnecessary expenditure. Economize!—when she wore her old shawl, and made over her old dresses, and heard the children's shoes down to dispense with a governess's salary! Poor Maggie! It was rather hard to be accused of extravagance under these circumstances. A quick answer trembled on her lip, but she forced back the angry words, and answered in a subdued tone:

"Indeed, I try not to be extravagant, Eustace."

"But you must be, my dear, or else where is the name of economy gone does all the money go? I never get any thing."

"Don't you?"

"Never, my dear—never. I spend upon it the scraps which I can somewhere in the knockings, but would be much better to devote your energies to domestic economy than to running about collecting money for the soldiers—cry mostly for the sake. And, moreover, I can not very well let you have any more this morning; my funds are running decidedly low."

"You had fifty dollars in that pocket-book the day before yesterday," said Maggie, quietly, "and I have used not ten of it."

"Ten? you must have had more than ten."

"Not a cent," said Maggie, firmly.

"The coal bill. I paid the coal bill out of it, and that was twenty, you remember, Mrs. Wilde," said Eustace, lamphooly.

"Then where are the other twenty dollars?"

Mr. Wilde twisted himself a little, as though his pearl-colored cravat-pin were troubling him.

"Business, my dear; you can't be expected to understand any thing about business matters."

"But what particular business?" persisted his wife.

"Maggie," said Mr. Wilde, solemnly, "this isn't to the purpose at all. A woman's mind isn't adapted to comprehend business relations; she should confine herself to one point—viz., economy. Reduce your expenses; bring every thing within the narrowest possible outlay. I think it would be a very good plan, my dear, to keep a little account of your daily disbursements, and I could glance over it every night, and check off any little items that struck me as clearly superfluous."

Maggie's dark eyes began to sparkle ominously; she played nervously with the golden circle of her wedding-ring.

"You would find no items of that description, Mr. Wilde."

"You think not, I have no doubt; but women seldom understand the nicer distinctions of economy, my—"

But Mrs. Maggie rose quietly to her feet, and walked out of the room, slamming the door behind her with a good deal of vehemence. The slender thread of her patience had been strained to its utmost tension, and had snapped asunder at last.

She sat down, and—of course—cried heartily.

"And I was so sure of that money for the poor soldiers," she thought, between the bright drops. "It seems cruel to ask him to give them, when they are doing and enduring so much for us! I can not brook this—I must not! Eustace has harped quite long enough on this particular string—I must be put an end to! There is some difference between pinching parsimony and judicious economy. O Aunt Sophia! I wonder if you don't help you out of this perplexity you deserve to sink into a mere household drudge, whose ideals shall be gold, silver, and copper!"

How haughtily the red arch of her lips curved! how shadowy the brown eyes glittered through their moisture! Beware, Mr. Eustace Wilde—your wife will be a match for you yet, although you have taken her from the ranks of a mantuche, and the superb consciousness of manhood, while she—is nothing but a woman!

"Maggie dear!" Mrs. Wilde, coming into the kitchen where her Milesian cook was chopping spices for some elaborate made-dish wherein the lady-mistress greatly delighted, "will you lend me your old bonnet and cloak to-morrow?"

Bridget stared in open-mouthed amazement.

"Sure, and ain't the ladies ashamed ye be after wantin' 'em? They're not decent for the likes o' you."

"Never mind; I wish to borrow them for a particular purpose, and will return them dess also, if you will lend it."

"You're welcome as flowers in May, ma'am," said honest puzzled Bridget; "but it's a queer it they'll be for you, darned, an' patched, an' faded."

But Mrs. Wilde only laughed.

The rain was pattering fiercely against the breakfast-room window the next morning as Eustace Wilde sauntered slowly in, but Maggie's chair was empty.

"Where's your mistress, Mary?" he asked the waitress.

"She's breakfastin' with the childer, Sir. Master Charlie's got the toothache, and won't be quiet without his mother, Sir."

"Maggie spoils those children," thought Mr. Wilde, shrugging his shoulders. Breakfast was rather a disagreeable meal to his wife's bright face opposite to him, and he did not linger long over it.

"A black day," he soliloquized as he opened his umbrella, and stepped out into the rain and wind. "It's a good thing the stages run only a block off."

He took his seat, unfolding the morning paper, all unconscious of a closely-veiled female figure, veiled and wrapped in a coarse brown cloak, who entered the stage at the next corner. Nor did he observe that a dripping bundle at the same street-door he pulled the check-string to alight.

As he entered the covered stairway leading to his office, in a massive marble building, a shuffle-looking man advanced to meet him.

"Look here, Wilde, I've been waiting here these fifteen minutes to see you on a piece of a hurry too."

"I am a little behind time this morning," said Eustace, shaking the rain-drops in a dingy shower from his umbrella. "Come up to the office, Hall."

"I can't; I haven't a minute to stay. I just came round to see if you could pay that little bill."

"What bill?"

"Why, your share of the supper at D——'s, and the ride afterwards."

"Oh! yes—yes. Well, how much is it?"

"Only a trifle—eight dollars."

Mr. Wilde hurriedly drew his pocket-book and placed one or two bills in his companion's hand.

"That's right, I believe. A very unpleasant day. Good-morning."

He ran briskly up the long flight of stairs, two steps at a time, while the shabby woman, who had been standing just outside the threshold during this colloquy, as if waiting for somebody, came into the vestibule to escape the driving rain.

"Give us a cent for a very nicest cigars—tip-top!" bawled Jemmy Stokes, the office-boy, diving into the tobacco-store next door. "Quick! you have to in a hurry, Mr. Wilde? that ain't much for a good article. I say, you might give me one for myself, I always get Mr. Wilde's cigars here."

"Take it, then, and get along with yourself," said the man of smoke. "What can I do for you, mem?"

A penny-worth of Scotch snuff;" that was all the shabby woman in the faded brown cloak wanted. The tobacco-store, the dingy well by were sparkled—the must have been very fond of Scotch snuff!

The big bell of the City Hall was booming the first iron strokes of twelve as Mr. Wilde stood once more in the vestibule preparing to open his umbrella.

"Going to dinner, Martin?" he asked, as another legal luminary rattled down the stairs.

"Yes, I suppose I shall have time to think of such a thing," returned Mr. Martin.

"They have some capital turtle soup round the corner," said Wilde. "Come round with me, and try it, will you?"

Mr. Martin would certainly; he was not in the habit of declining such invitations, and the two set forth in high spirits. While close behind them glided the woman in brown.

The waiter looked a little surprised as the shabby apparition crept in and took her seat at one end of the long table where Eustace Wilde and his friend, Mr. Martin, had snugly established themselves; but waiters in a down-town restaurant soon cease to be surprised at any thing, and he came briskly forward to take her order.

"Cup o' tea, m'm—rye, m'm. Dry toast and sandwich—stylish, m'm?"

Rather an abstemious meal compared with the dainty fare in which her neighbors were indulging—turtle soup, with flakes of unctuous green fat floating on the surface, roasted woodcocks, garnished with rich amber jelly, a bottle of rose-red claret to finish off with, and a basket of black Hamburg grapes, arranged with superb late peaches.

"Beg your pardon, m'm—you've got the wrong check—this 'ere's yourn!" ejaculated the waiter, as the woman in brown took up the check stamped "66."

She laid it quietly down again: she had discovered all she wanted to know, and moved out of the restaurant as noiselessly as she had entered.

"It's very strange!" said Eustace Wilde, thoughtfully.

"What's strange?" inquired his friend, detaching a black-purple berry from the bunch of grapes on his plate.

"That woman who has just gone out in the faded cloak—did you observe what a delicate white hand she had?"

"She didn't look like one of the white-handed kind," observed Martin, carelessly.

"No; and that's what struck me as being so singular."

And with that Mr. Wilde dismissed the subject from his mind.

Meanwhile the little brown phantom sped swiftly down the next street, fluttered up the long flight of marble stairs, and tapped softly at the door of Eustace Wilde's area office.

"Come in."

Jemmy Stokes was sitting on the corner of the table cutting his initials neatly on the green morocco cover—an operation which he called "keeping office." He looked up rather disdainfully.

"Is—is Mr. Wilde in?"

"Gone to dinner," said Jemmy, laconically. "Be back in twenty minutes. Take care, ma'am—your wet dress'll spoil Mr. Wilde's new office-chair. That'll do, old 'un, if you please!"

"The old one" was a handsome arm-chair whose green leather cushions were scarcely defaced; the "new one" was a superb affair of black walnut and crimson rops, with a movable desk attached to the arm.

"Is that style of chair very expensive?" asked Maggie, meekly, suctioning her head toward it.

"Guess it is!" returned Mr. Stokes, with laudable pride. "Let me see; the bill's here somewhere; it only came this morning. Oh! here it is. Forty-five dollars that 'ere chair cost!"

As the visitor made no comment Jemmy applied himself once more to the cut of the letter S on the morocco leather cover, secretly wondering what loneliness that rusty female could have with the fashionable lawyer his master, while the penetrating eyes under the faded look hit all the object and little accessories of the luxurious office.

Click! click! came a pair of knuckles against the door-panel. Jemmy started like a lightning. Is it was only a half-grown boy, the very counterpart of Mr. James Stokes.

"Here! the books your boss ordered, and the bill."

"Jest you leave 'em," said Jemmy; "Mr. Wilde'll send the money round this afternoon. How much?"

"Twelve dollars fifty cents."

It was a handsome illustrated edition of a popular author, but the visitor dared not linger to look at it. Something something about "rolling again," she withdrew, much to Jemmy Stokes's relief. Nor was she too precipitate in her movements; for as she turned into Broadway her cloak brushed against Eustace Wilde's broadcloth garments.

She hailed a passing stage with one finger of the little white hand that was so incongruous to her rusty dress and misshapen bonnet.

"Quite enough for one day," said the brown phantom to herself as she stood on tiptoe in the stage. "I'll have a little settlement with my host to-night that shall astonish him—rather!"

And she laughed until the shapes danced over her cheeks, all alone by herself in the stage, and circles of drenched idlers ran and driving rain.

She was sitting at her work-table, the brown hair shining like bands of satin, and the neat figure attired in a black silk dress trimmed with delicate bugles, when Eustace came in that night. The table was set in the middle of the room, forming a pretty picture with its bright cut glass and silver chins, and the urn steamed merrily on the tray.

"This looks comfortable," said Eustace Wilde, throwing himself into an easy-chair; "it's a dreary night outside."

"Is it?" said Maggie, innocently.

"My dear, you haven't any idea how dreary," said Mr. Wilde. "That's one of your feminine advantages; we men are forced to battle with the world in all weathers!"

Mrs. Wilde took her seat at the tea-table without remark, but her lips twitched a little at the corners.

"Eustace," she said, when her husband had lighted his evening cigar, and was just taking up an unopened Harper, "I am ready for you to look over my day's housekeeping accounts."

"Ah, very right," said he, approvingly, glancing his eye down the column of petty items. "Bread —vegetables—starch—steaks—total, one dollar, sixty cents. Don't you think, my dear, that we might economize by Bridget's making our bread instead of buying it?"

"Perhaps so," said Mrs. Wilde, smiling. "And now, Eustace, suppose we make a little estimate of your day's expenses?"

Mr. Wilde started at his wife, as if he thought her slightly demented.

"What for?"

"Oh, just to compare our ideas of economy."

"Nonsense!"

"No nonsense at all."

"But I don't remember—I couldn't tell!"

"Perhaps I can assist your memory a little, Sir. For your share of the supper at D——'s and the ride afterward, you paid eight dollars—a package of cigars, ten—a dinner of turtle soup, claret, etc., six. Your two office-shillings—very splendid certainly —was forty-five—your illustrated edition of ——'s werks, twelve dollars and a-half. That amounts, I believe, to eighty-one dollars and fifty cents. Don't think, my dear, you might economize a little?"

Eustace Wilde turned scarlet from his skirt collar to the roots of his hair. Had there been such a thing as a convenient chasm in the floor he must certainly have sunk into it.

"Maggie! are you a witch?"

"No, dear, I am only a woman."

"How the deuce did you know?"

"I found out," said Maggie, quietly; "I must confess that I had no idea how very expensive business was."

Eustace moved uneasily in his seat.

"I give it up, Maggie," he said; "I'll own you have me there. Be merciful, little woman, and don't show your whiskers. But I do wish I knew how you heard of it."

Maggie smiled. "If this is a specimen of every day's expenses, it's no wonder you can not spare any money for the Soldier's Fund, or——"

"Don't, Maggie!" he pleaded, hurriedly drawing out his purse, and placing it in her hands, "take what you wish, my dear."

"I'll be moderate," said Mrs. Maggie: "I suppose you would like to subscribe at least fifty dollars for the sick soldiers."

"Just whatever you please, my dear," said Eustace, with a grimace.

And from that day to this, whenever Maggie Wilde wants any extra funds, she has but to hint at "daily expenses" and Eustace's pocket-book flies open as if by magic, although he has never yet discovered how she found it out.

The Committee was agreeably surprised at Mr. Wilde's liberality in the matter of the Soldier's Fund; but then the Committee was ignorant of the marvelous victory achieved by the Woman in Brown.

A Startling Fact!

Highly Important to Soldiers.

Statistics show and figures can not lie) that four times as many men die from sickness contracted in camp as are killed in battle. Bowel Complaints, Malaria, Dysentery, and Diarrhœa are the great scourges of a soldier's life. Dr. D. Brandt's Medicinal Flannel Abdominal Supporter is the great safeguard against many sickness, and should be worn by all persons exposed to unhurious diseases. As a preventive of Dysentery, it has proved the best protector of the war." Its peculiar effects are to give strength and vigor to decaying muscular action, and protect the system against colds, which at this season bring on Dysentery, Diarrhœa, &c., &c. They are a valuable auxiliary to the home-made bandage and stomach belt. Thousands have worn them since the war has withheld them. They are endorsed by the highest medical and scientific authority. See Half a Dozen Surgeons, Half a Dozen Americus, &c. Sent free by mail on receipt of price.

No. 1, large size, combining Flannel Supporter and Money Belt, $2 00. No. 2, medium size, same as above, $1 50. No. 3, ditto, small, $1 00. Price of above without pockets, $1 50, $1 25, $1 00. Send your order to

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

The Secretary of the Treasury gives notice that subscriptions will be received for Coupon Treasury Notes, payable three years from Aug. 15th, 1864, with semi-annual interest at the rate of seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum—principal and interest both to be paid in lawful money.

These Notes will be convertible at the option of the holder at maturity, into six per cent. gold-bearing bonds, payable not less than five nor more than twenty years from their date, as the Government may elect. They will be issued in denominations of $50, $100, $500, $1000, and $5000, and subscriptions must be for fifty dollars or some multiple of fifty dollars.

As the Notes draw interest from August 15, persons making deposits subsequent to that date must pay the interest accrued from their date to date of deposit.

Parties depositing twenty-five thousand dollars and upward for these Notes at any one time will be allowed a commission of one quarter of one per cent.

Special Advantages of this Loan.

IT IS A NATIONAL BANKING BASE, offering a higher rate of interest than any other, and the best security. Any savings bank which pays its depositors in U. S. Notes considers that it is paying in the best circulating medium of the country, and it can not pay in any thing better. So for its own assets are either in Government securities or in notes or bonds payable in Government paper.

Convertible into a Six per cent. 5-20 Gold Bond.

In addition to the very liberal interest on the notes for three years, this privilege of conversion is now worth about three per cent. per annum, for the current rate for 5-20 Bonds is not less than nine per cent. premium, and before the war six premium at six per cent. U. S. stocks was ever twenty per cent. It will be seen that the actual profit on this loan, at the present market rate, is not less than ten per cent. per annum.

Its Exemption from State or Municipal Taxation.

But aside from all the advantages we have enumerated, a special Act of Congress exempts all Bonds and Treasury Notes from local taxation. On the average, this exemption is worth about one per cent. per annum, according to the rate of taxation in various parts of the country.

It is believed than no securities offer so great inducements to lenders as those issued by the Government. In all other forms of indebtedness, the faith or ability of private parties, or stock companies, or separate communities, only, is pledged for payment, while the whole property of the country is bonded for the discharge of all the obligations of the United States.

SUBSCRIPTIONS will be received by the Treasurer of the United States at Washington, the several Assistant Treasurers and designated Depositaries, and by all National Banks which are depositaries of public money, and

ALL RESPECTABLE BANKERS AND BANKING HOUSES throughout the country will give further information and AFFORD EVERY FACILITY TO SUBSCRIBERS.

FAIRLY WON.

BRAVE Sherman! here, to many a soul,
Those glorious words of thine,
"Atlanta's ours, and fairly won."
Come like a draught of wine.
The doubting spirit gains new faith,
And echoes back, "Right nobly done,
Atlanta's ours, and fairly won."

The nation's heart bents quick to hear
The double deadly blow,
Striking at once the rebel armed
And the secret traitor foe.
Bright shines again the Northern sun,
"Atlanta's ours, and fairly won."

Let this for ages be our cry,
In battle or in civil strife,
Whether with pen, or word, or sword,
We fight the fight of life.
We'll hand it down from sire to son,
"The victory's ours, and fairly won."

In coming years, when smiling fields
And sheaves of yellow grain,
When Commerce, Arts, and Industry
Surround us once again,
May we proclaim with head erect,
Fearful of naught, denied by none,
That "Peace is ours, and fairly won."

PEACE THROUGH VICTORY.

UPON pages 616 and 617 we print another picture by THOMAS NAST, who drew "Compromise with the South." Like that it tells its own story—Peace comes by victory, not by submission, nor by "an immediate cessation of hostilities." The triumph of the people over their enemies is the dawn of universal peace; the prison doors are opened and the captives go free; they close only upon traitors who have struck at the national heart. The soldier and sailor return to the loved ones who welcome them from a field of victory and honor, not of "armistice" and armed truce; the slave raises his head as a man; and wide-waving plenty and ripening summer overspreads the land, while in his solemn joy the patriot beholds in imagination every part of the land united, happy, and free. Our friend the artist has already shown us in all its abject woe what compromise means. He now reveals the radiant form of Peace by the steady prosecution of the war, by Victory, Union, and Liberty.

The admirable picture by MR. NAST in the Weekly of September 3 is an unanswerable argument. There will be no better in the campaign. The following stirring letter from a soldier is one expression of the universal satisfaction of loyal men with its simple truthfulness. The earnest protest of our correspondent against the craven platform at Chicago is the voice of the army. He and all his companions in arms need have no fear that their country will desert them, or believe, while a single rebel remains in the field, that "the experiment of war has failed."

HEAD-QUARTERS CAVALRY, WEST VIRGINIA,
September, 1864.

Editor Harper's Weekly:

God bless you for the high and noble patriotism and loyalty of your sheet!

I can not restrain the exclamation that comes up from my heart on looking at your splendidly-designed engraving in the number for September 3 of "Compromise with the South." I hope it will stir the blood of every Northern heart, as it fires that of every soldier who has fought through these terrible three years of slaughter begun by the fratricidal and murderous South. It would be impossible to depict more perfectly and feelingly what "Compromise with the South" means.

Allow me to say that as one but a soldier, who has suffered and bled at the hands of those vile traitors, can fully appreciate your noble picture. It deserves to be hung in a frame of gold on the walls of every household in the North. Oh, that those cowards at the North who desire "peace at any price" could be kept with one spark of the high and self-sacrificing spirit that animates the army! We who risk most and suffer most by the war desire no peace till every black and crime-stained traitor heart is crushed in the dust, and every soul of future treason and rebellion annihilated.

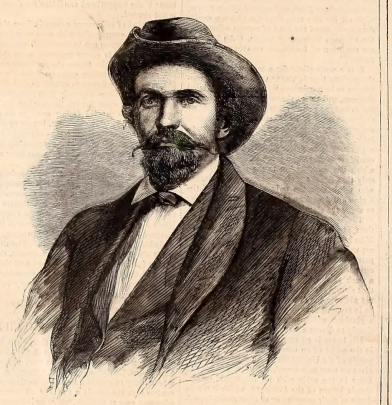
Accept the assurance that the army appreciates and honors you for the grand loyalty that your paper has always exhibited. YOURS OVER, in upholding the old flag.

A SOLDIER OF THE REPUBLIC.



THE LATE REBEL GENERAL JOHN MORGAN.

JOHN MORGAN.

THE late rebel General JOHN MORGAN, the most noted guerrilla leader of this war, was a native of Kentucky. When the war broke out he was a planter with considerable means; but he left his plantation and joined the Confederate army, when he was attached to General HARDEE's division. After the capture of Nashville by the Federals, in the spring of 1862, he was left by General JOHNSTON on the opposite side of the Cumberland, to watch the movements of BUELL's army. He did not, however, confine himself to regular operations of this nature, but gathered about him a set of adventurous young Kentuckians, whom he led in a series of predatory operations against railroads, supply-trains, and loyal citizens.

In the summer of 1863 MORGAN made a raid into Ohio, which terminated in his capture. With 28 of his command he was placed in the Ohio Penitentiary. He afterward escaped by means of a tunnel, and was promoted to a brigadier-generalship. The following are the incidents of his capture and death: MORGAN was on a reconnoissance near Greenville, in East Tennessee, September 4, and was lodging at an inviting house near the village. This house happened to be the residence of Mrs. WILLIAMS, whose husband is an officer on General BURNSIDE's staff. When MORGAN was asleep MRS. WILLIAMS procured a horse, rode fifteen miles, and returned with a company of Union soldiers. As they arrived at the house MORGAN had just awoke. He drew his revolver and undertook to escape, when he was fired upon and killed.

THE REBEL TORPEDO BOAT.

WE give below a sketch of the rebel torpedo boat which was designed to do so much injury to FARRAGUT's fleet. FARRAGUT, while outside of the Bay, was in continual expectation of a visit from this boat, of which he had accurate information. She attempted to get out, but lost her reckoning, and the adventurers on board becoming frightened, dropped their torpedo, as it impeded their progress, and made their way back into the Bay again. After that, rough weather delayed the proposed expedition, and at last it was found that the boiler was not trust-worthy. She was sent to the city for a new one. Returning to Fort Morgan the new boiler exploded, killing the three men who managed her and sinking the vessel. The boat was made of wood, covered with sheathing of one-fourth inch iron. Her length was 36 feet, and her diameter 7 feet. The boat will be repaired for the use of the Federal fleet.

THE SITUATION.

Slow fades the summer in the leaf,
With steady pace the autumn comes,
And still our thundering pulses time
With bugle-note and roll of drums.

Still waves our starry flag on high
Its greeting to the broad blue dome,
And still we gather 'neath its folds
In spits of treacherous foes at home.

We heed no offerings of a Peace
That clouds the honor of our land;
Our hands will never yield the sword
Till firmly based the Right shall stand.

The giant cataract echoed loud
The calm reply our ruler gave:
"Restore the Union of the States
And then the fetters of the slave!"

Ah, not till then may battle cease,
Though thick the rain of blood and tears;
This sacred baptism of fire
Must purify the stains of years.

It was by blood the land was bought,
The precious blood which patriots give
To win the birth-right of mankind;
It is through blood that we shall live.

As Abraham, known in days of old,
Offered up Isaac in God's eyes;
Our land, the mother of us all,
Offers her sons a SACRIFICE.

On Southern slopes their graves are green,
No war-cloud ever their tranquil sleep;
Theirs is a rest forever sealed,
Whether the Nation smile or weep.

Oh, let it not be all in vain
That these have died! The smoke-stained sky
Is ringing with the cry of "Peace!"
And men proclaim the end is nigh.

Oh, God of battles, hear our prayer
Above this wild and stormy din,
And grant that ere the leaves shall fall
Freedom and Peace be ushered in!

TO —.

NAY, not so, dearest! Look into my eyes,
Giving the search its clearest, amplest range;
Look in my heart, and see if there arise
In all its palpitations, new or strange,
One pulse of doubt, or smallest sign of change!
We have come hence the common road along,
And earn the common lot: for we have seen
Some lights go out, and darkness fill the way,
And even then, our hearts so full of song,
Sang to each other, as we passed between
The storm and cloud-drifts of the waiting day.
Think you such love could its dear object wrong?
I have the answer as I give thee mine;
Yet all I can bestow, how mean compared with thine!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

M'CLELLAN'S LETTER.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN may be a good rider, but it requires an extraordinary exercise of the skill of the most accomplished equestrian simultaneously to ride two horses going different ways. The chance is that he will fall between the two. His letter of acceptance is a worthy conclusion to the ignominious performance at Chicago. It is confused and verbose: wanting both the manly directness of the soldier and the moral conviction of the patriot.

He begins by saying that the nomination was "unsought," and that the Convention knew it. If it did, it had a monopoly of the knowledge; for if there has been one fact perfectly evident in our late history, it is that General M'CLELLAN, from the time he was placed in command of the Army of the Potomac, has under careful advice and management, been aiming at this nomination. His remark is entirely superfluous, and shakes at the very beginning the confidence of every reader.

He announces in almost every sentence his devoted love of the Union; but the platform upon which he stands was the work of VALLANDIGHAM, who proposed in Congress to divide the Union into quarters.

He declares that the war ought to have been prosecuted only to maintain the Union. No man knows better than he that it never has been prosecuted for any other purpose, nor has any authorized person ever announced any other. When General M'CLELLAN bagged the entire Legislature of Maryland it was done to maintain the Union. When his friend VALLANDIGHAM was arrested it was for the same purpose. When the emancipation proclamation was issued it was to the same result.

He says that if the war had been waged for the Union only—and not, for instance, against the Maryland Legislature—"the work of reconciliation would have been easy." Easy! After Bull Run, for instance! This sentence is ludicrous, as showing General M'CLELLAN'S profound ignorance of the causes and scope of this war; an ignorance manifested in every political paper he has ever issued, including his letter favoring Judge WOODWARD'S election in Pennsylvania, an event openly desired by the rebels.

He says that when "our present adversaries"—meaning the rebels—clearly want peace "upon the basis of the Union," they ought to have it. Yes, and they will have it. The only basis of peace is the Constitution. When the rebels submit to that, they will have peace of course. Nobody ever said otherwise, except those who nominated General M'CLELLAN.

He says:

> "We should exhaust all the resources of statesmanship practised by civilized nations, and fought by the traditions of the American people, consistent with the honor and interests of the country to secure such peace, re-establish the Union, and guarantee for the future the constitutional rights of every State. The Union is the one condition of peace—we ask no more.
> * * *
> "If a frank, earnest, and persistent effort to obtain those objects should fail, the responsibility for ulterior consequences will fall upon those who remain in arms against the Union. But the Union must be preserved at all hazards."

The Government of the United States, with the aid of Generals GRANT and SHERMAN, and SHERIDAN and CANBY, and Admirals FARRAGUT, PORTER, and Captain WINSLOW, is making exactly that frank, earnest, and persistent effort for peace. The President is preserving the Union at all hazards. Why, then, does General M'CLELLAN oppose him? Why does he not assist those frank and earnest efforts? Or, after all his fine talk, does the Chicago candidate really mean the kind of earnest efforts that the Chicago Convention meant, "An immediate cessation of hostilities, or other peaceable means?"

It is a sorry plight for a man who once held the position that M'CLELLAN did in public confidence to be nominated by the party of national disgrace, and then exhaust his ingenuity in trying to feign so as not to appear to be aware of their opinion. If he is conscious that he does not represent their views, why not say so manfully. To accept their nomination upon so plain a platform is to declare himself, as he is, the candidate of those who made it, and of the party which has no objection to the Union provided only that Southern slaveholders control it. But who think that the only real enemies of the Union are American citizens who are unwilling to allow the slaveholders to overrule the laws.

The Chicago political platform is a far worse than his military. As usual, he is too late. If he had instantly kicked over the platform the act would have been manly. Even now the manly patriotism that would have helped him in the estimation of all honest citizens. But to devote a week to the vain effort of saying something that should appease one party and conciliate and not alienate the other, and while he seemed to be in favor of the war yet to agree to stand upon a platform which, practically, opposes it, was simply to devote a week to his own defeat.

His letter is an attempt at political juggling in the midst of an earnest war. But the loyal people of the United States were not to be fooled. It gives an uncertain sound. They will weigh this letter in the scale with all the frank, manly, simple letters of the President, which leave no doubt of their meaning or of their author's position, and the juggling letter will be found wanting. They will compare it with the calm and earnest letters of General GRANT and SHERMAN and SEYMOUR and HAZEN and LOGAN, and will leave its writer among those whom of all American citizens he has chosen for friends, those for whose success the rebel chieftains pray.

THE STATE NOMINATIONS.

THE Union State nominations have been made. RUBEN E. FENTON of Chautauqua is the candidate for Governor, and THOMAS G. ALVORD of Onondaga for Lieutenant-Governor. Both those gentlemen are Free-Soil Democrats and both are unconditional Union men. They are not in favor of an armistice to ask Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS upon what terms he will agree that the Government of the United States to continue. They are not in favor of sending word to SHERMAN and FARRAGUT, to CANBY and SHERIDAN, with the message that the Union, that the war is a failure. They are not in favor of declaring that General GRANT is whipped because he holds the Weldon Railroad. They are not in favor of the assertion that the American people are lily-livered cowards, and unable to maintain their own government. Every man in the State who agrees with them will of course work and vote for them.

The resolutions of the Convention repeat those at Baltimore, and as before, for the issue throughout the country is substantially the same. The Governor of New York must be a man heartily in accord with the Administration, and sincerely desirous of the welfare of the country. The present Governor of the State is a magistrate dear to the rebel heart. He is a magistrate who does not hesitate to charge the responsibility of the rebellion upon the loyal States and people. He is a magistrate who declared publicly that if the Union could not be saved without emancipation the Union should be dissolved. Finally, he is the magistrate who calls the worst criminals "my friends," and who was President of the Convention which proposes to submit to the rebels. This is not the kind of chief magistrate that New York requires at this time. That officer must believe in the fundamental American doctrine of equal rights and fair play; in an unconditional Union; in the submission of armed rebels to the Constitution and the laws; in the national supremacy.

Mr. FENTON and Mr. ALVORD are unswervingly true to these cardinal points; while the extent and duration of their public services have given them each large experience and a wide familiarity with men and affairs.

Every national success in the field strengthens the Union ticket in the State as it does in the country. Is there any argument enough for every honest patriot? Principles need no explanation when the triumph of the national arms confirm them. That fact alone shows those principles to be national and the candidates who represent them to be men who agree with GRANT and FARRAGUT, with SHERMAN and PORTER, and with the vast majority of the American people.

COPPERHEAD THREATS.

THAT to their belief that the American people are conquered by the rebels, and are craven enough to ask for terms, the Copperhead orators and papers hope to frighten those people still more by threatening them with civil war at home if the Copperhead candidate for President is not elected.

This kind of talk comes naturally from those who wish to compromise with men who began civil war four years ago because their candidate was defeated. It comes naturally from those who believe that the States are sovereign powers, and that, therefore, citizens of the United States can not be forced to submit to their Government. It comes naturally from those whose reliance is not upon the intelligence but the ignorance of the people; from those who do not prevail by reasonable argument, but by appeals to the basest passions. It comes naturally from a "Conservatism" which burns orphan asylums and massacres men because they are poor and defenceless.

But those gentry sadly deceive themselves if they suppose the loyal people of this country are so deeply sunken in degradation as to surrender their right of liberty, freely to say threats of this kind. It is precisely because the Copperheads are capable of using such menaces in a political contest that they will find themselves excluded from power by the people. For there is not a fool in the land who does not see, that, if they threaten violence when they find themselves in the minority, there is no enormity of which they might not be guilty if they found themselves actually in the majority.

THE CHICAGO PEACE-RECIPE.

THE Chicago Doctors tell us that, since it is proved we are beaten, we must ask the victors for an armistice, with a view to "an ultimate Convention." But upon what terms are the rebels likely to grant an armistice to those who confess that the war is a failure? When one adversary says to another, whom he is throttling while his knee is on his breast, "There, I see I can not whip you, now let's stop and talk"—what happens? The man who is under knows perfectly well that his only chance is to get his feet. So he has only to say, "Take your hand out of my throat, and your knee off my breast, and we'll see about it."

That is the first step. We must recall our armies and navies. The enemy frankly says that before we ask him. The armistice and immediate cessation of hostilities means the withdrawal of our forces. Are we sunk to that?

But if we are, if we go so far, what is the next step? "An ultimate Convention," reply the Chicago Doctors. But a convention for what? If it is proposed to change the Constitution, no convention is lawful which is not summoned by two-thirds of all the States, and they can not summon it but by taking the oath to the Constitution. There is no need of our offering an "immediate cessation of hostilities" to effect this result. The moment that the rebels lay down their arms and return to their loyalty, and constitutionally propose a convention, we know of no party that will oppose it. But this "ultimate convention" is no method of settling the rebellion, because the rebellion must be settled before the Convention is possible.

Now the real meaning of this talk about "an ultimate convention" is apparent enough from a remark in one of the most violent M'CLELLAN papers, that "we could not expect the South to come to a convention pledged in advance to accept the result." In other words, "if the South," or the rebels, having taken an oath of fidelity to the Union so as to be able to hold a convention at all, really prefer themselves, and plunge into fresh war if they did not like the action of the convention. And the paper which makes this extraordinary statement also assumes that both sides would come into the Convention armed! In other words, that GRANT, FARRAGUT, and SHERMAN should remain just where they are, but should refrain from further demonstrations until the rebels had decided what terms they would offer us, and we had accepted or rejected them!

To any such ridiculous suggestion DAVIS would, of course, reply, "If you men of Chicago believe what you say, that you can not do what you have undertaken to do, take away your armies. You concede that the experiment of war has failed, and, therefore, whatever happens, you have no farther need of soldiers." When we had done what he commanded he would add: "And now you want a convention. Well for I To restore the Union which I spit upon, and which you confess you can't maintain by arms? Do you think I am going to give to bankrupt what I would not give to conquerors, and, yield to M'CLELLAN'S palaver what I refused to FARRAGUT'S batteries? We rebels fought to dissolve the Union. You fought to retain it. You confess yourselves beaten. Do you suppose we love the Union any more dearly because you have shed our blood and desolated our lands? We despise the lot of you, and especially those who insist upon licking the boots that kick them." And so "not being pledged in advance to accept the result," but being pledged exactly not to accept it, JEFF DAVIS and Company would depart to their own place.

This is the peace-recipe of the Chicago Doctors. Are faithful citizens of the United States ready for such tragical tomfoolery? This is what one of his sycophants calls "the strangely mature statesmanship" of General M'CLELLAN. Would not statesmanship a little less "strange" serve our purpose at this juncture? Is not the practice of DAVID GRAHAM, SHERMAN, FARRAGUT, SHERIDAN, PORTER, and CANBY somewhat more consistent with the character and purposes of the loyal American people than this of DOCTOR M'CLELLAN and VALLANDIGHAM, and the Chicago school?

"CONSERVATIVE" RIBALDRY.

IF any of our readers are really wondering which is the "Conservative" party in this election; which candidates a peaceable, thoughtful, self-respecting citizen ought to vote for, let him look over the following list of epithets applied to the Constitutional President of the United States by the men who obstreperously vociferate that they are "Conservative." Is this the spirit of that wise Conservatism which every good citizen respects? Is there any partisan ribaldry so disgusting since the Aurora bespattered General WASHINGTON with invective? These are the terms applied by the friends of General M'CLELLAN to the President:

> Filthy Story-Teller, Ignoramus Abe, Despot, Old Scoundrel, Big Secessionist, Perjurer, Liar, Robber, Thief, Swindler, Braggart, Boaster, Buffoon, Fiend, Usurper, Butcher, Monster, Land-Pirate, A Long, Lean, Lank, Lazy, Lawless, Cowardly, High-Cheeked-Boned Spavined Rail-Splitting Stallion.

IF the party whose orators and papers incessantly speak of the President of the United States in such terms, a party to which the Government of this country should be intrusted?

THE CHICAGO KEY-NOTE.

A DR. ALLEN recently said at a meeting of the "Democratic" club in Washington that we must let the rebels go, if we could not agree upon the terms of their return. DR. ALLEN is probably a young man. AMOS KENDALL is not. AMOS KENDALL is old enough to have been Postmaster-General thirty years ago, and to have authorized the robbing of the mails. (Instructions to the Postmaster at Charleston in 1835.) AMOS KENDALL is old enough to know that all things should not be said at all times; and that if you are trying to drive pigs to Kilkarney you must insist that they are going to Cork. So AMOS KENDALL, who presided at the meeting which nominated M'CLELLAN, remarked to the young man substantially: "Don't say that. That is what the minions of the despot LINCOLN wish us to say, for that is bald disunion. Let us first elect our men (M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON), and then we can do whatever is practicable."

THIS says one of the most belligerent "peace" papers, "gives the true key-note to the Democratic music." Of course it does, for the tune is disunion.

THE SOLDIERS' VIEW.

THE New York Secretary of State has sent the blank ballots to the army for the New York soldiers. Those soldiers will not be likely to forget that the Union candidate for Governor of the State, RUBEN E. FENTON, is the able and efficient and devoted Chairman of the National Committee for the relief of sick and wounded soldiers. He does not believe, nor has he ever believed, that the war was a failure, and that the imperial State ought to ask pardon of rebels; nor that the triumphs of SHERMAN, and FARRAGUT, and the deadly grip of GRANT, are reasons for asking "an immediate cessation of hostilities."

"AT ALL HAZARDS."

GENERAL MCCLELLAN, in accepting the nomination of a Convention which says that the war has failed and that there must be an immediate cessation of hostilities to arrange a peace, declares, with a fine flourish, that the Union must be preserved at all hazards. His friend, HOWARD STEVENS, the President of the Convention, differs from him. Mr. STEVENS says that if the Union can be preserved only by emancipation, then to save Slavery the Union must go.

YET MR. STEVENS will vote for GENERAL MCCLELLAN. Does not that fact give us a glimpse behind the scenes?

MR. STEVENS further says that the candidate is the representative of principles. Of what principles? Clearly of those who nominated him.

Will every Union man weigh these facts?

A SHOT FROM FARRAGUT.

In his dispatch to Commodore PALMER, at New Orleans, Admiral FARRAGUT says: "Congratulate the Gulf squad commanding.... Nothing could have been more harmonious than our combined operations. We had no ambition to excel each other but in the destruction of the enemy's works."

Are not these timely words for dissatisfied Union men to ponder? Ought we to have any other object than the destruction of the enemy's works at Chicago and elsewhere, and the defeat of all their Generals commanding?

THE PRESIDENT.

THE great service that the President has done for this country and for civilization has been often considered in these columns. But we commend to the careful attention of our readers the following thoughtful little essay, which foretells what we believe will be the verdict of history:

When a ship, after a long and tedious voyage, is met by head-winds and unfavorable currents as the shoreby approaches her destination, a feeling of disappointment and dependency takes possession of the passengers and the crew, and each one attributes to the officers in charge the inevitable and necessary delays and discouragements to which they are exposed. Instead of looking forward to the near and certain land to which they are bound they turn their eyes restlessly backward, and persuade themselves that all the trouble to the port and to the end are owing to the monotony delay from which they are suffering, and which have avoided had a different course been pursued in some previous part of the voyage. A few days, however, usually suffice to change all this. The long wished-for land is sighted, certainty takes the place of disappointed hopes, and they feel with mortification and regret that they have been the victims of a reference every hour and thought has been devoted to their welfare, and for a length of time which, though long, and with a prosperous voyage, to the end of their journey. Long after every trace of the hardships of the voyage from their minds they remember and long to recall the unreasonable and unjust accusations that a moment of impatience caused them to utter toward one to whom their safe return home was in so large a measure due.

In just such a situation do we find ourselves at the present time. The voyage is nearly over; we can almost feel the land-breeze wafting over the waters, and see the white fluttering ground as; our charts and our observations all give us assurance that we are near the end of our journey; but because we can not see the land and put our feet upon it, we are disposed to be anxious and captious, and to lay blame on the officers and Virginian leader. We are not reasonably and more just. Let us remember how upright and courageous our President has been in the dark and stormy days we have passed through. How manfully and persistently he has met disaster and defeat, always hopeful and always calm in the midst of this grandest and direst trials.

It is not of so great importance to Mr. LINCOLN's future fame that he should or should not be elected President for another term. His great record is written, and can never be effaced. But it is first needful we say for the sake of our great trouble, and, let us hope, free forever from the invidious fame of the traitor. But when both sides in this war history and tradition repeat beside every fireside in the land the trials and the dangers and the sufferings of the most faithful and noble veteran, then it will be said: "And he, too, never faltered: he marched with us side by side: he believed in the cause as many desperately, but he gave his support and untiring and resolute as We and he worked together with all their might to preserve the Union at the cost from our national honor; and if we deserve any credit for the part we took in restoring our land to the arts of peace and justice, he with us shall ever receive a common share."

This is a fame which no station or absence of station can add to or diminish. His work, like that of the most obscure soldier who fought his hard fight and died at Gettysburg or Antietam, has been done, and faithfully done, and out of such acts destiny or providence can create its honor. Faithful and consecrated to the service of his country, he mistrusts, though it were as nameless to this day as any one of the unknown who sleep in our hospitals, will live, theirs, he went in the heart of every true American to whom the homeless hardships of the land keep up the tradition of a good citizen. So manly and modest a character, so faithful to every trust reposed in him and so generous, with a sagacity so eminent, and exercised with so much intelligence and such an absence of guile that his strongest opponent and those of every party have no an atom with as to see him rejected in the position of influence he has occupied for some months past.

The discontinuance of power does not imply with him cessation of duty. To his successor, whoever he may be, and whenever he may come, we can only say, "Walk in honesty in the steps we have set, and you can not, and you will not in the end, fail of the support of all loyal men. Think as much of the humblest soldier as of the most distinguished general; be at all to be the servant of the people citizen as to three of the most importunate suitor; be slow to come to a decision, and slower to change from it; dare to be unpopular in the performance of imperative duty; act on a single of calm confidence and religious trust in the hour of gloom and despondency; and you, like him, shall have it written on your tombstone and on the heart of the whole free countryman: He, too, was true to be an American citizen.

It is not our duties in these lines to urge the merits of party considerations or of partisan success. Our appeal is to higher and nobler motives. Let us strive to recall and to cherish the remembrance of his long and faithful services, with gratitude with all the highest and best purposes which have actuated our country in the great and earnest struggle in which we are engaged. Let us aim to imitate his unfaltering tenacity of purpose in the attainment for our country of a permanent Union and liberty, worthy of the traditions into which we were born; that, indeed, the question of who is to be our next President will be one which we need not consider with solicitude; while by such thoughts and such purposes we shall have done all that in us lies to help the people are able to bestow upon one who has earned so great a claim upon our respect and our gratitude.

WANTED, A LITTLE GOOD SENSE.

ANOTHER friend writes: "The party that went for peace at Chicago has gone to pieces at Atlanta. But the want of practical good sense on the part of some of our friends pains me. The real question at issue is so plain that the importance of solving it correctly so immense, that I am surprised after at the confusion of mind and the utter perversion of the state assumed by those who are most deeply interested in the result. Even if MR. LINCOLN were not, as I believe, the best candidate, is he now the only possible one for the Union party? and surely, such being the case, personal preferences should be entirely suppressed by the disposable evil to which their indulgence may lead."

A WORD IN SEASON.

GENERAL DIX has written the following letter to MR. WARD HUNT, who had asked to be allowed to use the General's name as a candidate for Governor of New York:

"HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE EAST,
NEW YORK CITY, Sept. 8, 1864.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I have the highest opinion of the 3d instant, and thank you for your kind suggestion. I have no desire whatever for the nomination for Governor it it were tendered to me. I am not, for that reason, the less earnest in my desire that all the power which under the Government in its efforts to put down the rebellion—an object to be effected, in my judgment, by a steady and unwavering prosecution of the war.

"I am, my dear Sir, truly yours,
"JOHN A. DIX."

General DIX favors "a steady and unwavering prosecution of the war," not "an immediate cessation of hostilities."

THE VOICE OF "A MAN."

HON. ISAAC N. ARNOLD, for the last four years representative in Congress from the Chicago District, recently withdrew as a candidate for re-election in consequence of a strong contest among the Union men. His wife is dignified and manly letter, concluding as follows, in words and in a spirit which we commend to the whole of the Union ranks who are disposed to indulge their personal grief:

"In my judgment the next ninety days will decide the fate of our country. Disgusted with the war for many he, it will really be a contest between war for liberty and the Union and a humiliating peace. It will be a contest between patriotism and selfishness between statesmanship and between brute loyalty and sympathy with traitors. I need scarcely tell my friends that in this struggle for MR. LINCOLN will not be lessened, and that I shall labor, as heretofore, for the triumph of the principles and the restoration of the Union on the basis of liberty to all."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE MILITARY SITUATION.

THE armies of the Potomac and James in any period of the war been so favorably situated as they are to-day. Not only is the morale of the troops higher than it ever has army rendered, by the judicious disposition of the Federal forces in Virginia and Maryland, but the forces themselves with reinforcements poured every day by thousands into the Federal armies, while every day increases the diminution of the rebel armies both by desertion and the incessant attrition of war, the territory of our national Government over this shameful rebellion can not be far distant. According to the rebel papers the rebel armies increase by desertions amount to one regiment per day. Every rebel prisoner tells the fact of desertion, and tells it with every increasing ratio the number of these desertions. General Grant, in order to prevent the escape of rebel troops, has issued a proclamation assuring them that they would be compelled to enter the Federal service, but would receive free transportation to any point within our lines. The proclamation has produced the desired effect, and there is the disposition on the part of the Chicago Democratic party to use it to the disadvantage of the national Government.

GRANT AND SHERIDAN.

There is no important information from the Army of the Potomac. There is every reason to believe that LEE's army is behind his intrenchments at Richmond and Petersburg in the lowest possible limit in order to render Early master of the situation in the valley of Virginia. The only striking advantage of this depletion in his immediate front, however, is that he has been enabled to send off to Early a reinforced treachery. At the same time the Federal army in the Valley was receiving reinforcements, but early has was obliged to take the defensive. At one time we have seen, he is threatening Washington; at another he is said that Early is reinforcing LEE; but in neither case is there any serious fear. The movement of troops to and fro on the 22 there has been no action of importance in the Valley. On the 19th there was a cavalry skirmish between advance trains of 30 wagons, filled with wounded.

SHERIDAN'S DISPATCH.

The following letter from General Sherman gives the details of the capture of ATLANTA, September 1.

"GENERAL: I have the honor, pursuant to your letter of the War Department had been fully advised, I left the Twentieth Corps at the Chattahoochee river, and with the Fourteenth and Twenty-third moved from the right, beginning some considerable strike at the rear of the enemy's position. On reaching South, reached the West Point Railroad near Fairburn on the 27th, and began destroying it for miles at a time, and on the 28th struck and effectually broke the Macon Railroad near Jonesborough, and 10½ miles south and Rough and Ready. The enemy attacked that night with the Army of the Tennessee, and were completely beaten. On the 30th, after destroying the railroad, I pushed the left of the line entirely to the railroad above, between Rough and Ready and Jonesborough.

"The enemy, finding that I had destroyed the railroad in his rear, and that I was between him and Atlanta, with the Army of the Tennessee, and turned on the enemy at Jonesborough, attacked him and his lines, and carried them, capturing one brigade General Govan's and 12 guns, and driving eight more and much plunder. Night alone prevented our capturing all of Hardee's corps, which escaped south that night.

"That same night, Hood, in Atlanta, finding all his railroads broken and in our possession, blew up his ammunition, seven locomotives and eighty cars, and evacuated Atlanta, which, on the next day, September 2, was occupied by the corps left for that purpose, Major-General Slocum commanding, following the retreating rebel army to near Lovejoy's station, thirty miles south of Atlanta, when, finding his enemy intrenched, I concluded it would not 'pay' to assault as we already had the great object of the campaign, viz., Atlanta, accomplished army gradually and leisurely returned to Atlanta; and it is now encamped eight miles each side of the city, and to-morrow will move to the camps appointed. I am now writing at Atlanta, at which point I can convey in regard to our future action.

"We have as the result of this quick, and, as I think, well-executed movement, 20 guns, over 3000 prisoners, and have buried over 400 rebel dead, and left at least as wounded; they could not be removed.

"The rebels have lost in the series of important city of Atlanta and stores, at least 500 dead, 2500 wounded, and 4000 prisoners, a total of the aggregate loss will not fall 7000.

"If that is not success, I don't know what is.

(Signed) "SHERMAN, Major-General."

It was Hardee's corps, consisting of Cleburne's, Cheatham's and Cleburne's commands, which fought the battle of Jonesborough on the 31st. Pettus's and General Gist's Anderson, Patton, and Cummings were wounded. The capture of Atlanta renders useless any of the rebel attempts on Sherman's communications.

FARRAGUT.

During the siege of Mobile, and up to the surrender of Fort Morgan, about the 23d, we have in all was one ship sunk by a torpedo, one burned through infraction of orders, and one lost from the same cause. Several of whom were killed or drowning or the fire of the enemy. On the other hand, we took from the rebels 1464 prisoners, and from the surrenders of the enemy, forced them to burn the gun-boat Gaines, and the iron-clad Tuscaloosa, and destroy the construction. Three forts, with one hundred guns of heavy calibre, and large quantities of ordnance and ammunition rendered to us.

The rebel gun-boat Morgan escaped to Mobile, and the gun-boat Florida was blown up to prevent her falling into our hands. The rebel iron-clad ram Tennessee surrendered more than any other vessel; Commander J. R. Mudsay lost his left arm. The day after the surrender of Admiral Fort Morgan a torpedo was accidentally exploded in the breach, killing the wife of the gunner of the ram. Lieutenant, killed two of General Granger's men, and took off both arms of one of General Granger's men.

The pilot of the Hartford was wounded. Admiral Buchanan was dying when the surrender to here his ram. Commander Murphy of the Selma was wounded and doing well. Commander Craven, Executive of the rebel ram Tennessee was in the hospital at Pensacola. The executive officer of the Tennessee, Lieutenant Read, is a prisoner on the United States frigate Potomac.

THE STATE CONVENTION.

The Union State Convention met at Syracuse on the 7th of September. Hon. Reuben E. Fenton was nominated for Governor, and Thurlow Weed, Lieutenant-Governor, for Lieutenant-Governor. Horace Greeley and Preston King were appointed Electors at large.

THE ELECTION IN MAINE.

The election in Maine September 12 resulted in the choice of Governor, Congressmen, and Electors by a majority. The Union majority is 20,000, a large gain upon that of last year.

ITEMS.

Brigadier-General J. E. Mower has been promoted to a Major-Generalship.

The Government has no apprehension of difficulty with England or France on account of the pirate Alabama, notwithstanding she had been sold to Portugal. It is a well-settled principle of international maritime law, that belligerents vessels shall not be transferred from neutral ports during hostilities, except by public auction.

At the municipal election in Baltimore, September 6, the Union ticket received a large majority, electing every candidate in every Ward.

The Democratic State Convention of Illinois was held in Springfield September 6. Hon. James C. Robinson was nominated for Governor, and Hon. Gustavus Koerner, for Lieutenant-Governor.

Lieutenant-Colonel Egan, Fourteenth New York, has been appointed Brigadier-General for bravery in the field, on General Grant's recommendation.

INTERESTING ITEMS.

THE OLD STYLE AND THE NEW.—The year used to be reckoned to contain 365 days 6 hours; but, strictly speaking, they were only 365 days, 5 hours, 49 minutes, and 12 seconds. In 1582 there were eleven days over, and by Act of Parliament, in the reign of George II., they were struck out, and the true motion made to agree. The new style is called the Gregorian, from Gregory, who was Pope of Rome, and the old style the Julian, from JULIUS CÆSAR, who established it as the year 1582, when the change was made, was in the 17th century of the 19th, and ten days were dropped. The Russians adopted the new system in the 18th, and the colonies of Russia, making the style, as it were, and hence the expression "dating by the year, or by-year." A by-year is a year that divides equally by four, and, consequently, in the present year is a by-year, when any leaden who feel disposed to do so may propose, and have the right to "pop the question." In England, until 1752, we began the year at the vernal equinox. It make about the year with those of other nations, between January and Lady-day. The Jews reckon from the 1st of January, 5728 the bottom date being that from January the 1st, 1868 the upper from the vernal equinox, March 25. The Russians still adhere to the old style.

Joy is of itself worth something, if only that it creates out something to give to those who are heavy hearted and sinks into nothingness.

How much evil arises from sheer opinions of their own works according to their time of life is illustrated by the following anecdote: A gentleman was in the habit of voted to poetry. His house was on fire, and to rouse his guests he exclaimed, "Arise, arise!" He succeeded in rescue his manuscripts, but ten years after he condemned to flames the very poems which he had risked his life to preserve.

THE following anecdote furnishes a good suggestion to clergymen who are troubled with sleepy or inattentive audiences: At a public meeting held at Antwerp a few years ago, a preacher was asked to pray. The request received with such clamor by some of the persons that he could not obtain a hearing. He accordingly left the room, produced a pack of cards, and asked one of his neighbors to join him in a game of piquet, which he commenced. This humorous expedient had the effect of instantaneously obtaining his audience.

THE Montreal Herald describes a horrible scene which was recently witnessed in Canada. On the occasion of the execution of BOUCHER, the wretch, the terrors spreading with great rapidity. The priest endeavored to prevent them from leaving the church, but in vain. The panic was difficulty received. The women could not be restrained, and they fled, shrieking with terror. The priest implored: "Mon Dieu, aucune sauve! aucune sauve!" To crowd was impossible. Men, women, and children who were spectators of the scene fell on their knees, praying the Almighty to pity her.

On the topmost step of a fragile ladder were the feet of the Rev. M. Barnabe, with head erect to meet her God, imploring the poor creature to prepare to meet her God. Then, at the foot of the ladder, the dying creature the last consolation of the Church. "Give it war-cousin," she said, "to my husband and to the poor girl left back to be mother heart-broken." But neither of these were seen or heard from the scaffold. Confusion, as doubt, ensued, every one fled, and three women had been crushed for destroying a newly-born infant.

TOBACCO became fashionable through Sir Walter Raleigh, but by the curious he took in smoking it privately it is clear he did not with to have the custom imitated. But sitting one day with a pipe in his mouth, he inadvertently called for some small-beer. The fellow coming into the room threw all the liquor into his master's face, and running down stairs called out, "Help! help! Sir Walter has studied till his head is on fire, and the smoke bursts out at his mouth and nose."

ANECDOTE, peregrinary fairs are bullies, and those who keep company with them are apt to get a bullying habit of mind.

YOUNGUN, in his "Diver Anything," gave the following hints to persons who are too tenderly inclined to gun-fishing: "In the first place, if a dead the trout soon perceives, and will have nothing to do with it, but if you can make it to be copietion. Cut up a trout, and throw it in small pieces. Time, not less than two hours, is enough to do this. Blow midge-like going into a second and stomach ten thousand and tainters, you find this to be the best bait. If you are to take your fly or minnow out of the water and then return to the same hole, and bait him, and need a million more of flies and small fish, each life as precious as your own. But the shrouds of a trout of three pounds has upon his neck ten cetacean than at the first, as the fish exited it this time with great precision, and you can run and be landed with the first bait—hooks, gut, worms, and all—hanging to his gills.

THE murder of Mr. Briggs on the Great Northern Railway by Rush, and the manner to have escaped, English people over-nervous. A few days ago a Duke was travelling by train, and, after proceeding some little distance, when at an intervening station another passenger got in. In a hurry. He sounded all his powerful lungs that he was one passenger in the carriage than he called out pretty loudly, "Guard, guard, guard!" On the train, however, started immediately, and the stranger dropped into his seat, looking very unpleasantly surprised, and stared at length to say, "It's rather an awkward thing travelling alone with a man with a pistol." The Duke, whose fresh and open countenance might satisfy the most suspicious, reprimanded the man, but did not leave the attention of it for fairly might, and replied, good-naturedly, "Well, if you are not afraid of me I am not afraid of you."

THE latest discovery in portraiture is an invention styled by the patentee the "Casket or Crystal Cube Miniature," by which a small picture of your face is seen in the centre most of the photographic art, seen looking, with a strange living reality, from out of the solid block of crystal, every feature standing out in so perfect relief as though chiseled by the hand of a sculptor.

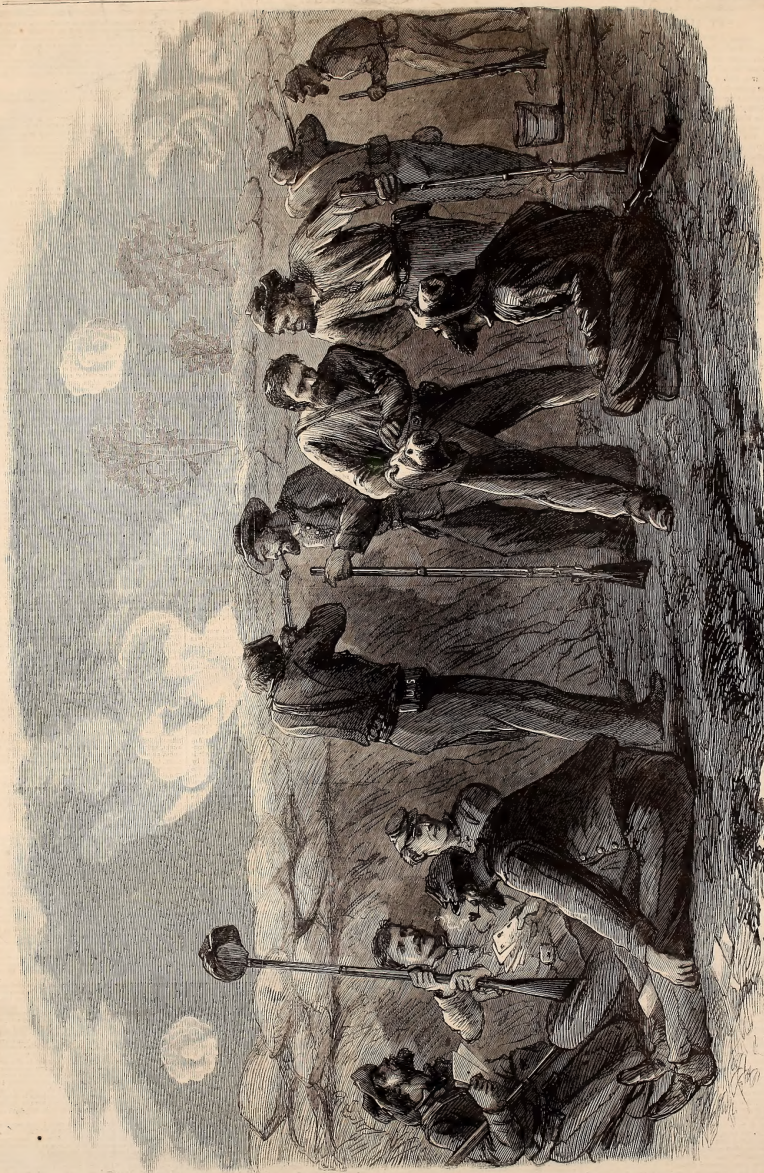
WE have frequently heard of the power of the imagination, but the following instance, which is related in the Times, affords a novel illustration: A respectable-dressed man of about fifty called on a man at St. Etienne, and said, "I am a doctor, and, as I am very much in want of money, I have followed the recommendation and took the remedy, which consisted of a large dose of arsenic, and I succeeded, but, instead of being cured I find I am poisoned, and I have been told that you have had the remedy before me." Yes, Sir," continued the speaker, with great violence, "I am poisoned, and I have come to tell you that you shall die before me." The man, on hearing this, fell back in his chair he exclaimed, "I am going to have another—I am dying!" and he died. The man had taken arsenic and found that he was dead. A post-mortem examination proved that the man had died from disease of the pyloric muscles, brought on by violent emotion produced by a diseased imagination. No trace of arsenic was found. The whole powder was analyzed, and turned out to be not arsenic, but bicarbonate of soda, a perfectly harmless substance.

THE poet Milton's house in Barbican, England, is to be removed for railway purposes. MR. DIXON, foreman of the jury, in the inquest held on the body, made observations to know, previous to the demolition of Milton's house in Barbican, that Gresham College had been removed and which deserves a better fate than to be carried away as rubbish. The old school-room, and study over the garden, and, in the new parish church, the room above these apartments, were partly destroyed. The only sense of pleasure from this is still on the ground, where there may be more to interest the lovers of objects of this kind than in the area of ancient collection of the utter removal of every atom from the premises, I shall be happy to have any party having an interest in the memory of Milton."

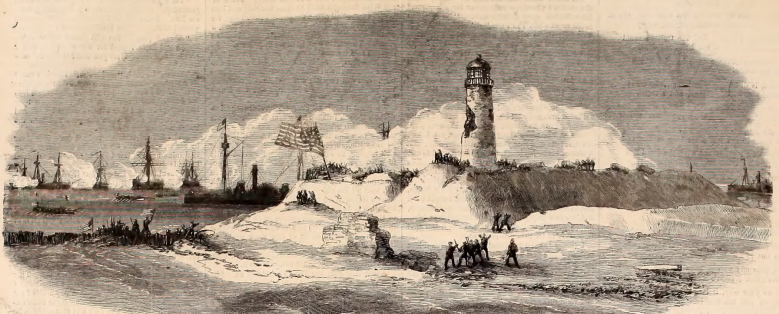
A correspondent of the London Athenæum, writing from Naples, says: "Among the most interesting of the discoveries lately made in Pompeii: "Just two years and a fortnight ago, on the good [illegible] morning, during a visit to Pompeii, the disinterment of a baker's oven, with its full complement of implements and contents, eighteen hundred years ago, when they were done destroyed by the overflowing boiling lava, was in the end morror which he was fated never to see. In my present visit I first entered the oven, and found it in perfect, hardly less curious, of another of the elements of human life, with its bread ready-made, with its loaves in its fresh and sparkling as when, on the day of the great catastrophe, they were taken out of the oven of the vitals which lay in the supply for the last meal of the doomed family. The oven is still in a house which has been lately very recently excavated, and in which have been discovered many objects of interest, among which is a bronze lamp of exterior, of which I shall have occasion to speak later. The well is 30 feet deep, and 3 feet in depth, and retains about fifteen feet of water.

Among the relics of a bakery preserved in the local museum is one which throws a curious light on the domestic arrangements of the Romans. It is the bread of the time of one of the dishes which were retrially in process of preparation, and which was found in the oven of Diomed. Upon the cooking-stove in the kitchen was found a stewing hall filled with eggs, and in the bottom appeared an indurated mass, which Signor Fiorelli rightly conjectured to have been the remains of some of the viands which lay within the pan, and which, although long since decomposed, had left a deposit impression on the consolidated ashes. Acting upon this happy thought, he applied in this instance the process of injection with plaster of Paris so successfully adopted in reproducing that painfully life-like group of human figures preserved with such perfect delicacy in one of your former numbers; and the result has fully justified his anticipations. The mould was found to be a fracture of a young pig, which was being stewed for the family dinner at the very moment when they were surprised by the stroke of doom.

In connection with this curious relic I may mention the discovery of the skeleton of a horse, which, together with two other skeletons of horses found some years ago, has, through the anatomical skill of one of the Members of the Royal Family, been carefully put together, and placed in one of the rooms. I have had the curiosity to examine the skeleton of this noble animal with much attention, and find that the animal was just five years old at the time of the destruction of the city. All these horses were small-sized, but of great shape, and I am confident I can see in Southern Italy."



GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN—IN THE TRENCHES BEFORE PETERSBURG.



FORT MORGAN JUST AFTER THE SURRENDER, AUGUST 23, 1864.—[SKETCHED BY GEORGE SLATER.]

FARRAGUT OFF MOBILE.

We give on this page sketches of Fort Morgan, the Light-house at Fort Morgan, the United States steamer Brooklyn, and the plan of the battle in Mobile Bay. The latter is official, as it is the plan which our artist drew for Admiral FARRAGUT.

The view of Fort Morgan dates just after its surrender. The principal feature of this sketch, as also of those representing the light-house and the Brooklyn, is the illustration given of the effects of the battle. If our ordnance wrought havoc in the fort and battered the sides of the light-house in the bombardment of August 22, the fire of Fort Morgan also, in the action on August 5, left its mark upon the vessels of our fleet. Of this the plan of the Brooklyn, given in the accompanying sketch, is a good illustration. The Brooklyn being the leading ship in the action of course suffered especially. She was struck fifty-nine times in hull, spars, and rigging. She was hulled thirty-five times, and her mainmast was shot through four times. She was also considerably cut up in the port-side. Some shot-holes are so situated as not to be shown. Admiral FARRAGUT, being on board of the Brooklyn a few days ago, remarked that he had never seen a ship so much cut up before. The other vessels were injured in proportion to their relative exposure.

THE "BRANDYWINE."

We give on page 620 a sketch by JAMES S. CRANAY, illustrating the destruction of the receiving-ship Brandywine by fire at Norfolk Sept. 3, 1864. At 2½ A.M. the alarm was given by the guard to the officer on deck. In a short time the entire hold was a mass of flames. The decks were burned through in several places before the men could be got up with their hammocks. No lives were lost. The destruction of the ship was complete, and none of her stores were saved. The fire is supposed to have originated in some cotton waste brought down a few days previously by the Newbern. This combustible matter communicating with oil and turpentine needed only a spark to ignite, and once on fire it was impossible to save the vessel. The Brandywine was an old line-of-battle ship. She was the vessel which carried LAFAYETTE back to his native country on his second return. She was one of the relics of olden time, now rapidly passing away to give place to the new order of affairs. The loss to the Government, with the stores, amounts to over a million of dollars. There are rumors that the ship was set on fire by the crew, but these are without foundation. The fire broke out in the forehold, and as there was a vigilant guard it was no doubt an accident.

PEACE.

[SUGGESTED BY MR. NAST'S PICTURE, "COMPROMISE WITH THE SOUTH."]

Is this your Peace? Lo! the traitor's treat
Is over the grave of our hallowed dead.

The patriot shrinks with a burning cheek
From his loathsome clasp, but dares not speak.

Our flag is dishonored, and rent, and torn;
Is made a by-word, a scoff, and a scorn.

The sword is broken, and Liberty weeps
O'er the blood-stained soil where her last hope sleeps.

The slave bends low again to his chain,
And looks to the North for help in vain;

While the air glows red with the hurtful fire
That flames on the Nation's funeral pyre.

Well may we gaze, with a crimson brow—
Is this such a blessing, think ye now?

Is Peace, when it comes in such a guise,
So fair that it dazzles your eager eyes?

Is it for this, with the rabble rout,
Ye strain your throats to raise the shout?

If so, pass on; ye were born for slaves;
Born but to fill dishonored graves.

If so, pass on; ye can have no part
In the great Nation's steadfast heart;

Pass on your way, it is not for you
To dwell 'mid the free-born and the true—

It is not for you to claim a share
When our shout of victory rends the air.

Pass on; it is most that you should stand
With suppliant look and "cap in hand;"

Or, stooping, lay in the dust your mouth
At the feet of the tyrants of the South.

We, too, would have Peace; but it must be
When our flag shall float from sea to sea;

When its folds shall kiss the morning skies
Wherever our mountain peaks arise;

When there is no rood of our native sod
That can be called a foeman's trod;

When the winds that sweep from the Southern main
Shall bring to our ears no clank of chain;

But rivers and forests shall sing to the sea
The chiming anthems of the free.

WINA.

A MOTHER'S STORY.

THAT'S her grave yonder, Miss. The clover is so strong, as you can smell it then you can't see the name, and perhaps— Ah, well! She was my only daughter, Miss, and such a pretty creature! Where she got her fair hair I could not tell; for I'd been a plain woman all my life, and her father, God bless him! was but a hard-working, poor mechanic when we married, after waiting years and years for the hopes of better times.

But our girl was a beauty, and might have been the richest lady in the land for all you could tell looking at her. She had such wee white hands and tiny feet, and a waist you could span with your two hands, and pretty golden hair that shone so in the sun, and soft black eyes, and the color in her cheeks came and went as the dimples did. 'Twasn't only mother's eyes that saw her beauty. I've seen folks turn to look after her in the street many a time, Miss. We never had another child to love, and, perhaps, we loved her better for that. Our minister says I lost her because she was my idol; but to a poor body like me it seems hard to think the love God puts into our hearts can be any way wrong. Most people, to my thinking, love too little instead of too much; but I how I did love my Wina! Edwina was her real name. When she was born a pretty young lady that I did fine words for, and one she used to be fond of, would call her Wina, and Miss Edwina Mallow sent her over a handsome cradle, and a piece of beautiful coral lops for her sleeves, that very week. Wasn't I proud of my ... ! It makes me young again to think of it.

I said to my Tom: "Tom," said I, "the girl must have some education: and I'd like to think she was better than the lot I had. Her like is for this country, and my girl may marry any one." "I hope she'll not marry so as to look down on us," said Tom. "Keep your place, say I, and be thankful for it."

You see Tom was English-born, and English idiots; but I long brought up here couldn't quite stand his notions of keeping your place, nor see why one wasn't as good as t'other, if he had but the money.

Money we hadn't to lay by; but we made both ends meet, and Wina grew so sent her to school, and she learned well, and was a credit to us.

I wanted her to study the piano; but Tom said— and he was right—we couldn't afford it then, and in where was the good— at night—it was Wina's fifteenth birth-day I remember—Miss Edwina Mallow came over. She brought a ribbon for Wina and some work for me. She was going to be married, and to go away somewhere across the ocean with her husband, who was a foreigner, and scarcely spoke English to be understood. Though she knew his language, I believe; and I had made most of her wedding things except her dress. She wasn't young by that time—quite thirty, I should say; but she was a handsome lady, and they all said Wina looked like her. She kissed my girl, and paid her a deal about being married herself soon; and I told her how sorry I was that Wina couldn't learn to play.

"Her father would have her taught," I said; "but she couldn't practice—we'll never have a piano." Miss Mallow gave a little sigh. "No one will touch mine when I'm gone," she said. "Mother will miss it. I tell you what, Mrs. Brent, Wina may go there and practice. Mother will let her do it for my sake; and she likes Wina very much also, and would be glad to oblige her." That put an end to all difficulties, and my Tom let Wina take lessons; and when she was sixteen our girl was pushing to be proud of it. She could sing and play and dance, and dressed so beautifully, cutting all her things herself; and such a waist as she had! I'd laced her nicely all her life, for I wanted her to be genteel in all matters. Poor Tom used to scold —men will be queer about these things, you know. Ah dear! he died in the Christmas time, and it almost broke my heart, for he'd been good to me, and I had never said an angry word to him from the first thing I took my comfort in me seeing how well Wina looked in black.

By that time Tom had bought our little house, paying for it bit by bit, you know; and I could work and so could Wina. She made dresses and bonnets, and that nearly supported us when Tom died; for I furnished as well as I could, and put out a bill that they were to let to single gentlemen.

I thought Lord help me! that my Wina might make a match that way as Burridge's daughter did; but I said nothing to her. The bill had been up three days, after tea, that evening I sat at the door; and when I opened it there stood a handsome soldierly gentleman, who asked about the rooms and went up to look at them.

He liked them very well, or said he did, and made no difficulty about the terms. But wanted breakfast. He paid well, I thought, and could hardly wait until he was gone to tell Wina. She, poor thing! was pleased and half frightened; and we sat up all night finishing dresses for Wina to wear next day, she looked so well in blue.

Captain Walters—that was his name, and he was dark, and had a dark mustache, Miss, but not any one so handsome or so stylish out of a fashionplate, and that's the truth. He admired Wina, as I knew he would, and I was pleased, and she was so proud and pleased with what I thought I saw.

Now and then I wondered how he came to fancy such a plain place as ours, and with such a deal of money, gold by the handful and rolls of banknotes, and he gave Wina so many presents—jewelry, and books, and flowers, and even miniature. It was a regular courtship before he had been there six months. Respectful to me he was too, plain, uneducated body though I knew I was, and I said if they were a little sly or so, and now and then I caught him kissing her, or his arm about her waist, "why, poor young thing! what harm? I said her." Lovers always do so. I think I never saw any one so pretty as he was to my girl. He was fair, and had dark but half a yard if you measured it, and the bright cheeks! Her breath was very short, and she had a pain in her side sometimes; but I was never frightened with such a color, I knew she must be well.

One day she came to me blushing and beautiful, and she said, "Ma," said she, "I'll tell you a secret, only don't scold." "I'll not, pet," said I. Says she, "Ma, he's never told me or asked me, Wina, before." "No," said I, "you didn't." "But I did," says she. "And, ma, he only came here to bid me good-by before he went away." "Is he gone so?" "But how did you know him?" says I. "Oh," says she, with her bright head down on my knee, so that I couldn't see her face, "I met him at my practice on Miss Edwina's piano. He was there sometimes visiting old Mrs. Mallow. She called him Harry—and—and—and he knew me with me twice when it was dark. Are you angry, ma?"

I wasn't, and I said so; and she went away to brush her curls, for she was to sing that night at the opera that night—the Captain I mean—I know the richest lady there booked no better. I could see he liked my darling better than all, and I was sure I believe it still. You may talk and deceive, but your eyes can't lie. And if he didn't speak as soon as I thought he would, why what did that mean? Wina's life have fine ways, and I was but a poor mechanic's wife and didn't understand them.

So he went that very night all blushes, and I knelt down at my feet, and cried and trembled. And when I begged and prayed of her to say what I felt, she just put her head on my knee, and her wedding finger was a ring. They'd been out so quickly I never noticed any thing, and were married still, and my girl had been Captain Walters's wife three days. I felt a little hurt, for they might have told me; but she was my child, and I forgave and set between us and talked me into a good humor.

"Now Wina's mother," he said, "don't be angry. I had to have this done in a hurry, for I must go on duty and all that sort of thing; for—for—" Then he coughed, and wiped his lips with his handkerchief. And looked troubled, as though he couldn't think of words.

"You see," said he, after full ten minutes by the clock, "our marriage must be kept quiet just now."

"It must?" says I. "Pray why?"

"Oh," says he, "for both our sakes. You see I have a rich relation who is very fond of me, and one of his discovering it he'd leave me out of his will, which would be a pity."

"Well," said I, "But they'll find out that Wina is married. I can't hide that; such a secret is hard to keep."

"It is," said he, "and you couldn't keep it here. You and Wina must go to a little house I have access to for over and above our wages, and no one will see you there. You can make some excuse for going, don't say where, and for a month or two we'll live quietly. No one will know who we are up there."

Wina seemed contented, and I had no right to interfere. I thought, poor silly creature that I was, I had the certificate in my pocket, and she wore her wedding-ring. I told many a fib about our reasons for going, and sold the furniture, and let the house. And we went, and Wina had a few pounds of furniture I never saw out of a shop before! and birds, and flowers, and two black servants that spoke a foreign tongue, and a French maid! Think of my Wina having a maid to dress her hair and lace her! I forgot all about the secret before long; for I did not see any of the old neighbors, and the few we met called Wina Mrs. Walters, as she should be called. They were only folks we dealt with. The Captain said we would keep no company until that relative—the queer old Californian, who objected to Wina because she wasn't rich—should be out of the way. He was very ill; and that, the Captain said, was partly the reason he didn't like to vex him—besides the will.

I wanted it to be all over—and yet it seemed so wicked, though I didn't know him, to hope the poor old gentleman might die. Wina was very happy, though now and then the Captain was obliged to be away what you called "recruiting" with his sick relation, he said. He lingered a great while for any one as bad as he was; and at last the Captain said he seemed to be getting better. I did so long for the time to come when I might go back and tell all the old people I knew, and tell them what a match Wina had made! He never would let either of us go to New York—or, for the matter of that, into the street; the garden gates if he knew of. And so six months passed, and the time came when we began to stitch at fine work again, as though for our living. Such little things, my dear, and we covered them with embroidery. The Captain sent pieces of the finest cambric down.

About that time Wina's French maid left us. She was going to be married. Her sweet-heart had come over from France to find her; and as she took her leave she told me she knew a young woman, a friend of hers from her own country, who wanted a place like that. She could dress hair, and do all the old, she told me, and spoke English, and had been dismissed only because the lady was going to Europe, and she did not want to travel.

I thought of Wina's dress, as she always did, and he said, "Suit yourself, my dear;" and the maid came down next day. She was a tall young woman, with a dreadful squint, and shabby black eyes. I never liked her, I hardly knew why. She took airs over me, as though she knew I had not lived in high, though I was mistress's mother to Wina. The Captain was away when she came, and he had written to us that his uncle was very ill indeed, and that he must stay until it was over; so she had to see him for more than a fortnight. He returned in the night unexpectedly, and the first words he said were, "Our travels are almost over, little dear!" and then he kissed her.

I heard them talking softly for hours; while I sat in my own room and felt as if the pride I'd take in telling my story to Mrs. Mallow and the Burridges at our place to go to bet; and now and then Wina would laugh quite merrily! It did my old heart good to hear her.

For though I felt quite sure that the Captain was honest, and, I could, in spite of much for some never seen, and who was so set against my pretty Edwina.

One next morning the Captain was walking up and down the garden hours before the papers came. He seemed eager for news, and quite snatched the Herald from the servant's hands. He read only one line, and threw it down in the grass, and looked as I never had seen him look for months. Something pleased him; but though I went and looked over the paper afterward I could see nothing that could have made him so troubled down at a place where there was an account of the sailing of a vessel—the Mariposa, it was called. I noticed it by the red circle I set for the boats and sailing-vessel notices, they were still folded up; he hadn't looked at them.

At breakfast-time he said to Wina:

"Darling, I want you to take a drive with me to-day. We'll go to S——, and stop there to lunch. I've a letter to write, and I'll be ready yet."

Wina looked pleased. They had not been out much together, and she went into her room to dress. Besides, I knew she hadn't many clothes to dress her hair; and I sat by the window knitting. In a moment or so the Captain tapped at the door.

"May I come in?" he said.

And Wina answered, "Yes."

So he walked in, and I heard a careless, lounging way of walking that was very stylish, I used to think, and threw himself on a lounge behind them all. Wina and he talked. I mean. The girl went on brushing until she needed a comb which lay upon the table, and I got up to reach it. But there was in her hand when I saw her glance at the Captain; and then such a start! and down came the comb—in bits and rivers of tears upon the floor, and shivered to pieces there. And then, frightened, I supposed, by what she'd done, the girl stood with her hand over her eyes, looking as though she had no power.

The Captain was upon his knees in a moment, picking up the bright pieces.

"You are nervous, my darling, I'm afraid," he said to Wina: and my darling said, kindly, "You couldn't help it, Rosalie, I know." But the Captain's face was white, as though he were very angry at the accident, before he left the room.

Rosalie did not seem to get over her fright easily. She dressed Wina so awkwardly that she sent her away, and finished hurriedly herself. But when she came to put on her bonnet she wanted something that I could oblige her with. The girl didn't know it, I'm sure, and I went out to call her; but I could not find her. She wasn't in the house; but as I passed the window I looked out into the garden I heard voices, and there on the path below stood Captain Walters and Rosalie.

They were both excited; but he seemed to be keeping down his fright or anger, or both, while she grew wavy to hers.

The first words I heard were these, and he said them:

"Rosalie, be sensible. I'll double your wages. You'll find it to your interest, indeed you will; only hold your tongue, and stay."

The French girl answered her foot.

"Stay! I am not so bad as you!" she cried. "I shall go, Monsieur, and quick-come."

"I'm not afraid," he said. "The Mariposa sailed yesterday. Come, you'll lose a good place, and it's too late. Am I the first young fellow that—who wanted to shake off the leading-strings?"

"A good place!" the girl hissed between her teeth. "I have regard for my character, and I love my mistress. Hear you that? I love my mistress!"

"Come," he said, "no heroics. Here's a stiver for a tenderer conscience than yours ever was, Rosalie." And I saw him put a dozen gold pieces into her hand. And hang them back! But though they had stung her, and they hit him on his breast, and went jingling down upon the path and into the flower-beds under the trees.

And I fell a trembling, and sat down in a chair by the window I was close. The Captain came in in a minute. He saw I had seen and heard, and he said:

"Provoking! That girl has lived with my uncle's wife. She'll let the cat out of the bag. An obstinate creature, beyond even a bribe."

"I thought your uncle was dead," said I.

"He may be by this time," said the Captain. "If not, he'll alter his will. Don't tell Wina: there's good news."

He looked as though he were telling lies. But it seemed likely enough, and he hurried Wina off to drive, and they were gone all day; and meanwhile the French girl packed some things in a basket, and left the house without a word to me. That was my first fright. The very first uneasiness I ever had came into my head that day while I sat alone, and I could not tell why they came there except because it seemed so very out of a-day, and had no personal interest in the matter, should dare to be so indignant because a gentleman had married against his uncle's will. I wondered whether (such things do happen, you know) he ever had owed me made love to the French girl, so that she was jealous.

I never had passed such a day. I'll believe in clairvoyants forever, for I spent the whole of it seeing set to rover over the house all day, and I could only understand that danger and grief were hovering over my Wina, and that a blight was coming to her happy life. How I didn't see, but I was sure of it, though I kept saying to myself, "Silly old thing; you're worse than a baby!" more than a few.

They came home at tea time, and she was as merry as a child. They didn't mind me, and she sat on his knee on the porch, and sang to him. She had a grand piano in the parlor, but she never went near it that night.

Maybe it was my fancy, but I thought the Captain looked troubled at times when her eyes were not upon him. Late on in the evening he said,

"Wina, would you like to take a journey?"

"Where?" she said.

"Oh! that," he answered, "or any where where it is wild and lonely. Your mother can go with you, and we'll enjoy it finely."

She said she agreed to any thing he proposed, but it seemed so odd to me that he should propose traveling just then. She was not fit for it.

"As if he were afraid, and wanted to run away," I kept saying to myself against my own will.

It was strange; but he was in such a hurry to start. We were all in a bustle packing and getting ready. Every now and then a great twinge of fear caught my heart, but Wina looked so happy, bless her! And when all was ready in the evening next day, and the Captain had gone over to the railroad depot to see about the baggage-train and marching—he was as anxious about the earliest train as though life had depended upon it, I remember—she came and sat herself beside me, and chatted about the journey.

"I used to want to see the Rockies, and sail on them when I was a girl," she said. "How kind you were, mother, to have me taught so well! I should feel so badly if I could not understand what my husband should talk about. Dear mother, I'm very happy; I don't deserve to be half so happy as I am!"

Talking to me, and looking up at me, she did not see the garden-gate open and two figures walk in as I did. I did not speak: I only heard and I had seen two ghosts, and I knew the great cloud of trouble was bursting over my darling at last; and how I knew it was that he only knew very well. They were coming closer, and I seemingly frozen staring at them, when Wina saw something in my face that frightened her and turned her head. They stood close beside her now the French maid Rosalie, and a tall, plain lady near forty, I should say, dressed in a gray travelling dress.

My dear arose, and made a little welcoming courtesy to the tall lady, whom I took, thinking of what the Captain had said, to be his uncle's wife; but took no notice of her pretty bow, but turned to the French girl and asked a question in a low voice, and the young woman answered aloud:

"Yes, Madame, it is the vile and wicked woman."

My girl flushed scarlet. She looked at the French maid with her eyes sparkling like diamonds.

"Insolent creature!" she cried. "How dare you?" What has he done to you? Is this because you were not paid? If you had asked me you should have had your money. I was out when you went. I think you must be—"

Then, frightened by the bold eyes of the woman, she shrunk away, and I think Mrs. Charles were Wina's name by my husband would come."

"Her husband!" said the Frenchwoman. Listened, but not frightened, she trusted him so entirely. "You are mad," she said. "I do not know who you are, Madame, but I do not believe that my husband will never allow any one to insult me. He will be here soon. I am not unprotected, as you may think. I am not a child to be made to believe any foolish story. You are either an impostor or insane, but I am not afraid of you."

The strange lady looked at my dearest with her strange gray eyes, that seemed to pierce you through.

"I thought you very bad," she said. "Now I think that you may be better, and he worse than I believed. If you are married to him, he has deceived us both."

"If"—my darling uttered the word with a look I shall never forget—"if I am married! I wish he would come; I wish he would come. Mother, send that wicked woman away."

The tall lady looked at the French girl. "Rosalie," she said, "you were wrong; this lady is as much to be pitied as myself. The man who calls himself my husband, Captain Charles Walters, has been mine five years. I beg you to shame and to my sorrow. He is a scoundrel, a base, miserable villain."

My girl sat clung closer to me—only said again, "Mother, send that wicked woman away;" and just then footsteps came up the path, and Captain Walters was at the door.

Oh, I knew by his look, by his start, that she had spoken truly when she called him a villain.

My Wina stretched her arms toward him. She gave a little cry—"Charles, Charles, that wicked woman! Oh, tell me she does not speak the truth? I know it, but tell her so. Say she is mad, or an impostor. Send her away, Charles!"

But when she saw that he did not come toward her, that he stood like a whipped dog, for that he was, looking at both those women from under his black brows, my girl turned pale, and would have fallen if I had not caught her by the arms. Yet, sweet creature! she said again, in her faltering voice, trying to believe in him until the last, she loved him so—

"Oh, I know it is false, Charles! I know there is no word of truth in all the wicked story!"

I can't remember quite all. I was sick and giddy, and my heart was one great pain. Only I know the lady stood before him, reproaching him in such words that they must have burned into his soul.

And she said, "I know long ago that you only married me for my money; but having that, was it not enough to neglect me without going so far as this, and making that girl suffer also? And did not blame her now. She only trusted in you as I did once."

He turned on her then, maddened, I suppose, by the knowledge that she had him in her power, and could punish him by the law. She had said something of that sort, divorce, I know, and through my heart bled for my darling: I could not help pitying her. It was not her fault, poor lady! that she was not handsome: not that he never loved her: was shame to him. But he spoke as though it was, and these words I remember:

"Because I had my debts and my poverty I sold myself to you; but I love this girl, and I have made her mine, and you shall not part us, for she loves me."

Then before I could stop him he had caught my Wina to his heart, fainting and cold as she was, and kissed her on the red cheek, and then turned and laid her back in my old arms, and was off and over the garden-paling and away in an instant.

Then I began to tell lady.

"Go!—you have killed her! Let that satisfy you! She shall never see him again if I can help it—Go!"

And the tall lady bent down her head, the hair all streaked with gray before its time, and in a moment knelt there at my Wina's side.

"Oh, forgive me!" she said. "I am very miserable, and I thought you so guilty. He was my husband, and I loved him once!"

And with that she went away, and I heard her moaning, over and over again, "I loved him once! I loved him once!" like one quite dazed.

You didn't think she could live through it, did you? I was a prisoner of habitudes myself, and know you'll find the slender flower-stems in your garden broken. That night, after twelve, there came a ring at door of the north tower, and weeping, and I opened it. Captain Walters stood without, white and trembling. "Let me see her, mother!" he said. "Let me see her and ask her pardon!" He could do no harm by looking; and as for speaking, my poor girl was in no danger of listening to him yet. I opened the door of my room and beckoned to him, and he went in.

There she lay on my bed, and I had dressed her in her wedding clothes, and all her golden hair was brushed and curled, and on her bosom lay the baby—a girl—which no weeper could mistake for it, and had only cried one minute—sixty seconds, instead of sixty years, like me. They were at rest together. He was very bad: but I can't forget his wild, awful cry he gave when he saw that sight.

"She is dead!—dead—dead—dead! That woman has killed her!"

"No, Captain Walters," I answered, "you have killed her; and you have used the poor plain lady worse even than the pretty darling."

And I was so calm, you would not have thought my heart was breaking. I seemed frozen, and sat all. But he was on the floor, kneeling, and praying for her life, that good, poor, poor, lamb! blaspheming, weeping. Oh it was an awful night!—an awful, awful thing to look upon and listen to!

He staid there until the funeral was over; and near the grave, all through the service, a man stood watching him. When it was over—but pin hand upon the fellow's shoulder, and unbuckling his own coat showed something glittering on his breast. Then they walked away together, and I've never seen the Captain since.

Years and years I used to blame myself, twenty it was all my fault: for if I'd never been so proud of my girl, and had her taught to play; she'd never have met the Captain, and if I'd been wiser and more watchful she would not have married him. And the doctor told me too she never could have lived, for all that lacing had done her harm; and these old hands have drawn the hoes tight many a time, I was so proud of her little waist—my beauty! But now I try to hope God will forgive me, as an old foolish thing that meant no harm, and only didn't know the right, and that I'll meet my Wina some day in heaven. And as I was telling you, Miss—as you'll see if you put back the clever—that was why we only put her pet name, Wina, on the stone there, and couldn't write after it, "Wife of Captain Charles Walters."

THE OCEAN WAIF.

BEAR the crested billows
On the sunset shore,
Making visceful music
With their troubled roar.

Curls of wave are sporting
O'er the glinting sand,
Bearing ocean treasures
To adorn the strand.

Corals from the sea-cave,
Where the mermaid dwells;
Wreaths of floating seaweed,
Pearls and gleaming shells.

And the playful eddies
Kiss the shore in glee:
But their sweetest murmur
Of sadness from the sea;

For a waif of ocean
Hath been drifted there,
Bringing from the storm-ship
Tidings of despair.

'Tis the mournful record
Of a crew's farewell,
Written while the thunder
Peal'd their parting knell.

Trembling fingers wrote it
'Mid the tempest's din;
Tearful eyes will read it
In the stricken home!

Loving winds have fann'd it
O'er the restless tide—
May the pitying angel
Travel by its side!

JOHN WAGGONER'S RECRUIT.

IF it's bragging, Sir, here goes for a brag! I'm going to put it in print.

I am a plain man in most respects, but in one respect I am a little peculiar. In respect to keeping sober under circumstances that make other men drunk, I never met my match. The vicious monarch the Temperance Society is opposed to has no terrors for John Waggoner. I presume you may have heard of that fire-eating Secretary who called me "a man his name?—who used to boast in Washington before the war that he was "born insensible to fear." He met me in the editorial office and smiled. He wasn't an awful liar—that's my opinion of him. Whether I was "born insensible" to fear of "King Alcby, the all-powerful," I don't pretend to say. Any rate it's a fact that liquor can't fuddle me a bit —not a bit. But, bless your heart, that I never thought a boast, a matter. I've got a well-built down at the farm that will hold more liquor than any man I ever saw.

When I was in the army I was a teetotaler in principle. Every man has his own bit of influence in this world, and I never could see any reason for mine to have it to say that he drank because John Waggoner drank. I don't believe whisky makes people brave, you understand, but makes them reckless. A good soldier takes care of himself—that's my experience. He don't go to war to be killed; he goes for glory, and for the country, and look out for Number One all the same, is my motto.

If I don't hate a mean man I am not acquainted with my own strength of mind. I was a boy it has always been a source of pleasure to me to kick a mean man—morally or physically—whenever the good Lord sent me the opportunity. Let me see a mean man mean men in my day. I have seen a man who was so mean that he abused his wife till she got a divorce from him, and then tried to get her to be his mistress. But in my humble opinion—I've been a soldier, Sir, and faced my country's foes under fire—that's no measure style of man; that's than the fellow who tries to make dirty money by dealing in substitutes.

I read the papers pretty carefully, and don't skip the advertisements. I have got a deal of good out of advertisements at different times. Last week I read an advertisement of a substitute-broker named Miggs, in the city. Plenty others like him there were, to be sure, but my way of dealing with a swindle is to pick out one of the swindlers and give him a handling. I picked out Miggs, and went to town to see what the prospect might be for handling him.

The first man I met was Jo Smith, and I told him I'd got a little job to do, and wanted his help. Jo knows me.

"All right," says he. "What is it, John?"

"Do you know a chap named Miggs?"

"Substitute swindler?" says he.

"Yes. I do."

"Guess I do! He's been trying to get me to sell myself to him cheap."

"For a sub?"

"Yes."

"You don't say! Come, this is just the talk! Find me Miggs, will you? I'm a substitute."

"Poh! You ain't going to let any of these dirty sharks gobble you up and make a hundred dollars out of you. Are you, John?"

"He won't make more than that out of me, any how. All I ask of you is to set him on. Tell him you're a sub-broker, and I'm his man. I will be."

"Oh, I see! John; you're a good egg. Here's my hand."

He went straight off, and I waited on the corner for him. Pretty soon he came back with Miggs—a lean chap with sore eyes and a twitchy face. He was dressed in a shiny broadcloth suit, and wore a blue vest with regulation buttons. Our buttons!—I could have knocked him down for that.

"Mr. Miggs," said Jo, "let me introduce my friend John Waggoner, from the country. I want you to show him the elephant, Miggs. Mr. Miggs knows the city like a book, John. He'll take care of you. Come round to my house to-morrow and I'll be more at leisure. I am on to-day."

Jo went off, and left Miggs and I standing on the corner. He looked at me as much as to say, "You're my game, country!" Oh, am I? thought I; but I looked peaceful.

"Smith a friend of yours, ain't he?" piped Miggs.

"Yes," said I, "he's well enough; but he's too darned particular for me. He won't never drink with a feller, and if there's any thing I like, it ain't tea—ha! ha!"

"He! he! he!" squeaked the sore-eyed substitute, "that's a good one. Eh! But, I say—let's have something."

Broker had got his cue as well as I. He was going to get me drunk as fast as possible. No doubt his time was precious.

We drank. Broker took a very light nip, I noticed. I let him do it—that time.

I warmed up with my liquor wonderful quick, you understand! and as we went right off into another saloon and drank again, I took Miggs's glass when he had dribbled a little whisky into it, and said I,

"Look 'ere! That ain't the way you drink with your friends, is it, Miggs, old chap? Here, let me fill her up for you."

And I filled her up, and watched Miggs drink her, too. He tried to laugh it off, but he made a wry face over her.

"What do you think about the war, Mr. Waggoner?" said Miggs after that. He was for getting me to business.

"War's a big thing on ice," said I. "Big thing! Come up and take something."

"Sully" was the word I poured out for Miggs, who began to eye me anxiously. To encourage him, I said,

"Miggs—hic!—old boy, I b'lieve I can lick Deff Jarvis or any other man. I b'lieve you an' I could, anyhow."

"Of course you could," said Miggs, who began to feel perceptibly better. "I tell you what, Waggoner, live half a notion to enlist myself."

"Sully" was the word. "Come up and drink."

Miggs made a wry face again as I poured out his gin, but he had to drink it. After which he grew decidedly patriotic and fiery.

"Say, Miggs—hic!—iggs," said I, "if you'll list for a Major-General, I'll list for a—hic!—high private. Let's go."

"Do it!" said Miggs, and he hiccoughed in earnest. "Do it! Recruiting office right 'cross way here. Come on!"

"Le's drink first," said I; and that one did the business. Miggs was as drunk as a fool. I took him over to the recruiting office and enlisted him in Uncle Abraham's army.

I can recall there's no one mighty mean man wearing the army blue, and that man is John Waggoner's recruit.

INDEPENDENCE DAY IN LIBEY PRISON.

I WAS brought up to regard the celebration of Independence Day as the imperative duty of every American whether he could do on that day as he or my younger days, when enthusiasm flushed all my life, I exercised my prerogative in the very fullest degree, exulting heart and soul into the spirit of the day, attending always the inevitable militia muster, and spending my few dimes in the purchase of the numerous incentives to fun on the occasion; namely, small beer, cakes, and the choicest peppermints. In later years I have been debarred from the latter practice; and when, on the Fourth of July, 1863, I found myself, a loyal Union soldier, in Libey Prison, I was more than ever driven over by propriety to commemorate the event which gave us the nation that traitors are trying to destroy.

There were a few hundreds of us in that Castle of Despair when that anniversary of our Independence dawned upon our torn and bleeding hand. Many of us had been in prison for weeks, and had grown sadly weary of the dreadful monotony of our prison-life. What could better relieve that monotony than a grand celebration to hurl defiance in their very faces, and preach the gospel of Liberty right in their strong-holds. We were not long in holding our preparatory. Speakers were selected, a reader procured, and every thing arranged, when suddenly it occurred to us that we had no flag. That was for a time a terrible damper to our enthusiasm. Who ever heard of a Fourth of July celebration without a flag? No one might as well attempt to have a wedding without a bride as to commemorate Independence Day without the Stars and Stripes to illuminate it! We must have a flag. But where to get it—that was a difficulty not easily overcome. One of the men suggested that we could borrow one from the rebels; they had several about the building, all hanging upside down; but the suggestion was not seconded. We wouldn't ask even the base, low, mean traitors who were dwelling all in their power to blot out its stars. Our perplexity was for a time, as you may conceive, very great: but Yankee ingenuity brought us relief at last. One of the men, we found, had a blue shirt, which, a white one being also found, he promptly gave up; these we tore into strips, and so manufactured a flag—a rough one, to be sure, but one that symbolized, and this was the main point, the color under which we had fought. The field was blue; the stripes and stars were white; we had only to think of the battle-fields from which we had come to fancy there was more of red than of either.

At last we were ready to hang our flag. So all the men, except Chaplain McCabe, Caleb Reed, myself, and two others, left the room while it was elevated to its position. We wanted to put it high up the wall so that it would hang in graceful folds over the chairman's head. It was a difficult thing to do, but Captain Reed accomplished it; he was one of Grant's Western boys, and you know Grant's men go just where they please. Well, when the flag was hung we opened the door and called in the men. You should have seen them as they came in—their faces were like pictures. As each entered his eyes caught sight of the flag, and merely a glance; a deep look of affection shone out from every eye and flushed every face, even the saddest and the palest. Many manacles clanked upon them and upon us all as we looked upon that poor remnant-blanket of our country's flag—memories of battles fought and victories won, of blood-like streaming folds; of sufferings, sacrifices, wounds, imprisonments—suffered for its sake; of comrades fallen never to rise at any morning-call again. We recited many things in that day of misfortune; but there wasn't any time for which we could have more devoutly thanked God than for the sight of the dear old flag, and the recollections it awakened as we stood there with faces upturned and brilliant.

Presently, every thing having been arranged, the exercises commenced. First there was a prayer; then the Declaration was read from an old dilapidated copy; and then the chairman of our prison organization delivered an address, cautioning us first not to applaud if any thing pleased us, lest the guard might come in and interrupt us. It was hard, as the brave young fellow—he was a Massachusetts Captain, only twenty-five years of age, and had fought gallantly on many fields—it was hard as he talked to us of duty, of the value of our imperiled Union, of the glorious future which would result if it this rebellion should be put down, not to give expression to our feelings in vehement demonstrations; but prudence required that it should be so, and we refrained. With all our care and caution, however, we did not escape detection. Probably our unusual quiet had something suspicious in it; at any rate, just as the chairman closed his address a rebel officer appeared, and, looking around the room, announced, "By order of the Colonel commanding this fuss must be stopped." That was nothing more than we expected; but some of us were not disposed to submit in silence. Colonel Streight—you have heard of him—stepped up to the rebel officer, and in a voice that had something of a tremble about in it, "Do I understand you to say that we can't celebrate the Fourth of July here?" "Yes; you can't." "Why not?" "Because" "Then you celebrate the Fourth of July down here for a long time; in South Carolina it hasn't been heard of since 1826." "We know that, Colonel; they did it in the old Declaration of Independence in the present condition of their society—it would put odd notions into the heads of their slaves, and, maybe, produce uncomfortable results.

Of course, we saw that we were going to have trouble, and made order for a volley when Streight was said; then the rebel, looking up, saw our flag; and, I think I never saw a man look at a flag so long and intently as he did at that. It seemed as if he couldn't take his eyes from it; probably some thought of the crime he had committed in fighting against the cause of which it was the symbol kept his gaze riveted there. But he found voice at last to say, "That flag must come down." Col. Cox imagine how that command deepened our indignation. A soldier of Grant's army, captured in battle, cannot even speak as thought; and with faces pale with rage, eyes blood-shot, and lips firmly set, approached the rebel: "Let any man touch that flag if he dares," he said, in a voice made for death. To me he was a hero, standing there royally in the face of near peril. There was the rebel officer, with his guard; a dozen bayonets were pointed at the flag; but the brave boy knew they would think no more of killing him where he stood than you would think of brushing off a fly from your hand; but the rebel did not even so much as ruffle his placid, resolute purpose. He didn't expect, of course, to keep the whole Southern Confederacy from touching the flag; but he did mean that none of us should do it, and backed up his attempt at its protection with a look that conveyed to each of us equal certain blows. Presently the officer repeated the command, "Take down that flag!" To me the sound of a voice of a rebel that insulted fellow standing there with defiance on his face. A third time the command was given; and then Streight, who had disappeared a moment before, self the offensive flag, which he did with great difficulty, every soul of us wishing as he clambered up, and that he might fall—well, that he might fall to get down again in safety.

Some days after. Should the celebration go on? That was the question we had to answer, and that we debated for five mortal hours—in that time making enough spread-eagle speeches to serve a dozen New England villages, if equally distributed, on any ordinary Fourth of July.

A few days after that a friend of mine, living in Richmond, got letters to the Libey. I had heard that Vicksburg was taken, and asked him if it was true. He denied it, and went away, declaring that it could never be. But a day or two after, Johnston's dispatches, announcing the fall of the strong-hold, were published, and, of course, all Richmond knew of it. Next prison doors, filling us all with rejoicing. Our day a rebel officer came in. He asked, "What day is it?" "The Fourth of July," we said. "The Fourth of July," he answered. "What time of day was it?" He told us, and lo! it was just about the time our meeting was held; while the rebel officer was pulling down our flag, Grant was lifting up the starry banner over the roofs of Vicksburg! You should have heard us cheer as that fact dawned upon us; we saw that we hadn't had such a big Fourth of July after all; and had the whole rebel army stood in the prison gates with shotted guns we would have cheered them for Grant and the Flag! May God guard it forever!

CHAPTER XLVII.

RANELAGH WITH THE LIGHTS OUT.

It was close on one o'clock in the morning, after the countess had gone to supper with her friends, that Lily had packed up sort of my tyrant's effects as she ordinarily took home with her, and was ready to go home herself.

She knew the way to the Gardens, and from the Gardens, just as an imprisoned antelope in a menagerie may know its inner lair and its outer paddock, and has been where the ugly-keepers stand to give it crumbs of cake. Beyond this there was a vasty void, only there was no visitors at the gate to give cakes to Lily.

They lived in a front parlor and bedroom, in a little one-story house in a by-street, close to the river-side. There was a scrap of garden in front, full of very big oleanders and sunflowers. The brass plate, too, which proclaimed that here was an academy for young ladies and gentlemen by Mr. Kafooze, seemed nearly as big as the little green door to which it was screwed. It was a tidy little house, in a tidy little street, only, as all the inhabitants did their washing at home, a small, rather too strongly pronounced, of soap-suds and damp linen, and the washing generally, hung about it, morning, noon, and night. All the little men had big beer mugs upon them. Mr. Kafooze's academy was flanked on one side by a lady who brought people into the world, and on the other by one who fought—at that ball, assisted them out of it, even to robbing them for their journey; and, on the other, by a dancing-master, who taught from Oriental climes, who gave himself out simply as "Fung-pan, Chinese," as though the bare fact of that being his name and nation were amply sufficient to satisfy any purpose of legitimate curiosity. Fung-pan dressed in the European manner, and, unless he were going to the watercress-hill, carried even parted with that celestial appendage. His smooth, India-rubber face, twinkling black eyes, and oleaginous manner had made him very popular with the fair sex. He had even contrived to court, in pigeon-English, the widow of a retired pastry-cook with a small annuity, and, to the great scandal of some of the more orthodox Christian district, Mrs. Biff, formerly of the King of Prussia, licensed to sell ale, had become Mrs. Fung-yau. Fung, however, was married to nobody else's wife; it is true that he was accused of burning fire-works at sunset, facing half a bushel of periwinkles to his pos in the back garden, and of the evening of his honey-moon; but he kept his head high, paid his way, and exerted respect from the neighborhood. Some said, that he swept a crossing, and Chinese costume, for a living; others, that he went round the country swallowing molten sealing-wax, and produced globes full of gold fish from his stomach; a third party would have it that he assisted behind the counter of a tea-dealer in Leadenhall Street; while a fourth insisted that he was an interpreter at a water-side police-court. I think, myself, that Fung-yau was a shoeblack down in the docks, where, even before he had arrived, a rice-fed, pigtailed coolie on board an East Indiaman.

The landlord of Lily's hall his lantern up to Lily's face as she glided past him toward the water-gate of Ranelagh.

"Good night, miss."

"Good night, Mr. Buckleshaw!"

"Have my great-coat, miss? It's wounds cold. I don't mind it."

"Thank you, no, Mr. Buckleshaw. I am well wrapped up. Good-night again."

"It's a sin and a shame to send that poor young gal home at all hours o' night," grumbled the night-watchman, who was an old soldier, and testy and kind-hearted, as old soldiers usually are. "It's a burning shame, and so je is. Them furriners don't seem to care a brass farthing for becomes of their own flesh and blood. Such muck, too, as they live upon! The young gal ain't a furriner, though, I wonder what that she-devil, who's sending the people crazy with her rough-riding, got hold of her. Well, it isn't no business of mine. And the night-watchman lighted another pipe, and addressed himself once more to the not very interesting task of crunching, with heavy footsteps, the frozen gravel.

The policemen on the beat knew Lily quite well, and more than one cheery "Good-night, miss!" greeted her as she passed them. There was one gallant constable who, when he happened to be on night-duty, always insisted on seeing her to the door of her street, which happened to be within the limits of his beat. While thus occupied—for Lily would not regard him, he was so civil and obliging—they passed the night inspector himself, in a short cape, and carrying a bamboo cane, and followed by a discreet sergeant.

The inspector stopped. The discreet sergeant, who was of a somewhat suspicious nature, carried his bull's-eye full on Lily, shook his head, and whistled as loudly as the rules of discipline and his respect for his superior officer would permit him to do.

"At your old tricks again, Drippan," the inspector muttered, severely. "Who is this young woman?"

Lily was terribly frightened. Drippan, however, who was the gallant constable, hastened to explain. Fortunately the inspector had on more than one occasion patronized Drippan with his wife and family, and had seen Lily waiving for Madame Ernestine at the stage-door of the circus. He was quite satisfied with Constable Drippan's tale, and was even good enough to tell Lily that, if she liked, a constable should escort her, so far as the boundaries of his beat permitted, toward her home every night.

The next time Mr. Drippan met her he cleared up the mystery of the inspector's severity at their first meeting.

"He's got hennemies, miss," he explained, "hennemies has he sworn to 'ave my 'art's-blood, let alone rewenging my good name, and reporting on me at the station when I ain't done nothin'. I should be Hinspector Drippan but for those hennemies."

Lily said she was very sorry.

"Well you may be," pursued this victim of malevolence. "I've been draw from beat to beat in a way that's 'ardly fair, and 'ave frequently 'ave bin passed agin me, and I've been put hunder stoppages for nothink as all."

Lily felt that she was very grieved, but was still somewhat puzzled to learn what his sorrow really was.

"I 'ave bin," he continued, in a dark whisper, "a perlicman in Grosvenor Square. I was huniversally respected and moved in the first families. It was just arter I 'ad a pitiful row russmaid as kep' company with a Fiend in Hinman Shape in the Life-Guards. She spit on me, and the co—when had his three years year—lost her situation. Vy did the hinspector've me up before the commissioners and play old Gooseberry with me? Because I 'ave jealous. Because I had put his nose outer joint, Ha!"

He paused, as though for sympathy, but Lily, not knowing precisely what to say, went on.

"They'll do it again now, I'm a-known at ted-quarters, and they'd as soon promote the fireman's dog as me. Hi 'ain a paryaw among my brother perlicemen, I 'ave. Hand Hi'll never do the dose when on duty? Let 'em prove their words. They see I runs arter the gals. They're a blighted lot. They've sent me down to this jolly old South Lambeth, where there's nothink but cads, costermongers, and fried fish. Hi has applied for a transfer exasperatin' way, and hit this sort o' thing's to go on, Hi'm blowed hif Hi don't write to the Weekly Expositor."

I am ashamed to confess that little Lily—who, having had her own pennies do ecur, should have learned sympathy for the misfortunes of—was not very forcibly impressed by this lamentable tale. I am afraid, indeed, that she was once or twice very near laughing at the end of it; but little matter for mirth she had now. The gallant but unfortunate Drippan did not fail to mark her drooping eyelids, and, before that night he offered to escort her no more; nay, once meeting her at her own street corner he pretended not to know her, and walked majestically, with measured tones, the injurious words, "Move on!" But Lily often met the inspector, and he had always a kind word for her.

She dared not go to bed, this night of the supper, until she had seen Madame safely home; she had lighted a candle and unpacked the bundle she had brought from Ranelagh, sat down in the little parlor, and, with a trembling hand, per was the only literary matter at hand, and she had read it through at least twice before dawn the beginning of the week. She also addressed herself again, and most industriously, to its perusal, going through all the advertisements of the splendid concerts, balls, and fêtes, the little free beer-shops, the eligible openings in the chandlery line, the unequaled tobacconists', stationery, and barber shops, wondering whether they all found purchasers, and whether it took six months or twelve for their lucky purchasers to realize handsome fortunes. And then she attacked the page devoted to theatricals, and read how Ranelagh was highly in the resort of the highest nobility; how she adpers ian fellow won at the trente et quarante, you wouldn't have had a shoe to your foot."

"I have nothing to do with what I was yesterday. It is enough for me to think of what am to-day, and what I may be to-morrow." Spoken like a brave and consistent countess.

"At least," ven. nirated Tom, "you might remember that I got you a good engagement, and, as an old friend, am at least entitled to a little consideration."

"A fig for your engagements," the woman cried, snapping her fingers; "a fig for the miserable tea rounds a week which your master, M'Varicty, gives me. Dix livres sterling. Je me mouche avec ces gages-là!"

"You were strong enough to get them when I offered the engagement to you at Lyons, and lent you the money to come over to England."

"I might have been. It is a very long ago. In the century before last, I think. Chantez-moi quelque chose de nouveau."

"It was this very summer," grumbled Tom.

"A fig for last summer! a fig for my old friends. Je m'en fiche!" the woman cried. "I have found other old friends—and superb ones, too. I have been in the mud long enough. Now I am about to revenge myself."

"Then I suppose you don't want to see me any more. I wish you a very good-night. Tom was going away in a dudgeon.

On the contrary, the countess condescended to explain, "I want to see you every day. You can be useful to me, Jonfle Tuttlechel. Allons, sovons mais, mon vieux. Tapez la."

She held out her hand in a scornful manner to Mr. Tuttlechel, who took it, and seemed somewhat stiffly, for he was still but ill-pleased and was going, when the countess started up and pushed herself between him and the door.

"No, we are not going to part like that," she cried, half sarcastically, and half caressingly. "I'm in a strong mood, brave. You must continue to serve me. I want you here to-morrow morning. I want to talk to you before ces mes, sieurs arrivent. Nous verrons—we—shall see. I would say—Saturday? Have they not promised to so all? Am I not to dine with them, there? Ah, bien—at the Gardens? Allons, donnez-moi la patte."

She had still, though haggard and riddled, a rolping kind of manner about her which was not ineffective. Tom gave her his hand this time in perfect amity, and, promising to be with her again before noon, took his leave.

He had been slyly examining Lily while parleying with the countess. "By Jove! what a pretty little thing," quoth Thomas Tuttlechel, Esquire, as he put Mr. Kafooze's brass plate between himself and the parlor. "What a pity she should have such an old tigress for a mother. Clever woman, though. Fiendishly clever. In her day, must have fairly fallen off, though. I suppose the little one is her daughter. I wonder what Billy Long's game is. He's sown his wild oats; yet there's a sly lot, these swells, when it's up to something. He said to-night's meeting was as good as a thousand pounds to him. I wish he'd give me a few hundred on account. Hégh-ho! C-a-b!" And Tom Tuttlechel hailed a four-wheeler, and was driven home to bed.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

DREAMLAND.

IT was a very long time since the girl had dreamed. How could she dream, who had no time. Her life had been wakeful, and hard, and cruel. She had been bedded on no soft pillow; dandled to sleep in no loving arms. Every day around her had been awake, and watchful to strike at her. Tranquil slumbers and bright visions she had just tasted of, here and there, and for a moment; but they had been rudely broken, and intervals of long years rolled between. Sometimes, as a quiet and well-remembered little child, the plaything of the school at Stockwell, she had dreamed, nestling in the soothing shadow of her mother's honeysuckle bower, while she had certainly dreamed for a whole afternoon at the Greenwich dinner, and for a whole day at Carter Lodge. A bright and blissful dream had been her sojourn at Madame de Kergolay's; but the waking up only seemed the rather and more painful. Since she had grasped somewhat the sway of the horrible woman, who, in her paint and out of her paint, on the boards and off the boards, was by turns wild, and vulgar, and intolerable, she had forgotten what it was to dream, or rather she had been as one walking in her sleep, with eyes wide open and unconscious. So she might have gone on, to find herself at last a dull, stupefied, apathetic drudge, too crushed and listless to be discontented. But this was not to be. A great change was fated to come over her. She was to dream again, and, for a time, delightfully.

The change began on the very morning after the notable supper of the countess with her old friends. She ceased suddenly to trent Lily in the same manner as heretofore. She was no longer harsh, peevish, impatient with her. She had her old temper on countess; but when she found that she was losing, or the rather, on the point of losing, by way to her temper, would bite her lips, and stamp her foot, and crisp her fingers, until the fit had passed off. Her self-control was wonderful. Lily was astounded at it; and Mr. Kafooze, at first puzzled, was ultimately led to ascribe the alteration to the conjunction of some more favorable planets in the horoscope. The cardinal point in the mild, although somewhat muddled, philosophy of the little old schoolmaster was neither to praise nor to censure his fellow-creatures for any thing. If things went badly, he bowed to the fiat of the stars; and if they went well, he thanked the stars for it. Perhaps, all things considered, our night have a worse system of philosophy than the Kafoozian.

They had visitors in the humble little sitting-room the morrow of the supper. The curiosity of the street was all ago when the distinguished visitors arrived. They came in private carriages —in a Brougham and pair and a carbriolet. The tiger attached to the latter vehicle, a youth of rosy countenance and redundant whiskers, descended into Mr. Kafooze's garden, plucked two roses, stuck one of the flowers in his horse's buttonhole, and the other in his own, remounted, and then gave himself up to whistling, not defiantly, but with an air of cheerful superiority to his position. Lily and both Lambeth in particular.

Fung-yan, Chinese, who happened to be at home at the time (he always returned at noon to lunch on liver and bacon, rice, and bottled stout), came out to his front door, and surveyed the scene with his never-failing smile. So as his three hundred million prototypes simper as they cross the bridge on the willow pattern plate, the little tea-dealer, in his queue, surrounded by flowery gardens and early pagodas, on the grocers' chests. Most of the inhabitants of the street, however, were of opinion that the visit had something to do with a projected railway, the proximate driving of which through their quiet street, and consequent demolition of their dwellings, kept them in a chronic state of apprehension; and the ladies of the neighborhood nige shook their heads, and opined that it was no business of theirs, but that some people had no sense of decency left in their composition, and ly foreign horse-riders. It was enough to make decent Christian people—having paid rates and taxes for years to the parish—to have Jezebels most respectable—believe the world was coming to an end, and to cause the bones of their (the Christian bodies') grand-parents to turn in their graves.

Meanwhile the visitors, quite unconscious of these conflicting sentiments, were being shown into the little parlor. School was just breaking up as they passed through the passage, and, during the process of reception, the pupils and pupilars of Mr. Kafooze played with much zest at being a double-knock, at being a gentleman in a white hat, at being a cabman, at being a fat, crimmed eye-glass, and, in particular, at being carriages and horses.

Lily felt much flurried, but not unkindly, into the back bedroom when the double-knock announced the arrival of the illustrious party. They were five in number. They were the Virginias, plus one; and the additional person was Mr. M'Varicty.

"What do you want here?" was the countess's agreeable salutation to her director (she could not be expected to every body); "do you want to raise my salary?"

"Don't mind if I do," returned the enterprising manager. "Your salary's a consideration. I wish every body else did as well; but the Veiled Prophet of Khorassan, you remember, the Swedish fellow who spoke with a ring-in-his-throat at Rosherville, and, as a child, was exhibited as the phenomenon with the words Princess Charlotte of Wales visible on the outside of his stomach. On the other, Leopold of Sacobble—supposed to mean Saxe Coburg—from whom I expected great things, has come a cropper awfully. The confounded idiot has had the measles; and now he's got over them, he's getting quite fat and good-looking."

The countess had only heard the first few words of his remarks. Long before the monologue was ended she had commenced a low conversation of her more aristocratic guests. How heartily she despised M'Variety in her secret self! What a vulgar creature! how insufferably under-bred follow he was! But the rest? Ah, they were true gentlemen—fine, affable, and easy, and gracious. Was Miller Carlton, M.P., a grand manner—and a kind one too, for all his haughty bearing? And Long Bellew? And Edgar Greyfaust, the Sultan Greyfaust, perfumed, and curled, and oiled, like a gorgeous Circassian in the Turkish bath, with his braided selisse and a sealskin waistcoat. "Il a fait grand seigneur, celui-là," she muttered. "C'est un bien joli garçon. Et Lord Tom Parcels. C'est peut-être un milord qui a fâné longtemps sur le Boulevard de Gand." And to Edgar she was especially gracious.

On Thomas Tuttlebell, even, she smiled; but she took occasion to whisper to him:

"Are you coming to-this morning, false mo So you still bear malice?"

"Not a bit," returned Thomas, in the same low tone; "you gave me a devil of a headache last night; snow-balls and red-hot flat-irons, by way of a change, were nothing to it. However, I'm all right now. I'll be with you come the morning; but we were up late, and I was tired to death." Although Thomas was one of the most obliging of mortals, he was by no means capable of what was due to his dignity, and did not like to be taken in cheap.

"As you please," the countess rejoined, turning away. "We will have our confidential talk another time." However settled she might have been by Thomas's apparent neglect, she took care (for good reasons of her own, doubtless) not to show any hostility, and was assiduously civil to him. "Messieurs," she continued, "can I offer you any thing? The wines of South Lambeth are, I am afraid, not of the premiers crûs—the first vintages; but, if you desired it, the neighborhood should be scoured for pipes of claret-cup and sherry-cobbler. Will you smoke, Messieurs? Illumine your cigars, by all means. I will not do you the injustice to suppose that I could offer you any so good as those which are in your cases."

The gentlemen hastened to disclaim any wish to put the delicacies of the house to the test, and she recovered herself willing to tolerate, and assured her that her conversation was already sufficiently delightful without any extraneous aids. By-and-by Sir William Long gently suggested that she had made them, overnight, a certain promise.

"Ah," she returned, with seeming carelessness, "I know—my little girl. I promised to introduce her to you, did I not? It was a venturesome pledge on my part. Vous êtes par trop gentilshommes, mes amis, for such assignations. However, you shall see that I can keep my word. Do you really wish to see the child?" She is but a little girl as yet, and is very timid and awkward."

"If she is half as charming as her mamma," Lord Carlton observed, gallantly, "she must be charming indeed."

"Flatterer! How do you know that I am her mamma? Ai-je l'air d'une mère, moi?" The high woman assumed herself as she spoke. She was really beginning to imagine that she was young again. "But you shall see her. Excuse me for a few moments, and I will present her to you. You are sure that I can not offer you any thing?"

"Don't think you can," put in plain-speaking Mr. M'Variety. "Don't very likely these gents could drink the kind of stuff you would be likely to get from the public house in the corner. If I'd only thought of it, now, I'd have brought a bottle of Champagne in his lordship's carriage."

"With his lordship's permission," Mr. Tuttlebell gently hinted, "I will be the host to-day."

"With nobody's permission but my own, Mr. Tom Tooly," the manager, who was quick of comprehension, rejoined.

Thomas looked discomposed, and his lordship laughed. Mr. M'Variety's bluntness rather astonished him also; but it could evidently never be alleged against the enterprising manager that he was an adulator of the great. He was fond of calling all of the "tigerpots," as he called them, made much of them, and treated them with great liberality and hospitality; but he never failed to let them feel who was master. He had often been known to swear at a lord who got in a carpenter's way behind the scenes; but he could also be very civil with him: he was also very good-humoredly respectful. He was quite as affable and quiz as hospitable in the luxury of his dressing-room contracted for the train-oil to supply the lamps of Ranelagh, the inspector of police, and the tradesmen who manufactured pasteboard for the refreshment-room.

Madame Ernestine went through the next two rooms, and spoke Thomas rather a hard time of it until her return. That unlucky observation about his lordship's pension brought on Thomas a fit of fretting and fuming. The Greyfaust was secretly delighted that the harmless client had been put down. Mr. M'Variety hastened, however, to smooth Thomas's ruffled plumes.

"A right good fellow is Tom," he observed; "only he's got a bee in his bonnet about you, and isn't wanted. Never mind, Tom; if I've hurt your feelings, I'm sorry for it."

Tom Tuttlebell was soon mollified to be angry with any human being for more than five seconds at a time; and he was assuring M'Variety of his perfect forgiveness, and did do nothing willingly to wound his feelings, when the countess entered the parlor.

She brought Lily with her. She had some wonderly grace and ingenuity left, this Wild Woman, and, during the few minutes she had been absent, had contrived to add ribbons and scraps of lace about the girl's dress, which made her look quite smart. She was very pale, poor little Lily; but the flush of surprise and trusting eyes were beautiful.

"Merciful Heaven!" cried the baronet, starting up. "She's not a bit changed. It's only the dear little girl we saw at Greenwich grown into a woman."

Lily had grown paler and paler. Flashes of crimson came, transient, across the deadly whiteness of her face. But she trembled all over, and stretched forth her hands before her as though her sight were failing her, and she was going to fall. Edgar Greyfaust she gave a look-cry, staggered, and would have fallen, but that the countess caught her in her arms.

"I thought so," she muttered between her teeth.

She bore her into the bedroom, poured water on; bandaged and stopped her forehead with shaded her hands. The girl soon revived. The countess bade her lie on the bed and keep quiet, and she would see that no one came to disturb her little imp," she muttered again, as she passed the sitting-room. "Ah, I thought so, I thought so! You couldn't keep away from me, little Lenth."

She found her visitors in great perturbation at the untoward occurrence.

"It is nothing," she explained. "I told you. She is a mere child, and has hitherto lived in virtuous retirement." She said this with a grin. "She was startled at the sight of so many strangers, but she is already recovered, and will soon be herself again. I was just as timid at her age." And she was quite well again. You are pleasant to look upon when she grinned. She strove to engage her guests in conversation; but it manifestly flagged. She saw their eyes continually directed toward the closed door, and she knew that curiosity was at work. She would keep the bedroom once or twice, and came out saying that the patient was better, but too much frightened to receive strangers again. And at last, with great amiability, but sufficient plainness, she told them that she had a rehearsal at the Gardens, and must beg them to excuse her until dinner.

"That's a crammer," whispered the enterprising manager to Thomas Tuttlebell; "there's not so much as a donkey rehearsing at our shop this morning." Whether his interpretation of the moment happened to be a play-house, an Italian Opera, a garden, a circus, a giant, a dwarf, a concert-room, a chapel, or a wild-beast show, Mr. M'Variety always alluded to it as a shop.

"I suppose somebody's gone wrong," said Tom, in a return whisper, "and she wants to get rid of us. We'd better be off, Mac."

There was clearly nothing left but for the visitors to go. The countess's face was wreathed with smiles; but there was no mistaking the gesture with which she showed them the door. She bade them adieu until dinner, which was to take place, it was arranged, at some hotel in the West End. Mr. M'Variety was to be of the party, and the manager whispered, as he passed out, that he had a proposition to make of a nature which might not be wholly displeasing to her. "Decidedly," she thought, "he means to raise my salary." Her views, however, were too ambitious just then to be satisfied with a mere two or three pounds added to her weekly stipend.

His lordship's Brougham would call for her at six o'clock. That was clearly as it should be, and another triumph. She was evidently resuming her proper station.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A PRACTITIONER being asked by his patient why he put so many ingredients into his prescriptions, is said to have answered more facetiously than philosophically, "in order that the disease may take which it likes best."

AN OLD STORY SPOILED.—A contemporary relates a wonderful anecdote about a boy who, for the sake of confidence of her chickens, and killed the cow with one blow of her bill." This statement is very remarkable. To make the story perfectly genuine the hen should be a cock, and the cow a bull.

DRILL FOR SINGLE VOLUNTEERS.

Fall In.—Let every man assemble at virtuous young woman on the first opportunity you may have.

Attention!—Look at the object of your affections respectfully.

Right Face.—Popping the question, like a man, not like a coward.

Quick March.—To her parents, and ask their consent.

Right About Face.—If you fail to the church, and begin the revries of holy matrimony.

Halt.—Look serious seriously for a few moments; then determine to devote yourself entirely to your wife.

Right About Face.—From the time that you frequented when single, and prefer your own home.

Advance.—Along the path of your young life, hand-out walking together, and don't let her walk three or four yards behind the street.

Break Off.—Billiard playing, betting, and staying out at night, if you wish to have a happy home.

"I wish you wouldn't give such short weight for my money," said a customer to a grocer who had an offensive smell. "I will again time," he added, "if you wouldn't give me such long wait for mine," replied the grocer.

REUBEN E. FENTON.

HON. REUBEN E. FENTON, the Union candidate for Governor of New York, was born in Carroll, Chautauqua County, New York, July 4, 1815. His father was one of the pioneers of Western New York, and one of the most enterprising of those who changed the wilds of the "Holland Purchase" into that beautiful and rich agricultural district west of the Genesee River. He worked upon his father's farm until fifteen years of age, attending school during the winter months in the log schoolhouse. He attended the College Hill Academy, near Cincinnati, Ohio, and the Fredonia Academy, New York; and subsequently read law to qualify himself for business. Before reaching his majority he engaged in mercantile pursuits; and in 1840 he began, in a small way, on the head waters of the Alleghany, the manufacture and transportation of lumber down that and the Ohio rivers. He was entirely successful, and amassed a fortune at thirty years of age. After holding several town and county offices, in 1852, although a Democrat, such was his popularity that he defeated the Whig candidate for Congress in the then 33d District (which was Whig usually by 3000 majority) by 56 majority, and was a member of the Committee on Commerce. In 1854 he was defeated in the "K. N." tornado. In 1856 he was unanimously nominated as the Republican candidate, and elected to Congress by 5000 majority. In 1858, 1860, and in 1862 he was re-elected to Congress by average majorities of over 7000 votes. In the Thirty-seventh Congress he was Chairman of the Committee on Claims, one of great labor, and requiring vigilance, discretion, and honesty. In the present Congress he is a member of the Committee of Ways and Means.

In his private as well as public life he has been uniformly successful. Kind and encouraging in manner and action, many young men owe prosperous positions to his unselfish aid. No man in Congress has been more uniformly devoted to the care and interests of the New York soldiers than Mr. FENTON. His time, his pen, his personal influence, and his liberal purse have been generously bestowed to alleviate, protect, and promote New York soldiers. He has been for a considerable time the President of the New York Soldiers' Relief Association.

MR. FENTON is in the prime of life; he has a commanding appearance. As a public speaker he is fluent, effective, and eloquent. But his success is attributed to untiring vigilance and personal attention to all the details of business, private or public. There are few men possessed of such suavity of manners combined with so great executive talent as Mr. FENTON.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

FOR some years past —and the present season has not differed in this respect from its modern predecessors—the edicts of the Mode have been issued during the summer excursion period. This is easily explained, from the circumstance that it has now become the general fashion to pass the hot months at the sea-side or at watering-places, where ladies are under very slight restraint as to the style of their costume, and can, without being subject to disagreeable remark, temporarily adopt any innovation, not to say eccentricity, which the taste of their mothers may suggest. Of all these bold innovations a few sometimes remain, and, once approved, become the mode for a certain time. Thus it was at the watering-places during the present season that the high bonnets recently worn received their coup de canonat; and the smallest of small bonnets, having obtained the official approbation of competent judges at Vichy, at Trouville, at Honfleur, and other fashionable resorts, will in all probability reign triumphant for some time to come. We have even seen some that scarcely cover the occiput, merely ornamented in front and on the scarcely perceptible back edge with drooping flowers, instead of the tour-de-tête and bavelet, which are now frequently abandoned. But it must be observed that such chapeaux, although met with in the best houses, are not yet general.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Walking Dress.—Green silk dress, deeply vandyked, each tooth being ornamented with rich white guipure. The casaque is adjusted to the waist, and is of the same color as the dress and similarly trimmed. White crape bonnet, small in size, and provided simply with a bouillonné of tulle in the place of the bavelet.

Fig. 2. Sea-side Dress for a Young Lady.—Light gray poplin robe and pardessus, all the ornaments being in black silk with long fringe. The chapeau is the chapeau Windsor, and is almost concealed by an aigrette and a large depending feather. The bottines are laced in front; the stockings are of the same color as the dress.

Fig. 3. Carriage Dress.—White muslin robe over sea-green silk slip. Rich lace fichu, surmounted by a ruching of green silk. The casaque is of green silk, trimmed with deep lace of like quality with that on the skirt. Bonnet of white tulle, ornamented with grass, and with a rose (sometimes replaced by a butterfly) in the tour-de-tête. A large sea-green bow surmounts the back hair or catogan instead of the usual curtain.

CROW'S-NEST SIGNAL-STATION.

IN the sketch given below the reader will get a very good idea of the manner in which signal-stations are constructed. In an opening in the forest, on an elevation, some strong, lofty tree is selected. At the top of a ladder a scaffolding is placed; upon this scaffolding another ladder rests, and so on till the summit is reached. Here in the top of the tree a platform is built, affording a commodious look-out.

PRIVATE MILES O'REILLY.

THE accompanying portrait is a very exact reproduction of a daguerreotype taken by Mr. BRADY of this city, who assures us that its original was no other than Private MILES O'REILLY, formerly of the 47th Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, but now serving as a re-enlisted veteran in some regiment belonging to the Irish brigade. Mr. BRADY says that, in spite of every remonstrance he could offer, Private MILES insisted on "bein' sot for his picture" in a coat borrowed for the occasion from some friendly field officer of his regiment —the reason he assigned for not appearing in his proper uniform being, that he wanted the picture for his sweet-heart, and therefore it must be "lookin' the partiest he knew how."

Not wishing to cast any doubt upon Mr. BRADY'S statement, we can only say that the annexed portrait does not at all tally with the elaborate personal description of Private MILES given in that veracious chronicle of passing events, the New York Herald. We therefore append the pen-and-ink sketch and biography of the "Bard of the 10th Army Corps," as we find it reproduced in "MILES O'REILLY, HIS BOOK"—leaving such of our readers as may be curious in this kind of controversy to decide the authenticity of the portrait for themselves.

From the Herald's stenographic report of the interview between his Excellency the President, the foreign diplomatic body, the members of Mr. LINCOLN'S Cabinet, and Private MILES O'REILLY, held at the White House on last Thanksgiving-day, we make the subjoined extract; and, without expressing any decided opinion ourselves, the matter is now remitted to the consideration and judgment of an enlightened public.

"Private O'REILLY is a brawny, large-boned, rather good-looking young Milesian, with curly reddish hair, gray eyes, one of which has a blemish upon it, high cheek bones, a cocked nose, square lower jaws, and the usual strong type of Irish forehead—the perceptive bumps, immediately above the eyes, being extremely prominent. A more good-humored or radiantly expressive face it is impossible to conceive. The whole countenance beams with a candor and unreserve equal to that of a mealy potato which has burst its skin or jacket by too rapid boiling. He stands about six feet three inches, is broad-chested, barrel-bodied, firm on his pins, and with sinewy, knotted fists of a hardness and heaviness seldom equaled. On the whole, he reminds one very much of Ensign O'DOHERTY'S ideal picture of the Milesian hero:

> "One of his eyes was bottle-green,
> And the other eye was out, my dear;
> And the calves of his wicked-looking legs
> Were more than two feet about, my dear!
> O, the lump of an Irishman,
> The nasty, ugly Irishman,
> The great he-ogre, with his wonderful brogue,
> The leathering wreak of an Irishman.

"Private O'REILLY says that he was born at a place they call Ouldcastle, in Ireland; that he picked up what little of the humanities and rudiments he possesses under one Father THOMAS MAGUIRE, of Cavan—'him that was O'CONNELL'S friind, rest their sowl;' and he is emphatic in declaring that he and seventeen of his O'REILLY cousins, sixty-four MURPHY cousins, thirty-seven KELLY cousins, twenty-three LANIGAN cousins, together with a small army of other Milesians—all his own blood relations, many of them now in the service, and all decent boys—would be both proud and happy to enlist or re-enlist, for twenty years or the war, if his Reverence's Excellency the President would only oblige them 'the laste mite in life' by declaring war against England. He is of opinion that no excuse is ever needed for going to war; but only think if any were, it might be found in the recent Canadian-rebel conspiracy to release our prisoners of war, now in camp on Johnson's Island."

We can not dismiss PRIVATE MILES from consideration in any manner more appropriate than by giving one of the many which first brought him into notice, and which may now be heard sung to the air of "Jamie's on the Stormy Sea!" at many of the camp-fires of various regiments. He called it his

SONG OF THE SOLDIERS.

"COMRADES linked in marches many,
Comrades tried in dangers many,
Comrades bound by memories many,
Brothers ever let us be!
Wounds or sickness may divide us,
Marching orders may divide us,
But, whatever fate betide us,
Brothers of the heart are we.

"Comrades known by faith the clearest,
Tried when death was near and nearest,
Bound we are by ties the dearest,
Brothers may more to be—
And, if spared and growing older,
Shoulder still in line with shoulder,
And with hearts no thrill the colder,
Brothers will we die!

"By communion of the banner—
Battle-scarred but victor banner,
By the baptism of the banner,
Brothers of one church are we!
Creed nor faction can divide us,
Race nor tongue can ever divide us,
Still, whatever fate betide us,
Brothers of the heart are we!"

THE REVENGE OF A GODDESS.

THROUGH the dewy thicket, out into the patch of silver moonlight, on to the silent wood, paced the picket-guard, humming a love-song between his teeth, and thinking of bright eyes far away, of honeyed words and velvet lips, of a true heart and a plighted faith all his own, when he should return to claim them.

Like enough this very minute she's looking at the moon shining down so bright, and thinking about him.

Seth Bryant never finished the sentence thus begun, for the same air-wave that brought his own words to him, brought also a step or two farther, prostrate at Seth Bryant's feet, and clung about his knees.

"What is it? Who are you?" exclaimed he, trying to withdraw from that convulsive clasp.

The woman struggled for speech, but from her laboring throat only a dry gasp came only a moan, half of anguish, half of exhaustion.

Seth looked at her in the moonlight, and read her story at a glance. Numb face upturned to his. A life of toil, of misery, of hopelessness, had written its monogram upon every one of the coarse features, but there was a figure that should have been in its prime, and intensified to terrible pathos the natural misery expressible of the negro's eyes, her only point of beauty. She was apparently about thirty years of age.

"You're a fugitive slave," said Seth Bryant, at last.

Before the woman could reply the renewed sound of crashing timber and triumphing footsteps announced that a third person was about to appear upon the scene.

The negro woman shrank together, and uttered a gasping cry as she clung more closely to the Union soldier.

"Save me, mas'r! Oh, for de Lord's sake, don' let him git me!" panted she.

"Let go—let go of me this minute!" returned Bryant, somewhat roughly, as he too shrank away from the desperate arms clinging about him.

"Who goes there?" challenged he again, as soon as he could command his piece.

"A friend! A good Union man! You needn't be scared of me," returned a rough voice, as a man parted the bushes and emerged into the moonlight glade.

"Halt, friend, and give the countersign!" returned the sentinel, covering the friend's gleaming right eye with the "sight" of his piece.

"I don't know the countersign, nor I don't want any thing to do with you," retorted the man, in a huff. "All I'm after is that wench of mine that's trying to hide away in them bushes. You ain't going to hinder my coming for enough to stop your lines to grab her, are you?"

He advanced as he spoke a step or two, and the woman, abandoning the futile effort at concealment, rushed once more to the feet of the sentinel, and clung there, moaning.

"O mas'r! oh, for de Lord's sake don' let him git me! O mas'r, tink it 'twas you own mudder or sister! Oh, good Lord, help me dis time! Turn your bressed face ob us dat's 'shuin, an' help a poo, mis'able creter dat ain't got no one but you and dis good Yankee sojer to look to."

"Halt where you are!" ordered Bryant, sternly, his musket still aimed at the intruder's head.

"Another step and I'll fire. Now, tell me who you are, and who this woman is?"

"My name? Thomas Bellew, and I live about ten mile below here. I'm a good Union man as there is in Old Virginny. I'll stump any one to say I'm not. But that 'ere black 'ooman's my wench Juno, and she's runned away, trying to git to the North, I reckon. I got track of her last night, and come up to look for her, and I've got her up in an old shanty down here a piece, and had just got a grip of her when she slipped through my fingers, and got for the woods with me after her. I come up with her just here, and all by chance, I expect, she slipped you, and thought you was going to help her. But your father's name isn't Juno, running off niggers, I've heard say, especially when they belong to good Union men like me."

"No, Colonel Sawyer don't want them to come into camp, and if you're a Union man as you say, I suppose he'll give up the slave if you was to go to him about it," said Bryant, thoughtfully.

"Of course he would, and as long as she's here, and I'm here, she's simply a good way off my duty. It just the same thing to let me grab her, and be off without any more to do?" argued Thomas Bellew, pressingly.

"Well, I suppose it is," assented the picket-guard, uneasily, as he glanced down at the face of the agony-stricken negro at his feet.

"I don't know as I've any right to let you come within the lines though," added he, hesitatingly.

"Why, I won't walk a step, mister, I'll stay right out of your sight. All I want is my own, and you say yourself that your Kunnel would give the gal to me."

"Very well, take her, and begone," said Bryant, sharply, as he once more disengaged those white arms from the Union coat, and pushed the negro to the other end of the glade.

Not so quickly though but that he heard the savage and brutal the brutal kick, with which the planter took possession of his slave; not so quickly but that his ears were pierced and his heart wrung through with a long, low woman-wail full of despairing anguish.

When he turned round he was alone. Only the white moonlight filled the little glade, only the song of the whip-poor-will broke the midnight stillness; but to Seth Bryant's excited imagination there still showed a dark anguished face and form, that night-bird's mournful voice repeated always that passionate cry, "O Lord, help me! O Lord, help me!"

"And what would Mary think after all she said about just this?" asked the young man's heart, as he paced on mechanically with his musket. Mary went back to the night, three months ago, when he had hid his betrothed good-by, and heard her last prayers and vows uttered amid the sobs of parting. The old question, the old sorrow had come upon between them even then; for Mary Gifford had been a slave-holder's daughter, and abolitionism was in its widest sense, for every human being in her native land.

Seth Bryant came of another stock and another creed; and while enlisting himself a soldier of the Union against the rebellion, he had spared no pains to convince Mary that slavery was not the sin to whom he spoke, that he in nowise pledged himself to fight against the very root and corner-stone of the rebellion.

But at least he would never, could never, take part in the cruel treachery of returning a fugitive slave to bondage; in these same distinctions between cause and effect, should have fled to him for safety. Mary would understand and trust her hand in his, her eyes resting upon his, with a look of anxious doubt.

"Should I not return his horse, his ox, nay, his very child, if it thus escaped, and he came to demand it of me?" asked Seth, sturdily.

"God has given me a gift that will reckon with him for its training. God, too, has given men dominion over the beasts of the field; but God never gave man to beast, to be a thing lower than even the very beasts," said Mary, earnestly.

Seth, however, had no mind for such discussion on the eve of a long parting, and Mary's gentle face with swimming blue eyes, eloquent in their loving sorrow, or these coarser, darker, stronger features, and wild wild eyes, with the fire of a fiercer passion with swimming blue eyes, eloquent in their loving sorrow, or these coarser, darker, stronger features, and wild wild eyes, with the fire of a fiercer passion quish of a vain appeal. Nor had daylight the power to lay these phantoms, but rather seemed to increase their luminous forms. Seth was relieved from duty by day, and night by night, they kept Seth Bryant company until he had tuning or deliberately or recklessly, and became a heavy and moody man.

Suddenly upon this dreary dream came a sharp change. The rattle of musketry, the heavy boom of cannon, the fierce cry of onset, and Seth Bryant found himself fighting madly in the foremost ranks of his noble Massachusetts regiment, and for a moment forgot to wonder what was done to that woman called Juno by the brute who carried her away, and what God and Mary Gifford would say to his agency in the matter.

Then came the repulse, the terrible struggle for honor and life, of a handful of men, crushed between a legion of pitiless enemies and the precipice with a river at its base.

Of all the bloody battle-fields where this civil war has left its footsteps, of all the God's Acres consecrated by the heart's blood of its martyrs, of all the terrible blunders where hundreds of true, brave men have been offered up in vain expiation of one man's folly or treachery, there is to my mind none so pregnant with bitter interest, with pathetic heroism, as this battle of Ball's Bluff. Let those whose nearest and dearest perished there for naught say if my words are not sooth.

Seth Bryant, cruelly wounded in the very last of the struggle, staggered to the verge of the steep cliff and there lay motionless for hour, choosing rather to lie beneath the waters already turbid with the blood of his comrades than to fall alive into the hands of an enemy whose barbarous treatment of their prisoners hung over throw a darker shade over the shameful annals of their treason.

But he was not then to die. Floating some distance down the stream he drifted at last into a tangle of reeds, osier-willows, and thick-set river plants, and lay there motionless for hours, not daring even to intensify his condition to either side. Drifting in presently, so that his head and shoulders lay between the reeds, while the water, softly lapping his wounded arm and breast, soothed the fever of his wounds, the poor fellow fell asleep, and dreamed of home and Mary, and the old mill-dam where they had sat while he told her how well he loved her. But just as Mary's head drooped lower and lower toward his breast a dark hand rose from the water at their feet, and thrusting Mary aside touched him over the heart, and the touch was of molten iron. With a gurgling cry Seth awoke. The hand was gone, and so was the dark phantom-face that had just begun to stop itself beneath the water, but the sting remained, the cruel, burning thrill that seemed scorching the very blood within his heart. He was alone, left exposed to the sun, now that the rapid current had washed its plaything higher upon the shore, almost out of its own reach.

With a sigh of pain, breathless sigh, and then Seth, slowly recovering his recollection, drew himself carefully out of the water, and rising to his feet tried to ascertain where he might be.

It was no easy task. Far away upon the opposite shore burned fires and lights that might be those of the Union army, but might as well be those of the enemy; for the wounded man had no means of judging in the darkness to which bank of the river he had drifted, and his wounds were fast becoming so painful as to deprive him of the full use of his native coolness and acumen.

Leaving the river-side he climbed a long steep bank, and then crossing a highway and traversing some fields, plunged into a wood of considerable extent, with a vague intention of remaining there until he should feel able to reconnoitre his position thoroughly and learn what were his chances for rejoining his regiment.

Creeping cautiously along—for he foreboded that he was on the enemy's ground—the fugitive presently found himself in an open space among the trees, and as he traced its boundaries by the dim starlight did not fail to see that similar phantoms suddenly rose up and claimed him as their own. The place was so like that one upon the opposite shore where a few hours before he had turned coldly from that woman pleading to him for help in her mortal agony, had seen her hurried away with his consent to fiendish tortures whose secrets are only fully known to the Judge and Rewarder of all men.

And now it was he who was the fugitive; he who fled, wounded and dying, from the ruthless foe, who, as they had misused their power over their bondslaves, would and had misused it over their captives captured in fair, honorable warfare by slaveholding until they had come to feel that strength and dominion are the weapons of the tyrant, instead of the Godlike attributes of those who are thus endowed that they may humbly imitate God in their bearing to their fellow-men.

With a wailing cry Seth Bryant sank upon the ground and hid his face in the wet grass.

"God has found me out. This is judgment!" he sobbed, "and I deserve that poor creature knew it."

A slight sound at his side startled him—a step, a movement as of some one stooping close over him; a hand upon his shoulder. He turned hastily, and found a face within a few inches of his own.

He thought in his feverish remorse it was the phantom, in a more visible shape, come to exult over him.

"It is Juno," murmured he—"Juno. She was a queen, wasn't she?—as a goddess, and they killed her; hurried her away, and then whipped her till the ground was as red with her blood as that place where the Captain lay to-day. Juno! Where is Mary, Juno? Why did you call her down to the mill-dam? You're glad enough to see me here now, aren't you, Mary? No, it was Juno that I gave up to the hunter. Don't you hear they call them, Juno, they? I wonder if they're hunting me? Hark! They're coming now! I hear them!"

He sprang to his feet, and stood glaring around in a frenzy of delirious rage and terror. Then his fevered brain reeled, the dark wood and the dim sky blended with one another, and he fell heavily to the earth.

At the first words he had spoken the dark, silent woman whom he addressed as Juno had started to her feet and uttered a cry; but carefully avoided any other motive detained her to listen to his wild mutterings; and now, as he lay silent and motionless for a few minutes, she

Private Bryant was now utterly insensible, and it was only by a prodigious effort that the feeble old man, with Juno's help, lifted him from the bed and carried him to the fire-place, where they laid him flat upon his back, and Juno having entered the kindling-place first, received the head and shoulders and dragged, while Quashy pushed, until the six feet of senseless clay known as Seth Bryant lay at last upon a rude bed of straw and leaves, across the rod of the open room.

The torch now placed in the chimney-corner threw a broad glare into the recess, and showed, in strong flickering lights and shadows, the little crypt scarcely more than six feet in diameter, its walls and roof lined with pine saplings, and its few rude pieces of furniture. It showed, too, the straight soldierly form, and the death-white face of the wounded man, contrasting so vividly with the black skin and negro shape of his strange nurses as they stripped away the covering from his chest and arm, the better to examine his wounds. Upon the heart lay a picture, the photographed likeness of a young girl. Both negroes glanced at it, and Juno laying it carefully aside, said:

"Dat's Mary. De pore boy!"

"Don' see how he hurt it in he heart wid dat ere pieter a lyin' right on it, for ole Massa nuddar use man to wise nor def," muttered Quashy, bitterly.

"Pears like he forgot dat time dat we was both women," said Juno.

"Hark, gal! What dat? Hosses' feet, shoo as I'm on ole sinner, an' stoppin' here."

"Go out! Quick, hurry, Quashy! Get the stone and brush back 'fore dey come in, or we're all gone togedder!"

Whereupon whispering these directions, Juno pushed the old man out of the cavern, and tugged with all her might at the slab that should cover the entrance. But, in vain, it had become jammed in some way, and would not stir, not even when Quashy upon the other side applied all his strength and experience to the effort. And already the cave blow upon the door showed that the intruders were determined to enter.

"Pile up de brush in front, an' take away de torch. Hurry, for de Lord's sake, ole man, an' hole her out you's a comin'!"

"Comin', mas'r, comin' soon's I get de ole trowsers on," piped the shrill voice of the old man upon the instant, and with nervous hands he heaped back the brush high above the opening, and swept into the fire-place the bits scattered over the floor. This done, he took the torch in his right and hurriedly opened the door. Two officers on horseback, followed by a couple of orderlies, all in the rebel uniform, visited cautiously.

"Well, old stupid, why couldn't you open soon-er? What are you about with a light at this time of night?" asked the elder of the officers, dismounting as he spoke, and coming into the cabin. One sharp glance around showed him, as he thought, the whole interior of the bare four walls, and his eyes returned to the stolid face of the old negro, who stood staring at him in well-feigned stupidity.

"What makes you up at this time of night, I say, boy?" reiterated the officer, sharply.

"Leave you know, mas'r."

"But you had a light, you old fool, and that was what made us stop. It's near midnight, did you know it?"

"Laws no, mas'r. I doesn' know noffin," mumbled Quashy. "I kep' a pity knot burnin' for company like, mas'r. Here's ben sich an awful lonesomage ober dere all day. I 'spects the Yankees has done come now for sartain. Pore ole nig couldn' stand a war. Was 'fraid you was de Yankees, mas'r, when you knock."

"No, we ain't the Yankees, boy, but we'd like to get hold of some of those that are skulking in this wood. If any come here, uncle, and ask for help, let them in, and hide them up safe, while you fodder your horses, and get and give information. You'll get paid well; and here's a dollar to put you in mind of what I say."

"Comp. Bellows," called the officer outside, who had not yet spoken. "Don't waste any more time over that old idiot. He don't know enough to do to either party. Come on."

"Very well. Remember, uncle, what I have told you."

"Sartain, mas'r. I'll 'member. 'Night, mas'r."

"Good-night, boy."

And Captain Bellows, after one more sharp glance about the place, withdrew, little guessing how near he had been to a double revenge, little guessing that a moment so fatal as almost to be alone, alone separated him from that defenseless woman, and that trembling woman, who, at the first tones of his voice, had fallen to the ground and lay there as helpless in her terror as the hare who sees the hound darting upon her.

When Quashy, after listening for the last audible hoof-beat of the retreating horses, drew near the fire-place and whispered her name, it was only by a terrible effort that Juno was able to answer him; only in the lowest of murmurs that she dared to reply to his question whether she needed more help with a helpless man; then Quashy, exhausted by his unwonted vigils, extinguished his torch, and crept back to bed, leaving Juno to watch and pray the long night through.

Three long weeks did that devoted woman voluntarily imprison herself in that gloomy crypt, patiently nursing and attending the man who, when she had left at his feet for more than life, had coldly refused and repulsed her.

When Seth recovered his consciousness, and learned the manner of his escape from death and the identity of his rescuer and protector, he said little, but thought very much, and felt still more; and if ever a man was in this life "born again" that man was Seth Bryant, when he once more stood erect beneath God's heaven a man able to defend himself and her who had cared for him in his extremity; for to be sobered from drink and to know Christ that did not include Juno with himself.

At last the opportunity came, and after bidding good-by to old Quashy with the promise of future reward—a promise faithfully and amply redeemed —Bryant once more threaded the forest paths beneath the blackness of night with Juno for a guide.

They reached the river bank; they found the little skiff and faithful boatman awaiting them; they crossed the river whose waters had run red but three short weeks before with patriot blood; they reached in safety the opposite shore, and stepping upon soil guarded by the banner of the republic Seth Bryant felt himself once more a freeman and a soldier—felt that at last he might begin his life-long repayment and atonement to the humble, despised friend who stood beside him so unconscious of the debt.

A short furlough was easily obtained for one so sorely wounded as Bryant proved and that he had been, and a few days later saw him traveling North with Juno by his side where it was permitted, with him for her protector, to seek and find her sister to associate with her whiter-skinned brothers and sisters.

A year arrived in Massachusetts; so they came to Mary Gifford's home; and to her care and guardianship was Juno confided before even the son sought his mother's presence or his father's home.

"It is to you that I bring the first-fruits of my repentance, Mary, for it is against your teachings that I sinned," said the lover; and Mary cared not to hide from "mild-eyed Juno's" gaze the close, kind kiss and fond embrace that repaid the offering.

And here we must leave the kind little gallant company against the doomed city whose downfall its bravest leader has decreed and will accomplish, his wife and children patiently for the end, and her handmaid Juno adds her prayers to those of her mistress for the master's safe return.

A Starting Fact!
Highly Important to Soldiers.
Statistics show (and figures can not lie) that four times as many men die from sickness contracted in camp as are killed in battle. Bowel Complaints, Malaria, Dysentery, and Diarrhœa are the scourge of a soldier's life. Dr. Rosa's Medicated Flannel Abdominal Supporter is the great safeguard against these sickness, and should be worn by all persons exposed to malarious diseases. As a health preserver, it has proved itself "the best remedy of the age." Its peculiar effects are to give strength and vigor to the digestive organs, and thereby to keep the system against colds, which at this season bring on Dysentery, Diarrhœa, &c., &c. They are a great improvement over the home-made bandage and stomach belt. Thousands who have worn them would not be without them. They are endorsed by the highest medical and scientific authority. See Dalli's Journal of Health, Scientific American, &c. Sent free by mail on receipt of price.

No. 1, large size, combining Flannel Supporter and Money Belt, $2 00. No. 2, medium size, same as above, $1 50. No. 3, slim, small, $1 00. Price of above without pockets, $1 00. Send your orders to HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR SEPTEMBER, 1864.

Important to Subscribers.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY will find upon the wrapper of each Number a Statement of Account. The figures on the Statement indicate the Month when the Number with which the Subscription EXPIRES, or ended, on our books. Subscribers may thus ascertain whether he has received the proper credit for his remittance. Also when to renew his Subscription. In renewing Subscriptions, Subscribers are particularly requested to name the NUMBER with which the New Subscription should commence; they will thus avoid receiving duplicate copies or missing Numbers. It is desirable that a Receipt should be received a few weeks BEFORE the expiration of the former Subscription, in order that our books may be kept properly adjusted. Attention to this will obviate complaints of errors which ensue by both Publishers and Subscribers.

"RALLY ROUND THE FLAG."

THIS week we print, on pages 632 and 633, another picture which shows at a glance the position of the Union men in this contest. The constitutional standard-bearer, who through good report and evil report has held the flag of the country aloft and triumphant, is represented surrounded by his gallant fellow-citizens of the army and navy, who on land and sea have maintained the honor and integrity of the nation. Neither he nor they ask for "an immediate cessation of hostilities"—neither he nor they are ignorant of the great price of constant sacrifice of every kind that must be paid for the final victory of the people over their enemies; of loyal men over traitors; of the great mass of men who live by their own labor over a privileged class that call weakmen "mud-sills;" the triumph of the true Democracy over the only aristocracy in the land.

"Soldiers," said the President a few days since to a returning regiment, "I thank you in behalf of the country for the services you have rendered. . . . The war is for the perpetuation of the principle of equal rights to all. In this Government the sober and industrious have an equal chance. I occupy the White House now; but there is an equal chance that your father's son may be as fortunate as my father's son."

These are the words of a true Democrat and honest man, sprung from the people, and conscious that he is upholding their cause against traitorous enemies every where. "This is your war," he says: "Boys, rally round your Flag!"

GEN. WARREN EXTENDING HIS LINES.

THE sketch which we give on this page is one which illustrates an operation continually going on on General GRANT'S extreme left. According to the rebel journals the Lieutenant-General is slowly pushing westward from the Weldon Railroad; as he moves in this direction he fortifies his extended line. The scene given in the sketch relates especially to General WARREN'S front. The work of fortifying goes on at night, to avoid exposure to the enemy's fire.

THE U. S. TORPEDO-BOAT "NEW ERA."

ON September 8, at Fairhaven, Connecticut, was launched the torpedo-boat New Era, of which we give a sketch on page 636. It is the first boat of the kind worthy of notice. She is a wooden vessel, seventy-five feet long, twenty feet beam, and seven feet depth of hold. She is securely built, her heavy beams being supported by hanging knees bolted and fastened, and is to receive an armor plating sufficient to make her shot and shell proof. Her engine has a cylinder eighteen inches in diameter, with eighteen inches stroke of piston, and works a screw capable of propelling the vessel at the rate of twelve miles an hour. The boiler furnishes the steam for the main engine as well as for the auxiliary engines, which work the submerging pumps, and the mechanism by which the torpedo arm places the torpedo beneath the ship. Forward of the boiler is the steering wheel, and then comes the torpedo-machine. It requires twelve men to man the vessel. The following is the method in which the torpedo-machine operates: As the vessel advances toward her victim a torpedo, varying in charge from sixty to two hundred pounds of powder, is placed in a basket-like contrivance, attached to a long rod. The torpedo is capped, and the hammer which is to explode it is secured, and every thing being in readiness, the large working box is closed, the gate at the bow of the vessel is raised; the water then rushes in until it is filled. The machine is now set in motion, and a long iron arm carries the basket containing the torpedo out from the vessel, and, closing up to the enemy, by means of a rod within this arm, the torpedo is released from its receptacle and is deposited in the water in just such a position as allows it to float up against the bottom of the vessel intended to be destroyed. The machinery still keeps on revolving, and the same motion which caused the arm to run out brings it back; the vessel in the mean time backs out of the way of the vessel intended to be sunk, and at the moment fixed upon the hammer falls, the cap is exploded, and the work is done. The basket may be again charged and the process repeated. The invention of this ingenious machine, by Chief-Engineer W. W. WOOD, U.S.N., introduces a new era in submarine warfare.

GENERAL WARREN EXTENDING AND FORTIFYING HIS LINES ACROSS THE WELDON RAILROAD.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.]

SOLDIERS' HYMN.

THERE is a land where strife shall cease,
Where arms shall clash no more;
Where all is calm content and peace;
Lord, bring us to that shore!

In the rough tent, in the wild tent,
In the marches by the way,
Be thou the soldier's comforter,
His strength, his staff, his stay.

About the graves of good men gone
Make the grass to shine;
Our armies lead to victory on,
And make their victories thine.

In the rough tent, in the wild tent,
In the marches by the way,
Be thou the soldier's comforter,
His strength, his staff, his stay.

And when we've done with life's events,
When the dark shadows fall,
Help us, O Lord, to strike our tents
For the last march of all.

To the sad tent, to the sick tent,
To the dying tent, come down,
And gem the rough wood of the cross
With the blossoms of the crown.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1864.

THE CHICAGO CANDIDATE.

THE patriotism of the American people regards with such instant scorn and indignation the craven platform of the M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON party that the managers are now painfully struggling to separate the candidates from the Convention and platform. So far as regards Mr. PENDLETON this effort is hopeless. He is as plainly and fully upon the record as Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. His political philosophy precisely that of CALHOUN and JEFFERSON DAVIS. He is a Union man of the school of BERRIEN and YANCEY, and of no other. No "Union" capital can be made out of Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON. He is therefore passed by, and M'CLELLAN'S letter is offered as "a good enough" platform until after the election.

"My face is my fortune, Sir, she said." His letter is his platform, we are told. That would have been a more plausible deception if the party which is to support him had not already declared what he is to do. The representatives of that party from all parts of the country, and fresh from their constituents, met at Chicago and deliberately proclaimed their opinions and their policy; and as the New York Herald, the earliest supporter of M'CLELLAN, and other "Copperheads are the law-makers of the Democratic party"—if the meeting at Chicago is to be allowed to usurp that name.

But the letter itself does not deny the assertion of the platform that the war is a failure; on the contrary, it substantially repeats it, by saying that the country has no result from our victories. It does not reject the effort for an immediate cessation of hostilities; it says merely that when it shall be probable, whether by means of such an effort or otherwise, that the rebels are ready for peace upon the basis of the Union, then—they may return to their obedience to the Government? Not at all; but then and then we will proceed to consider upon what terms they are to obey. Is not the Constitution enough? If so, why does he not say so? Having taken arms against the Government, are the rebels to be bribed to lay them down by the promise of a change in the Constitution? That is to grant the success of the rebellion. It is the surrender made at Chicago, and it is repeated in M'CLELLAN'S vague phrases about "exhausting all the resources of statesmanship."

No man can make this letter bear any juggling intention. It talks of "the Union at all hazards," but so the Chicago platform declares Union to be the means and object of the party. But what Union is meant? Is it Union under the Constitution of the United States, or the Montgomery Constitution? HORATIO SEYMOUR says the last is the best. Senator HUNTER, of Virginia, told a member of the Peace Congress in 1861 that all the Northern States except New England would accept the Montgomery Constitution. M'CLELLAN knows perfectly well the intended policy of the men who are his supporters, and they have purposely left this loop-hole in their letter.

But after this fine flourish about Union, what does the letter end in? In the acceptance of the nomination offered by the framers and supporters of the platform, and by falling into line with Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON a frank disunionist. To know the real significance of this campaign, therefore, and the true position of the candidates, we are to ascertain the views and intentions of their supporters.

The organ of M'CLELLAN in New York, which informs a sympathetic world that it "loves" him, says that when he accepted the nomination he, of course, accepted the platform.

The Cincinnati Enquirer, a VALLANDIGHAM paper, says that M'CLELLAN "stands on the platform erected by the Convention as far as it goes, and adds another," which, "under his administration would never be required for use."

The Chicago Times, one of the most virulent submission sheets in the country, says: "He accepts the trust and with it all the conditions named."

The Boston Courier, which declares the war infamous, unscrupulously advocates the election of M'CLELLAN.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM says that while M'CLELLAN will adhere to the Union (Mr. V. himself proposes to divide it into quarters), yet "he is committed to peace, and he is a gentleman, and will carry out every pledge made—he is committed to resort to peaceable instrumentalities to accomplish that purpose." Mr. V. made the Chicago platform, seconded the nomination of M'CLELLAN, has read his letter, and, as the Cincinnati Enquirer says, will "cordially support and vote for M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON."

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, who, as Mayor of New York, regretted that he could not send arms to the rebels to shoot loyal men with, says that he shall give all his influence and weight to the election of M'CLELLAN, and that his letter declares for compromise.

Mr. BOND, of Pennsylvania, said, at Chicago, that "if they wanted the war to go on, then they should support LINCOLN." But he, BOND, of Pennsylvania, as a peace man, was in favor of M'CLELLAN.

"Capt." KOONTZ, of Pittsburg, remarked that "if Democrats catch LINCOLN'S b——y astrap among them they will cut him to shred—d threads, that's all. It is the duty of every American to vote for a peace candidate.....I—a Democrat and his regular followed!—I should like to see the noble GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN as President; and that great Democrat, HORATIO SEYMOUR, should be Secretary of State." The "Capt." we hope, stopped soon at the LINCOLN despotism" which suppresses free speech.

Mr. PERRINE, after some indecent remarks disparaging Mr. LINCOLN and extolling JEFFERSON DAVIS, asked that "the people shall bow down to the will of the people, and they will have willed for them B. M'CLELLAN shall be nominated and elected."

"Capt." ISAIAH RYNDERS said: "We are one and all for peace.....my first choice is HORATIO SEYMOUR."

A Memphis "gentleman" gave his voice for peace, and invoked the election of the gallant M'CLELLAN.

Mr. "Sunset" COX declared "the war a failure," and supported M'CLELLAN.

HORATIO SEYMOUR, the President of the following Convention, says that "part of the Government "to coerce States;" that is, to enforce the laws; and said in Wisconsin that the Chicago candidate was the representative of the principles of those who nominated him.

The resolutions of the State Conventions of the party during the year, as in Maine, Kentucky, Illinois, and elsewhere, are all in the key of the Chicago platform.

These are the men and the influences which went to Chicago, declared the war a failure, called for submission to the rebellion, and nominated M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON. These are the men upon whose support PENDLETON and M'CLELLAN rely. Because they are willing to take the popular wrath, M'CLELLAN strikes a fine attitude and shouts, "The Union at all hazards!" in the honest sense of the word. What says his party—what say his backers and supporters? "Wait till we elect our man," says shrewd old ANDY KENDALL, "and then we can do what we please."

Is it to such men in such a crisis that the people of the United States are likely to intrust the Government of the United States? What is merely a fool-hardy experiment upon the intelligence of the American people.

GEN. SHERMAN ON "A CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES."

IT is refreshing to turn from the shame of the Chicago confession of rebel invincibility and the dastardly national submission of the Democracy to the noble order of General SHERMAN congratulating his troops. It has the manly ring of all his words and all his acts. It is modest, clear, vigorous, and full of the spirit of generous pride in the great achievements of his trained and heroic soldiers. A brief history of the unbroken continuity of successful campaigning, of the patience and skill of the enemy, a word of heart-felt honor and sorrow for the fallen, naturally culminate in an expression of the profoundest faith in the grand old cause to which every true heart is devoted.

Let all faithful Americans who are not willing to see their country humiliated and ruined, and its Government overthrown by the arms or the arts of rebels, compare the following passages from General SHERMAN'S order and from Messrs. VALLANDIGHAM'S and SEYMOUR'S platform, for whose candidates our votes are asked. The M'CLELAN-PENDLETON resolution says:

"This Convention does explicitly declare as the sense of the American people that after four years of failure to restore the Union by the experiment of war....immediate efforts be made for a cessation of hostilities."

Hear now a declaration of the sense of the American soldier:

"This completed the grand task which had been assigned us by our Government, and your General again repeats his personal and official thanks to all the officers and men composing this army, for the indomitable courage and perseverance which alone could give success. We have beaten the enemy on every ground he has chosen, and have wrested from him his own Gate City, where was located his foundries, arsenals, and work-shops, deemed secure on account of their distance from our base, and the seemingly impregnable obstacles intervening. Nothing is impossible to an army like this, determined to vindicate a Government which has risen wherever our flag has once floated, and is resolved to maintain them at any and all cost."

Upon the first platform stand M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON, VALLANDIGHAM and the WOODS, FRANKLIN PIERCE and HORATIO SEYMOUR. Upon the last stand LINCOLN and JOHNSON, GRANT and SHERMAN, SHERIDAN and CANBY, FARRAGUT and PORTER. With which of these, American citizens, are the honor, dignity, and peace of the nation most secure?

MAJOR-GENERAL GEORGE H. PENDLETON B. M'CLELLAN.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN, the candidate of "an immediate cessation of hostilities" and "peaceable methods" with rebels who defy the Government, and slaughter and torture loyal citizens and soldiers, stands arm-in-arm upon the Chicago Platform with Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON. If you vote for the one you vote for the other. It is but a choice figure with two faces. The one turned North is called GEORGE B. The one turned South is called GEORGE H. GEORGE B., in a military coat, says, "The Union at all hazards!" GEORGE H., with the CALHOUN starch in his cravat, asks, "Now, Sir, what force of arms can compel a State to obedience?" Saying that which her State Government, supported by the sentiment of her people, is determined to persist in doing?"

"The Union at all hazards!" shouts the military GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN, heroically for six months into the mouths of Quaker guns. "No, no, no," votes the civil GEORGE H. against all the bills to support by military authority of the Government. At Antietam GEORGE B. gives LEE a day to draw off his army from destruction. In Washington GEORGE H. votes that it is not the duty of the people to overcome the rebellion, and that the seceding States should be allowed to go with assurances of distinguished consideration.

Which is it? Who is it? What is it? If a man votes for the Chicago nominees does he really believe that he is voting against the rebellion? What do the candidates think he is to vote for? In the universal confusion he can be perfectly sure of one thing only, and that is, that he is voting exactly as JEFF DAVIS and the rebels wish him to vote. "Hurrah for M'CLEL'N and PEN'TON!" shouted an estimable "Conservative" voter, whose wits were bewildered either with wine or with the hopeless Chicago fog. "I mean for M'CHELAN and P'LENTON! No, that ain't it. Hurrah, I say, for M'KENNEL and PEL'TON!" The poor fellow got further from the mark at every attempt, until he finally gave it up in despair, exclaiming, "Oh! d—a such a mixed up mess! Hurrah for JEFF DAVIS!"

THE SIMPLE QUESTION.

IF lanterns voted and rockets argued—if shouts carried an election, and a New York crowd in Union Square were the same thing people at the ballot-box, Mr. PENDLETON and General M'CLELLAN ought to be contented. Possibly the illumination of the meeting in Union Square a week since may have been bright enough to be visible at several miles distance. But dazzling as it was, we can assure our friends outside the city that it did not observe in the least the plain question before the country.

There are but two candidates and two platforms. Every voter will support one or the other. Every voter wishes the unconditional maintenance of the Government will vote for LINCOLN and JOHNSON; while all who have the faith in the power of the Government to sustain itself—all who think that the "Confederacy" should be recognized—all who hold that a State is "sovereign," and may leave the National Government and the other States, but must not itself be "coerced"—all who intend that the national debt shall be repudiated—all who believe that the war is and ought to be a failure, and that there should be an immediate cessation of hostilities, will vote for M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON.

We do not think those citizens who honestly mean the absolute maintenance of the Government will not vote for PENDLETON and M'CLELLAN—but in what company will they find themselves?

The hope of the M'CLELLAN-PENDLETON managers is to carry the State of New York by securing the Chicago candidates an immense majority in the city. That they will have a majority here nobody doubts. But does any body doubt that the same city would cast a hearty majority to-morrow to make peace on JEFFERSON DAVIS's terms? Can the majority of such a city be considered a Union majority? Can the candidates who will unquestionably receive it be considered in good faith Union candidates, especially when one of them frankly says that the Government has no right to maintain itself by force, and that if we can not conciliate the rebels we must "let the seceding States depart in peace?"

All the colored lanterns in the country, all the denunciation of the President of the United States as a bloody monster, a usurper, an ape, a joker, and a buffoon, can not blind the common sense of the American people to the issue.

FOREWARNED IS FOREARMED.

AT the late M'CLELLAN meeting in the city of New York, Mr. BIDDLE, of Philadelphia, formerly President of the Keystone Club, said that "If Mr. LINCOLN remained in office under the plea of military necessity, when 'Little Mac' was legally elected the next President, the people must use force to install into their chief magistrate."

Mr. W. J. ROSE said

"That if any unfair means were used by the Administration to hold power under any plea but justice, then the people must show their mights and power in enforcing their claims."

Governor PARKER said that the speech of Mr. SEWARD at Auburn

"Conveyed a threat that, in case Mr. LINCOLN should be defeated at the polls, he would resort to the means generally adopted by despots, and endeavor to perpetuate his reign by the force of the bayonet."

Mr. JOHN KELLY said:

"Let no effort be wanting, and in the way of the people at the ballot-box. It was done once before—let it not be done again."

Mr. John M'KEON said:

"There men are determined to exercise their rights at the ballot-box, and will the Administration dare to bring military power to bear upon you?"

Mr. A. OAKEY HALL said:

"There is yet a more dangerous kind of tactics which our opponents hold in reserve. It is that which threatens with bayonets and cannon those with bullets, and we have that to fear in the elections."

Judge CONSTOCK said:

"The power has been laid upon the free suffrages of the people; yet if the people be defrauded by military intervention of the rebels, the people must and will take GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN in their arms, and carry him to the Presidency."

From whom does this kind of talk come? From the supporters of the only party members of which have ever resisted by force the result of a constitutional election. From the late political allies and the present apologists of JEFFERSON DAVIS and the rebels.

For what purpose is it used? To give occasion and excuse when the result of the election if the Government shall take measures to prevent fraud at the polls.

These fiery and foolish orators should remember that their late friends the rebels at the South, and themselves at the North, tried to carry the last Presidential election by the same kind of threats. They menaced the people with civil war then if they did not submit to the dictation of DAVIS and YANCEY and TOOMBS, and allow BRECKINRIDGE to be elected; and the people of every free State in the land spurned them and their threats.

They believe these people to be now thoroughly cowed and craven, and utterly whipped in by DAVIS and his crew, and a fiery crash the whip once more, and threaten fire and slaughter if M'CLELLAN is not elected. Well, do Vermont and Maine proceed to be very quiet indeed and do the gentlemen suppose that threats which could not intimidate a people actually rusty with peace and general of war, are likely to appall the same people when for four years they have been trained to war and are still in arms? These orators will discover, as the rebels are fast learning, that the people of the United States do not intend to be Mexicanized; and that politicians merely betray the frantic desperation of their cause when they conduct a Presidential canvass by bloody threats instead of arguments.

"A SOURCE OF FEAR AND DREAD."

MR. AUGUST BELMONT, Chairman of the National "Democratic" Committee—the gentleman at whose house, as was published in the newspapers at the time, an Englishman was allowed to wear a rebel badge without reproof from the host—a gentleman of such uncertain loyalty that there was long and serious opposition to placing his name upon the Committee of the Metropolitan Sanitary Fair, and a gentleman known as an ostentatious partisan of General M'CLELLAN—said at the last meeting in Union Square, as reported in the papers, "that the nomination of General M'CLELLAN (and of course his companion PENDLETON) was a source of fear and dread to the Southern leaders."

Let us see if it is.

M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON are the candidates of the party which calls itself "Democratic." The nomination of M'CLELLAN was seconded by Mr. VALLANDIGHAM, who has been the faithful friend of the rebels, and the steady apologist of the rebellion. Every man who has been conspicuous for resisting every measure necessary for carrying on the war loudly electioneers for him. The presumption therefore is, that the rebels would not feel very sore or greatly aggrieved by his nomination. And, despite the assurance of MR. BELMONT, they do not. Speaking of MR. LINCOLN'S possible defeat the Richmond Examiner says:

"A new party will succeed to power, which will sheathe the sword and hold out the olive branch."

Again:

"If the Administration fails the war will fail....believe me, a war abandoned by you—emphatically, the war failed to subdue the South; and because the inference will be irresistible that the war could be re-instituted by a war administration in the full vigor of Federal resources, can not be by a peace administration reasonably to power after those resources had been materially reduced."

Again:

"The Democratic party would have been forever obliged to General Brown if he had managed to hold Atlanta for another fortnight."

The Atlanta Register, speaking of the Chicago party several months since, says:

"Meanwhile if they will use the ballot-box against MR. LINCOLN, while we use the cartridge-box, each side will be a helper to the other."

Even before the Chicago Convention had declared for submission to the rebellion the Richmond Examiner said:

"A Democratic victory at the North would be a subject of much gratification."

Again:

"In one way, and one way only, can we influence the result, but that is the most potential method. It is by making some quick and fierce blows now, both by hand and sea."

In other words, national defeat and humiliation insures the success of the Chicago party. An army letter in the New York Herald says:

"MR. BRADY is now making outside the stockade bad frequent conversations with rebel officers..... The prevailing belief is that the Democrats will elect a President that will help us."

The Examiner of the 8th September says:

"Every defeat of LINCOLN'S forces....inures to the advantage of PENDLETON.... The failure of the South, more powerful in the shock of battle than when throwing her undisciplined in an electoral college, will be cast in favor of MCCLELLAN by this indirect yet efficacious means."

These are but a few of the words of the Southern leaders. Do such expressions show, as MR. BELMONT declares, that those leaders "fear and dread" the success of the Chicago candidates? "Here and there are to be found," says a leading rebel journal, "MR. PIERCE, our Wises, BRIGHAM, ONE WOOD, and two SEYMOURS like the five just men in Sodom." Well, these five just men eminently support PENDLETON and MCCLELLAN, and for that matter, MR. BELMONT gravely says that the rebels "fear and dread" their success. But if the success of PENDLETON, VALLANDIGHAM, WOOD, MCCLELLAN, and SEYMOURS, inspires "fear and dread" among the rebels, what will be their emotions at that of LINCOLN, GRANT, JOHNSON, SHERIDAN, FARRAGUT, and SHERMAN?

SHERIDAN AND THE SHENANDOAH.

GENERAL PHILIP SHERIDAN and his gallant officers and men do not seem anxious for "an immediate cessation of hostilities." They are of the opinion of General DIX, that if you would pull down the American flag, or resists with arms the American Government, he is to be shot upon the spot: and is not to be bimewed with under the shade of olive branches. We can assure the brave boys in the Shenandoah Valley that they made a whole country happy on Tuesday the 6th September, when the news of their victory came—a whole country except those who, two years ago, invoked the interference of England, and who now, in company with the British Embassy, are in despair over our national successes.

But the great multitude of loyal American citizens have fought the fight through in Maryland and the Army of the Shenandoah, while they and their children will forever hold in sacred remembrance the good honor the heroic SHERIDAN and his companions, who have fought their last fight, and have died that their country may live. Peace to the soldiers' memory! A regenerated nation will build their monuments.

The importance of the Shenandoah victory will be soon perceived. It shuts up the Richmond authorities, by disposal of the forces that was able to send to protect it. He must, therefore, either send another force to dispute SHERIDAN'S advance to Lynchburg—or he must come out and give GRANT battle—or he must evacuate Virginia. The genius of GRANT is once more illustrated by his chosen General, and we hope that SHERIDAN will do with Winchester what SHERMAN is doing with Atlanta, make it a fortified base of operations.

There is no need of pointing the moral of this victory. Every body felt it when the news came. There is a party and there are candidates whose chances of success were diminished by it, and will be further diminished by every victory of our arms; a party and candidates whose chances would be increased if news came that FARRAGUT had been defeated before Mobile Bay, and SHERMAN from Atlanta, and SHERIDAN from Winchester, and that GRANT had been driven to the James. Are those the party and the candidates which the American people will delight to honor? They will answer for themselves on the 8th of November

THE TWO DROMIOS.

ON Saturday, September 17, the Honorable ROBERT C. WINTHROP addressed a letter in two ways refused to associate with Senator WILSON of Massachusetts, came all the way to New York to strike hands and sit upon the same platform with the Honorable FERDINAND WOOD and Citizen ISAIAH RYNDERS of New York. MR. WINTHROP made a speech for MCCLELLAN and PENDLETON, and kicked at the letter of acceptance. MR. WINTHROP and MR. WOOD will together for MCCLELLAN and PENDLETON. Which is which, and who is who? Is it MR. WINTHROP or MR. WOOD who would determine the policy of their candidates if they could be elected?

How can MR. WINTHROP seriously believe that he serves the Union better by voting for MR. PENDLETON, an avowed disunionist and peace-at-any-price man, than by voting for friend MR. EDWARD EVERETT serves it by voting for ANDREW JOHNSON? MR. WINTHROP by his presumptuous dishonesty deserts DANIEL WEBSTER for JOHN C. CALHOUN.

"PEACE."

WE invite thoughtful citizens to ponder these words of MR. JOHN MCKEON, an ardent "peace" supporter of the PENDLETON-MCCLELLAN nomination. MR. MCKEON is a gentleman per excellence, there will be a bloody revolution North and West.

Who will make it? The friends of the successful candidates, or the friends of "peace" who import carbines and pistols to resist the Government, who regret that they can not send arms to the rebels in Atlanta, Mobile, and who vote for MCCLELLAN and PENDLETON?

We are, then, to understand, from past experience and from present threats, that the Chicago party does not elect its candidates, it will take up arms. The Chicago party thus proclaims itself to be the Mexican party. To that the platform invites citizens who wish to stand upon? DR. JOHN MCKEON forgets that the days of Plantation rule are past. The American people will not submit to be ruled by a party that came into voting for submission to JEFFERSON DAVIS, WIGFALL, & Co. by any such crack of the whip as this. YANCEY frayed out the snapper of that whip when he made his speech in Montgomery four years ago.

CAMPAIGN PICTURES.

THE large picture in this paper of the soldiers and sailors rallying around the flag in the hands of the Constitutional standard-bearer is an argument which no man can escape. The striking illustration of the simple issue of this election could any Union Club hang upon its walls? What more convincing document could any Committee circulate?

And so with MR. NAST'S "Compromise with the South," published in the Weekly of September 24. It has all the force of a political publication, for it shows at a glance exactly what the Chicago party believes to be the condition of the country. It is the true Democratic estimate upon the principles which the Chicago candidates represent, and which, we believe, the people will repel with as overwhelming and just an indignation as they did the rebel shot at Sumter.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

SHERIDAN'S VICTORY.

GENERAL GRANT'S visit to Sheridan was of so small importance, being the prelude to one of the most important and successful victories of the war, that we shall not dwell on the weeks, keeping hold of the railroad from Harper's Ferry to Winchester, which was occupied by our troops. Sheridan would hardly immediately apparent the moment that he should move. The rebels were posted in a strong position. At the latter point on Sunday, the 18th, Averill's division of cavalry was engaged with Rosser's and Lomax's division of Early's army. Gordon was driven back from the west of Winchester, and Early's whole command had now offered; he immediately broke camp and determined to fight a decisive battle. Sheridan massed his forces in front and Berryville pike, with his entire command, including Crook's corps, on Wednesday morning, the 21st, at 3 o'clock in the morning from the encampment near Summit Point and Charlestown. The battle commenced at daylight, and about 8 o'clock, on the 19th, Wilson's cavalry crossed in advance of Crook's corps, and drove the rebels back upon the Winchester side. The Sixth Corps was the first across and waited for no bridge, but waded through the shallow ford. This delay gave Early time to form his line of battle with his left resting on the Valley turnpike and Middletown, and his right on Cedar Creek, with Ramseur, Gordon, and Rodes, and Ramseur. On the arrival of the Sixth Corps Sheridan formed his line to the extent of three miles, which had been formed in a position to resist Sheridan's advance. On the left the rebel army extended through and with artillery in position, had a great advantage, and for about two hours the Union army suffered considerable losses, and was driven back a short distance and in some confusion. The rebel army was elated with the success, and the artillery got in position, and the line reformed and the artillery got in position, and after an obstinate fight the last position was regained. Crook's advance, the right, and the two armies of the South brought up to confronted each other in full strength, so Averill's command, with Custer's, Merritt's, and one division of Crook's came about north of the main attack, and struck on the right. Custer, Merritt, Averill, Wilson, and Crook had formed on Sheridan's right and rear. The rebel army was driven back and broken and routed after a tremendous artillery fire; and shortly after this advance of the cavalry and Crook's corps the infantry leaders in an impetuous charge which broke the ranks of the rebel army. In this charge between seven and eight hundred prisoners were taken.

The enemy routed and in confusion fled toward Winchester, through which and beyond they were pursued by their victorious cavalry. The rebel loss is roughly estimated at between 4000 and 5000 killed and wounded, and 5000 captured. The rebel Generals Rhodes and Wharton are reported killed, and Generals Bradley T. Johnson, Ramseur, Pegram, and Gordon wounded. Fifteen battle-flags were captured and five guns. The Federal loss is recorded as follows: Generals killed in Crook's Devil's Russell, First Division, sixth Corps. General McIntosh, Third Brigade, Second Division, was wounded, also General Upton of Sixth Corps.

THE VIRGINIA CAMPAIGN.

From the extracts below it seems there is little to record. On the 16th the rebels captured about 2500 head of cattle from Kautz's command, which they were intended for the army on the north bank of the James. Grugg's cavalry on the 18th pursued, but failed to recover the stolen property.

GENERAL SHERMAN.

Sherman's army is concentrated at Atlanta. The city is to be made a grand military post. All the inhabitants, except a few families, have been sent away, and a few of us days, commencing September 14, has been established to protect the boundary of the city. Sherman's original army is now brought down to its troop September 8:

Special Correspondence of the New York Herald.

IN THE FIELD, ATLANTA, GA., Sept. 8, 1864.

Special Field Orders, No. 68.

The officers and soldiers of the armies of the Cumberland, Tennessee, and Georgia are hereby tendered the thanks of the Nation through its President and Commander-in-Chief, for the determination early for his services has been with you from the beginning, and who intrusts you for the future with the care of his country and for their intelligence, fidelity, and courage displayed in the campaign of Atlanta.

On the first of May our armies were lying in partisan, extending from Ringgold to Rocky Face, and my army lay behind his rocky-faced barrier at Dalton, proud, defiant, and confident. We had lost none since Chickamauga to recover from his discomfiture on the Mission Ridge, with his ranks filled, and a new commander-in-chief, second to none of the Confederacy in reputation for skill, sagacity, and confidence. All was in one our armies assumed life and action, and appeared before Dalton. Johnston's army, reinforced by the remains of Polk's, and the rebel army only escaped by the rapidity of its retreat. Resaca, Kingston, Cassville with which we have fossilize, and which were strategic to us. Again he took position at Allatoona Pass, and we pressed by a circuit toward Dallas and subsequent movement to Acworth, we gained the Etowah River. Then followed a wonderful battles about Kenesaw, and the escape of the enemy across the Chattahoochee.

The crossing of the Chattahoochee and breaking of the Atlanta line will be historically canonized by us, and will be studied as an example in the art of war. At this time both of our grand armies were concentrated with their old and skillful commander, and selected one more bold and skillful, and the rebel army was defeated, badly and rapidly, on the 20th of July, fell on our right flank, and struck our rear. Again on the 22d we attack our extreme left, and was severely punished; and finally, on the 28th, we repulsed the attempt on our right, and that time must have been satisfied, for since then we have had undisputed possession of the road slowly and gradually drew our lines from Atlanta, feeling for the flanks of the enemy, and on the 31st of August struck another a piece of importance. We must concede to our enemy the right to fight on the defensive, and to us that of last he made the mistake we had waited for so long, and was his own ruin. Then we stripped the road to the rail. Instantly our cavalry was on his only remaining road, the Macon road, and the infantry built a parapet, and Atlanta fell into our possession as the fruit of well-conceived and executed plan of the indomitable energy, perseverance which since only could crown success.

We have taken from the enemy all ground he has chosen, and have wrested from him his own God's City, which was regarded by Southern chivalry as the very citadel of their country. Let us not be unmindful of their distance from our base and the tremendous obstacles we have had to overcome. Nothing is impossible to an army like this, determination, courage, and endurance which has right to victory our flag has once floated, and is resolved to maintain them to say and all ours.

In our campaign many, yes, very many of our noble officers and men have preceded us to our common destination, the grave; but they have left the memory of deeds on which a nation can build a proud future. M'Pherson, Harker, M'Cook, and others dear to us all, are now but standing their sentinels on our minds that should each more closely together the living, who have to complete the task which they have begun so far in better fortune. I ask all to continue, so they have to well begun, the culmination of success. The enemy must have vanished our own and other countries. Courage, patience, obedience to law, and fraternity toward our fellow-soldiers, confidence fidelity to our trusts and good feeling among each other: each trust in the other, and all in the presence of Almighty God, and it will then require no prophet to foretell the result. It is for us to make sure that the victories we have purified by the fires of war, and worthy of its great foundation—Liberty and Union.

W. T. SHERMAN,
Major-General Commanding.

The following dispatch was received by Grant on General Sherman in answer to the latter's dispatch announcing the capture of Atlanta:

CITY POINT, VA., Sept. 4, 1864—P. M.

Major-General Sherman:

I have just received your dispatch announcing the capture of Atlanta. In honor of your great victory I have ordered a salute to be fired this afternoon from every battery bearing upon the enemy. The salute will be fired within an hour from this point rejoicing.

THE MEXICANS AT BROWNSVILLE.

A somewhat exaggerated account of the war took place lately on the Rio Grande. September 6 the Imperialists attacked Brownsville, Texas. They were met in the battle by General Cortinas and severely repulsed. The French and Austrian consuls at Matamoras, Brownsville's opposite the Matamoras in Texas, and was held by a Confederate force under General Slaughter, who crossed the river to operate against Cortinas in the rear. Cortinas, disposing of his French prisoners, sent them across into the Confederate and drove them to Brownsville: pursuing them across the river, he occupied Brownsville and erected the United States colors.

THE DEMOCRATIC STATE CONVENTION.

The Democratic State Convention met September 21 at Albany and nominated Horatio Seymour for Governor, and FRANCIS KERNAN for Lieutenant-Governor. The resolutions strongly indorsed the Chicago platform and the candidates of the Chicago Convention.

INTERESTING ITEMS.

IN the October number of Harper's New Monthly Magazine, just published, Miss Harriet Prescott has contributed one of her most powerful stories, "MR. GIDEON'S WAY." It has unusual dramatic force; the painting is, as it always should be, made subordinate to the movement of the story. It is possible that some of our readers will think the severe sufferings of MR. Considine and her little ones overdrawn. But this will not seem so to those who remember the severity of last winter in the West. The following incident in the same story, with the effect which occurred on Saturday, January 5, is the feature of the Prescott's day. What was seen about to occurred during the night, in a house just outside the northern boundary of the city of Atlanta. A poor woman, whose husband was killed in the war, lived there with her four boys, the youngest five years old and the eldest nine. The woman went into the city on Saturday to make purchases, leaving the children to play in the house. The eldest boy, who was the only remaining child at the time, was left in charge of the house. Carrying the baby in his arms, the eldest brother awoke he found the room filled with smoke, and the little house in flames. He hurried with cold he ran down the stairs, and built a fire against the side of a trunk that stood in the hall, and then he remembered. The fire had caught and burned a hole in the trunk, another in the floor, and had set fire to a portion of the bedclothes. The fire was out, and the stranger arrived in time to save the house, but too late to save life.

MR. DELISLE once observed a fly only so large as a grain of sand, which ran three inches in half a second, and in that proportion to the enormous magnitude of about 140 forty steps. If a man were to be able to run so fast in proportion to his size, he would easily run round the globe, he would in the course of a minute have run upward of 1000 miles. He would far surpass the fastest railway engines, or the famous "Seven League Boots" in the nursery tale. He would be able to visit the moon or any other animal whatever. The flea can leap two hundred times as far as itself—no one can do better. Some spiders can leap a couple of feet upon their prey.

A few years ago a young man was engaged between Hans Steinman and Marguerite Blankes. There was an disparity in their fortunes. Hans was a poor boy, and Marguerite's father a baker. Unhappily the latter, from imprudent speculations, became bankrupt, and was sent to Dreisbaln, who being unable to get the money he to him. Hans, who had agreed Hiring for Marguerite's hand, to cancel the debt, provided the girl's father would break off his engagement with Hans, and give his consent to say

SQUARE TALK.

I think we're pretty well agreed
About this coming struggle;
We want the fair and square thing done,
No politicians' juggle.
We want a man who'll be all that—
All that with heart and hand,
To give us back the Union;
And that is where we stand.

We want the best that's made, we do,
Expense 's of no account;
Just let us have the proper thing,
And draw for the amount.
We want the Union back again,
Each inch of lake and land;
The old stars, and nothing less;
And that is where we stand.

We want the right—the rightest man—
We do not care a fig
Whether he's a Black Republican,
Blue Democrat, or Whig:
He may be purple Carmelite,
Or yellow Ampraznd;
We want the Union back again,
And that is where we stand.

A good square 'peace ain't bad to take,
And war is rather rough;
Of one we ain't had much of late,
Of t'other quite enough.
If Union can be pieced, you know,
Well! peace it right away;
We want the Union back again,
And that is what we say.

If peace don't prove the proper game,
Well, then, bullet out;
We only want to know, you know—
There's lots of boys about.
If honor don't stick strong enough,
We'll try the effex of steel.
We're bound to have the Union,
And that is how we feel.

We're all agreed on this one point,
Except a few old traitors,
Who don't amount at best, you know,
To very small potaters.
We're all agreed on this one point,
The Union and square.
Peace if we can, war if we must,
And that is where we are.

We want the brave old flag to wave
From Texas up to Maine,
From Delaware to Golden Gate,
Around, and back again,
Over each blade of grass that grows,
And every grain of sand,
The Stars and Stripes, and Union,
Thank God, for these we stand!

THE LITTLE DOCTOR.

JESSIE RYE was twenty-three. The sun of that birthday had just risen, and she stood before her looking-glass, fastening in her ears and about her slender throat and dainty wrists the pearls which had been her uncle's gift the night before.

"An old maid!" muttered Jessie, between those pearls of teeth which rivaled the gems about her neck. "An old maid? I think not, Uncle Walter; I think not." And again she laughed, gleefully.

Presently, however, she grew a little graver; she took the pearls off, dropped them into their nest, and sat down to think over her uncle's words of the night before.

"Jessie," he had said to her, "to-morrow you will be twenty-three. You are young and pretty still; but youth and woman's beauty are fleeting things. And you and you'll find yourself an old maid alone in the world, for I can not live long. My threescore and ten years are upon me even now, and you have a rather relentless ox earth. You have plenty of suitors, child; and I wish I could see you the wife of some good man before I die. Make your choice this year, and give your old uncle the hope of living to bless you on your wedding-day."

"Poor dear uncle!" sighed Jessie, as the words came back to her memory. "He is worth a host of sad lovers to me. I enjoy my freedom yet. Make my choice! He may be right after all. Make my choice? What should I choose, I wonder?" Then she began to count dreamily, touching the rosy tips of her right-hand fingers to those of her left.

"Charlie Wier—but he is a mere coxcomb, though as handsome as man well can be; Edward Burr—a poet, a musician, and hideously selfish. Vivian Garnet—too young, no man should be less than five years older than his wife; Colonel Grey—too old, though we are fascinating, his daughter says he is not. Alfred Earle—passable; young Moreland—he adores me. I know; Mr. Ashley Honeywell—I haven't known him long, but certainly he surpasses any one of our set, the richest, the most elegant, every way accomplished—such a fine Roman profile, such dark, blue eyes, such a soldierly bearing. And I believe he admires me. I wish I were sure of it. He would be a conquest worth the trouble. Heigh-ho!

"And there's the little Doctor; bless his bold head, I believe he thinks me perfection. How his color rises and his breath comes fast and short when I speak to him. A smile makes him happy; if I am distant he grows mournful.

She had absolutely drawn a pretty note-book from her bureau drawer as she spoke and had made a list: Charlie Wier, Edward Burr, Vivian Garnet, Colonel Grey, Alfred Earle, Guy Moreland, Ashley Honeywell, and Dr. Oliver.

"One of these I must choose ere the year is out," she said; "and don't flatter yourself that it will be you, Dr. Oliver."

Putting the last touches to her toilet she went down stairs, and breakfast not being ready, sauntered out into the garden.

There among the flowers she found a gentleman looking very closely at some geraniums.

"Good-morning, Miss Rue," he said.

"Good-morning, Doctor," she replied. "You are out early."

"I came hoping to see you. I have a favor to ask, Miss Rue."

"A favor?"

"Yes. You know my little bachelor dwelling boasts no garden, will you let me pick a bouquet here every morning at this hour? I should be very much obliged."

"Certainly, Doctor. Will you have one now? You might have helped yourself and welcome; lend me your knife." And the soldierly hands were busy among the roses, violets, and golden crocus. The bouquet arranged she bound it deftly with soft green grass, and handed it to the Doctor with a smile which she knew would make his heart beat.

"Thank you," he said. "You are very, very kind," and the bright eyes glanced behind the glasses. He walked beside her now in the garden-path—an upright, rather fine, broad-shouldered figure; but not tall, with a good, kind face, and a prematurely bald crown, about which the black curls clustered like a priest's tonsure, quietly listening while she chatted. Half an hour he spent loitering in the garden gate, and she went in laughing.

"A transparent ruse," she said. He wants to see me often—Dr. Oliver, Dr. Oliver; and Jessie Rue's cheeks were rosy as she sat down at the breakfast-table with her old uncle and chatted of the quiet life of the Eastwoods that night, and where she expected to meet Ashley Honeywell.

Ashley was at the party. Dr. Oliver was there also—in a corner, talking politics with the old grandfather; but not after supper did he find an opportunity to approach Jessie. She saw him making his way through a sea of crinoline—now and then treading on a bouncer or a train—but making no approbation of a chair vacated for a moment by Mr. Honeywell, was not gracious. He did not take it, but leaned over her chair.

"Miss Rue," he said, "may I have the pleasure of escorting you home to-night?" His voice had a pleading tone in it.

And Jessie heard it, but she answered,

"Thank you, Doctor, but I'm engaged;" and told a white lie when she said at the moment, for she only guessed that Ashley Honeywell would ask to see her home. Yet her heart smote her when she heard the sudden disappointed sigh that the little Doctor's broad chest, and saw him in the distance a few moments afterward looking sad.

At last I speak to him kindly," she said, but he gave her no opportunity; for ten minutes after he had slipped away, and would have been homeward were it not for a short cut across the common.

Ashley Honeywell did what she expected that night. He went home with her, and held them on a last hand in a sweet air of sentiment in them. In a delicious sort of fever she dropped to sleep after peeping through closed shutters for a glimpse of the night among the moonlit road; but, strange to say, she dreamed all night of Dr. Oliver. Over and over again she said cruel things to her tortured away from her with that sigh—such a heart-felt one.

In the morning she was up betimes, and, brushing her bright hair as she sang in her warbler's voice per before the glass, heard some one whistling in the garden. At that she peeped through the curtain last night—Doctor Oliver plucking his bouquet. She called down to him,

"Good-morning!"

He answered her with a bow and smile.

"You shall have one of these geraniums on my window-sill if you will," she said; "my own pet flowers." And she pulled the sash and threw it down.

Dr. Oliver caught, kissed, and put it in his button-hole. This homage from the man lowest on her list pleased the coquette very much as now him take his departure, with many backward glances at her window, she murmured,

"So you do, so you do. I believe were you as handsome as some one I know I could take pity on you."

The evening before a party was given at which Jessie was present and to which she and three of them to go on horseback—May Eastwood, her sister Rose, Jessie, young Moreland, Alfred Earle, and Ashley Honeywell.

May and Rose and their escorts came merrily riding up to the door, and found Jessie in the garden for a few moments. But since the night of the party there had been a change in his manner. It was not Jessie's fault, for she had been lover-like in demonstrations.

Ashley Honeywell, the handsome and aristocratic, looked at her shrine, as I every girl who knew her envied her. Jessie Rue should have been contented, but she was not. Jessie indeed, when the Doctor had gone away with his flowers in his hand, not once looking back, she found herself standing outside the open window in her eyes and a pang of mortification at her heart. Awakening to the consciousness of this she stamped her small foot sorgirly.

"Why should I feel hurt that he cares nothing for me now?" she said. "Let him admire that girl of the cottage if he will. He is nothing to me."

When next she went to the little cottage she found the shutters closed, and the old woman opened the door very softly.

"Good-morning, Miss," she said. "My young lady will be glad to see you. She's been very low-spirited, I think. Mebbe she will die yet." And tears came into the old creature's eyes.

Jessie's thoughts flew to the Doctor. He must have suffered much in the fear of losing his betrothed. For Jessie had resolved upon this state of things. She went into the little bedroom, and there, with the little hands, thinner than ever, folded on the white counterpane, lay Wendeline. She looked at Jessie with a smile, and put up her lips to kiss her.

"I thought I should never see you again," she said. "I am so glad to meet you once more. Do you think I shall die?"

"Why do you ask such a question?"

"Jane thinks so, I know. I heard her praying God to spare me."

"And your friend—what does he think?"

"I do not know. Does it not seem strange to you that any one should not mind dying?"

"Oh yes."

"I do not, Miss Jessie."

"You—so lovely, so young, so—"

Beloved was on Jessie's tongue, but she did not utter it.

"I am young—at least I am not twenty yet—but life is not a happy thing to me. You do not know what trouble I have had."

"You have lost your parents?"

"Yes, yes, yes."

The girl shuddered all over and hid her face in both her hands.

"I have been very wicked," she said. "Oh! Miss Jessie, if you knew all, perhaps you would not love me. But I think I am dying, and I beg you to come again. Next time I will tell you my story. You are religious, are you not?"

"Not as I should be; but I belong to the church."

"Then you can tell me more than I can think for myself. I can not believe God will pardon me; yet they say He is very merciful to sinners."

Jessie put back the golden curls from the white forehead.

"I can not be very wicked, Wendeline," she said. "You are too pretty—too much like a child."

"Pretty!" The girl shuddered all over as she repeated the word. "Oh, Miss Jessie, I wish I had been born with an ugly face. I'd rather have been black, like dear old Jane. I have been a curse to me to be pretty as I know I am."

Soothing her, half-fancying her delirious, Jessie sat beside the girl for hours. When they parted she promised to return in a few days.

The next day it rained, and the next, then came riding parties, fishing parties, boating parties—a round of pleasure. At last came Jessie's birthday, and a regular evening party.

Laughter and mirth and music filled the house.

The Doctor was there; but in the early part of the evening a boy came running to say that Squire Walker of the Bend had fallen down in a fit, and he left them.

The silver tongue of the time-piece on the mantle had counted two when Jessie left the crowded parlors and stepped out upon the porch. She was not in a merry mood, and longed to be alone for a few moments. As she stood there she saw in the moonlight a strange crooked form half-running, half-hobbling toward the house. It entered the garden gate, and came forward her, and while she was wondering whether it were witch or brownie it flung back an old black hood, and revealed the face of the mulatto Jane.

"Oh, Miss!" she cried, "can you tell me where Dr. Oliver is? They told me he was over here. Oh, you do know the young lady Miss Wendeline thinks so much of; she's dying, Miss, I'm afraid, and there's only a child of ten with her. Oh, call the Doctor, Miss!"

"Dr. Oliver is not here," said Jessie. "He has been, but he has gone. Do you know Squire Walker's place?"

"Oh yes, Miss."

"You'll find him there, and I will go to Wendeline."

"God bless you, Miss!"

He was a man of few words, and only asked, when the gig was ready, "Shall I get my cost, Miss? This here is my stable jacket."

"No; time is a very thing just now." And in a moment they were whirling along the road at full speed.

Far in the distance Jessie saw the light in the cottage window, and her heart beat fast as she entered the little room. A rough bed of straw in ragged garments lay by the bed, and on it lay poor Wendeline. The moment Jessie's eyes rested on her face she knew that the old woman was right—her hour was numbered.

"You have come," the poor girl half-whispered. "I am so thankful. Send little Maggie home. I want to talk with you. They have been here. I saw them."

"Who have been here?" asked Jessie.

"Mother and father—one sat beside me, the other stood just there at the foot of the bed. Mother smiled; but father looked so stern."

"It was a dream," said Jessie.

"No; I was awake. Oh, dear Miss Jessie! you do not know why I feared to see them. I did so wrong! I broke their hearts, I did, indeed, when I left them. Father and mother could not parcked girl that I was! I left home to die—to die in sin, and on her death-bed, think how I must have sinned! They wanted me to marry Cousin Oliver—"

Jessie started.

"My parents, I mean. He was very good; but so shy, and I knew that my parents knew me, but did not love me; and he was so much older. I ran away one night with a gentleman who had fallen in love with me, and of whom my parents knew nothing. But he was very handsome, and said he could not live without me. We were married, and went to Europe. I wrote many a letter to mother; they never forgave me; and, at last, I heard that they were both dead, and that grief for my disobedience killed them.

"That made me low-spirited, and my husband began to care less for me. At last one day I heard he had devoted himself to a beautiful Italian lady, and I grew jealous. I reproached him, saying that his wife deserved his respect if not his love, and he told me the awful truth; our marriage was a false one. I was a poor degraded creature. I think my heart broke then. Still, alone with him in a strange land, what could I do? So I lived with him still. Sometimes he was kind, sometimes cruel. At last he said we would return to America.

"We went on board of the ship together late at night. In the morning I found myself far upon the ocean, and alone. Ashley had gone to the shore again in a boat, while I thought him on deck. He left a note and some money.

"He was tired of me, he said, and I of him, and it was best to part.

"I was very ill after that—delirious, I believe, but it was over. Ashley Honeywell and I would never meet again."

"Ashley Honeywell?" gasped Jessie.

"Yes, that was his name. Oh, Miss Jessie, do you know him?"

"I do," said Jessie, and her cheek was whiter than that of the dying girl.

"What next?"

"We came to America, and I was alone in New York city. My money, save and scrape it as I would, lasted but a little while. Then the woman I had boarded with turned me into the streets. It was my nineteenth birthday. That night I went down to a lonely dock meaning to drown myself. As I stood there ready for the leap a hand came upon my shoulder:

"'I have been watching you ten minutes,' he said. 'My poor woman, you are mad just now. Stop; think!'

"I turned and saw the face of my Cousin Oliver. It brought back home memories and my heart burst in tears, and was saved from the great sin of suicide. At last he knew me.

"'Cousin Geraldine,' he cried, 'how have you come to this?'

"So I told him my sad story, and he was very kind and good. He took care of me, and a few days after brought me here to live with old Dame, who had been my nurse, and who loved me dearly. Since that he has been so kind to me I have wanted for nothing. God will bless him I am sure; I do, I will pray for dying breath; but oh, what a strange thing a human heart! I can never banish my love for Ashley Honeywell, who was so cruel to me. I should not have seen him had I lived, but as you know him—oh, Miss Jessie, will you write to him and say 'Wendeline is dead,' only that perhaps he will grieve for me a little?"

"I promise," said pale Jessie.

The dying girl fell back upon her pillow, and then either girl prayed beside her, until a step upon the floor of the outer room told that the Doctor was there.

Old Jane, sobbing for her darling, knelt at the foot of the rude cot. And beside the dying bed Jessie Rue and Dr. Oliver met each other.

Wendeline seemed past speaking now.

She put one soft white hand in Dr. Oliver's, the other still in Jessie's. And the lids drooped over the blue eyes.

So she lay, motionless as a statue, for many moments, but at last she moved in a whisper:

"God bless you, Cousin Oliver!" and the Doctor, hearing it, bent lower. "Jessie, remember tell Ashley Wendeline is dead." And with those words the spirit met the waiting angels.

The old woman burst into a wild moaning wail. The Doctor looked away to his little niece, and Jessie only seemed unmoved. She walked to the window and sat down, and looking out upon the cold moonlit road thought of the story she had heard, of the broken heart and of its cruel idol.

In a little while the Doctor came to her. She had spent John home with the carriage to explain her absence.

"Shall I see you home?" he said. This time she answered "No."

Alone together, her hand upon his arm, nothing near save the chirping crickets in the hedges. By-and-by he asked:

"She was a fair flower to die in life's summer. Do you know the story?"

"She told me all, I think. You have been very good to her."

"Only a brute could have done it him, and he."

He had taken off his hat and,carried it in his hand; the moonlight shone upon the noble forehead and the back curls, circled by the tender and black curls. Jessie did not look upon it as she had looked once. That seemed a very handsome man who walked beside her.

His next words made her heart stand still.

"I may say good-by to-night, I think," he said. "After my poor little cousin's funeral I shall leave the place. I shall hardly return to it."

"This is a sudden determination," said Jessie; she did not know what to say. She could hardly speak at all.

"No," he answered, "I have thought of it for months. But I knew my cousin must die, and I for her only friend in the world."

"We shall miss you," said Jessie.

"No," said the Doctor; "I am not one to be much missed."

She walked on again. Suddenly he turned toward her, standing still, and clutching her arm.

"Oh, Jessie Rue," he said, in a low, passionate voice—"Jessie Rue, do you think I can stay here to see the only girl I ever loved in all my life wedded to another—one who is not worthy of her—one whom I know to be a villain? I loved you better than any earthly thing, Jessie Rue, and I can not stay here to go mad."

His meaning was so different from his usual one that it frightened Jessie. She could only clasp her hands and look at him as he went on:

"Ah, Jessie, he is handsomer than I, more pleasing, richer—above me in all outward seeming; but I have loved you as he never will, for I know his base, bad heart."

Then she found courage to speak.

"To whom do you allude?"

"To whom but to Ashley Honeywell, your betrothed husband."

"I am not betrothed to him."

"Thank God for that!"

"I never will be."

"Jessie!"

His face changed—he bent over her.

"Oh, Jessie, I am mad now, I think! Jessie Rue, look at me. Jessie, speak, I go?"

And she answered, "No, Dr. Oliver."

Then in the moonlight their lips met, and he caught her to his heart.

They were the only mourners save old Jane at the poor girl's grave. Hand in hand they stood within the churchyard when all was over, when clattering past the gate went a handsome horseman. He paused and looked at the two for a moment, and then rode on with a flushed face. Ashley Honeywell, passing so near the grave of the girl whose dying thoughts were of him. That night a little note was brought to him from Jessie, and reading it he knew that Wendeline was dead.

Jessie Rue had made her choice.

At Christmas time they were married. Old Jane came from her little cottage to live with them as a servant, and Jessie was very good to her for dear Wendeline's sake. And never in all her life had she cause to repent of the day on which she married the man love on in her first fair admirer—the man whom all above she had loved best, even while ignorant of her own heart.

And Ashley Honeywell—there came a time to him, long years after, when dissipation had made him penniless, and he, a broken-hearted, friendless, wretched man, was tempted to Canada during the road, that coming to the lonely grave-yard, he lay down before a little stone with "Wendeline" upon it, and wept for the one true love he would have been true to him. And lying there, the snow began to fall, and covered him with a white shroud, so that when spring came, and the grass was moist with dew again, there were but a handful of bones to bury by pure chance at the foot of Wendeline's grave.

PUSS BURBANK'S ENEMY.

"How now, Wallance, speculating on to-morrow's chances, eh?"

Captain Dana threw himself lazily down on the grass beside his friend, and began to whistle softly.

"I should not be surprised if to-morrow's chances came to the," said Wallance St. Cloud, dolefully. "I suspect the enemy are nearer than we think—not a difficult thing for him to be biding away somewhere down there. But let us not put the subject of my speculations. Did you know, Dana, I spent two years in this vicinity once. Every thing looks as natural to me as the day I left and learned my letters in would. Do you see that hill yonder, the bluest crested one, lower than the others?"

Dana looked and nodded.

"I staid just at the foot of that—the other side though—two years. I was the present, rich, old-fashioned, big-roomed farm-house, with the oddest little maiden presiding over it. I should like to know what became of her. She wasn't a sweet-heart, Dana, so you needn't laugh; I was only a lad then, too. My mother left me there for the air; she fancied I was consumptive. Perhaps I had, and to ill sometimes, I remember, and this little girl took care of me. Such a demure little puss, you know, and, by-the-way, they called her Puss, too; it's a fashion they have in these Southern families. There's always a 'Puss' among the children, and I never heard her called any thing else but Puss Burbank."

"There's a Burbank a rebel colonel, isn't there?" interjected Dana.

"It can't be Puss's father—no, of course not. He was an old man in those days—broken with drink—treated the child shamefully sometimes, and petted her ridiculously at others. I'd give a month's pay to see the little thing again, if he hasn't killed her in one of his drunken rages. Why the deuce don't you look—well—not more than eight, I should think, and the cutest little thing for me like a regular grandmother. She liked me wonderfully; clung to me as though she would never let me go the morning I left; and when I found I was sick, I left her in a kind of swoon. Children have such fancies occasionally, you know. I promised to go back and see her sometime, but I never went."

"She's probably dead or married before this time," said Dana.

"Possibly," St. Cloud said, with a half sigh "but it seems to me as though I could find her right there in the old house yet, poor patient little Puss! I don't know why I should remember her as I always meant to. There, Dana! didn't I tell you?" as a shell suddenly came screaming toward the line from the plain below. It fell short though, and the two young men sprang up the bank, the long roll sounded, men flew to arms; it was a battle.

Puss, she wasn't dead or married, or gone away from the very roof that young St. Cloud had lain ill under years before. I dare say she had grown some, but she was a little thing yet; and if she had looked womanly when she was a child, she looked strangely childlike now after the lapse of years. There is an expression of countenance natural to some women that is always childlike; and, curiously enough, it is often accompanied by the utmost meek patience and meekness under great calamity.

A little earlier than St. Cloud and Dana were talking of her Puss sat in the low doorway of the farm-house sewing. Short, low dropping curls clustered against her faintly-coloured cheek, and deep sorrowful lines tinged the downcast pitiful eyelids. As she now and then cast expectant yet shrinking glances down the path she had that the serious brightness of a startled child. Puss wasn't thinking of the impending battle. Living in a very secluded and by-place, she caught only vague rumours of it. She thought of the war sometimes; often perhaps; but she was full of her own troubles, poor Puss! and the conflict off yonder had not yet deadened with its roar the clamor of this other—a vital one, too, in her own home. Her home: a plain and bare enough one, but with some little comfort it had to her little hands, that never ceased trying to brighten it—never wearied of caring for the old man, whose sole housekeeper she had been since her mother died, more than ten years now. She was older than St. Cloud thought.

He had visited Burbank broken with drink when he knew him, but there had been vitality enough left in him to drag through these years since, getting more broken and worse with drink, and leading Puss such a life as is not easily described.

Puss never murmured though, and when her mother's relatives would have removed her from his control, she always said, in her little quiet, unanswerable way, "I promised mother, you know, and he's all I've got besides," and staid.

Burbank was afraid of her leaving him; and after one of those visits he used to hang about her in a pitiful kind of gratitude, half maudlin as it was, used to make her heart overflow with loving tenderness toward him.

She should never be sorry, that she should not for staying with her old father. She'd get her reward some of these days; and one might be told her what it was to be.

There was to be, told, and—curse man who when Burbank had of late formed a drunken intimacy. That he led her father into even deeper excesses than he would seek himself Puss was very sure, and aside from his natural repulsiveness, that made him hateful to her. She shuddered at his very presence, but ordered that her father entertain and be receive him as her future husband. This she utterly refused to do; but, emboldened by the old man's encouragement, and the girl's helplessness, the ruffian continued to persecute her with his loathsome suit. Poor Puss! Her mother's friends had been poor, and of that part of the country; she and her father lived very isolated lives, and she had nobody but God and herself to look to for protection from this brutal, unscrupulous villain. Burbank in his drunken dotage was capable of perpetrating.

Suddenly, as she sat sewing, she heard the approaching steps of her father and this man, who was always with him now, and shrunk within the house. The two sat down to the meal that waited them, and Puss, after waiting upon them, retreated to the window and resumed her sewing, betraying unconsciously to herself herself likewise, a coarse flattery. While they were eating the first sullen boom, boom of the attacking cannon sounded, and the two men looked up.

"That means business, and sooner'n I reckoned on," said Mallory, and while Burbank lingered in the doorway he turned toward near Puss.

She drew back from his two near vicinity, not speaking, however.

"See you here, my girl," said he, "I was goin' to fix this yer matter of ours sheer to-day, et it hadn't a been for this fight comin' on. I'm goin' to hev a hand in that now, but when I come back I shan't stand no more trifflin'."

Puss only shrank a little till he touched her round the waist, and then she said, in her low, abiding sense meant-to-be conciliatory words.

She rose trembling then, calling "Father!" in an agony.

Burbank did not hear. He was already bidding his adversary; and with a brutal chuckle the ruffian bent toward her again.

Quick as a flash Puss struck him with her little hand sewing, and, throwing sharply there across the eyes, and as he recoiled involuntarily, blinded by the smart, she leaped through the door, like some scared creature, and bounded up the hillside with such frantically swift feet that the fellow, after the first rush, gave up the chase.

Puss never paused till she stood at the top of the hill which commanded the far-away battle-field, whose din by this time was shaking the very earth. Then a fascination that was awallowed every other fear, she stood watching the lurid flash and rolling smoke clouds, nor turned away till she saw by the flying columns that Northern hearts had won the day. Then she crept fearful and stealthily back to the house.

But no one was there, nor seemed to have been all day. Her sewing lay just as she had dropped it, and the door was wide. No one came near the house all night, and she sat and watched; not even her old father; and in the morning she went out, white and tired, to look for him.

Not stopping, as on similar occasions before, to look for him, asleep perhaps among the fastnesses of the hills, she went straight on, running, sometimes, to yesterday's battle-field.

A little way out upon the plain, past sights that left her lips bloodless, though here had not been the heat of the fight, some one called her name. It was a young officer who lay near, half crushed under the body of his dead horse.

With a strangely throbbing heart the girl approached him.

He had recognized her, and not much wonder, she had changed so little; but it was somewhat singular that she knew him through the blood and dust and pain—knew him before she had seen him. Some women hold some faces in their hearts forever though, and defy time or aught to put the memory past recognition.

"Oh Vally!" she said, clasping her hands. It was what she went to call him.

He smiled faintly. "I'm not much hurt, if only some one would lift this carcass off me. I've got something in my shoulder that won't let me help myself."

Tears blinding her, Puss tried with her own little hands, but of course in vain.

An unbidden corner up soon, however, and released St. Cloud from that incubus. As they lifted him in he held her hand and looked toward her. "Come and see me, Puss, won't you?"

With a gasping sob the girl turned toward the officer in charge.

"Where are you going to take them?" she asked. "Is it far?"

"About three miles."

Puss glanced at the ambulance, containing now as many of the poor wounded fellows as it could accommodate, and then thought of the long ride before they could be at rest almost stifled her utterance.

"I live up there," she said, eagerly, "not near a mile. I'll take care of them all, if you'll let me, and as many more as you choose to bring."

The officer hesitated, glancing at the young pale face; perhaps some red-lape scraped weazel him; but if so, he risked it, ordering the ambulance in the direction indicated.

"If going over the field have you seen an old, quite an old man?" Puss asked, in a low and strickened voice, as they were moving off.

The officer understood. "Poor child! yes, he said, gently. "He lies over there, just beyond that rise of ground." And as Puss, catching her breath, turned away, he spoke in a low voice to two of the men, who followed her.

The poor old man was dead.

A little whiter faced, but quiet, Puss followed dreamily after the men as they lifted and bore the body between them.

The day's happening was not yet done. Taking, a little different route than that by which she had come, they found a man frightfully torn with wounds, and howling in agony. Puss knew him—it was Mallory—and stopped.

She had no time to hand on. When the man saw her he entreated piteously that she would call it back; that she would bring him water; that she would not leave him there to die alone.

Fear and shuddering lost in pity, Puss promised to stay by him in his mad terror and agony till other help came. She brought him water, and sitting beside him, holding it to his lips.

"Be merry! Words can not tell how she had feared him; but he could not hurt her now; and with her hand upon him, pitiful and forgiving, he knew it.

Puss made a capital nurse. Her patients thrived as so others did.

Vallance suspected from stray gleanings something of what her life had been all those years; but she never liked to talk of it, and he never knew how or from whom she became dying moments Dana had soothed that day. She kept that memory, so connected with her dead father, to herself. Nobody should hear it from her. But something of her long pain broke into her voice when one day after Vallance was almost well, and had been talking in low, cheerful strong words to her, she crept into his arms, crying,

"I wanted you so long, Vally—I wanted you so!"

"I know it, my darling! God forgive me for not coming sooner! But now I want somebody. Can I, Puss?"

He knew, but he liked to hear her tender, timid whisper, "Yes."

TWO WAYS OF LOOKING AT IT.

I.

DISENCHANTED.

An! you may blush, my sweet Anne,
Cast your eyelids bashfully down!
Do you think it matters to me any more
Whether you smile or you frown?

Knowing what I know, Anne,
Knowing you wonder if I doubt
The inference to be drawn from a smile,
That is next of kin to a pout?

Pshaw! Am I yet a boy,
To be caught by a pretty face?
To see "threads of gold" in a flaxen curl?
Take a "Missy" girl for a Grace?

I am disenchanted now;
I can drop the mask, if you will:
Or, stay—there are other fools in the world
To be caught, if you wear it still!

Men were made for your sport,
Else what use to be fair?
"The only flats whom you can fall in love:"
Take care, my lady, take care!

Your heart may be found at home
When "the right man" knocks at the gate;
You may get your share of spurious coin—
Tis one of the tricks of Fate.

That a girl who can "think it you"
With a score to play loose and fast,
Sets the net too often in sight of the bird,
And gets trapped herself at last!

II.

FAULTS ON BOTH SIDES.

You call me "a heartless jilt"—
"A pitiless, vain coquette!"
But here is another and truer way
Of looking at it yet!

Say that I trifled a while:—
Do you, in your vain conceit,
Think every girl who jests with a man
Is to throw herself at his feet?

Well—we were both in fault—
I, that I drew you on,
For the foolish love of an idle hour,
To mock and to smile upon;

You, that your folly mistook
A "will-o-the-wisp" for a star;
See, if a woman but look for eyes,
How often all these young men are!

What! would you have me say
The little words "I love?"
Would you have me utter a Yea for a Nay,
Then throw you off like a glove?

Be or to break at once
A chain that your folly made!
Than to linger on in sight of the man,
Th. find yourself in the snare.

Let us part with our foolish dream,
Since we can not lovers be;
Go you your way, as a true man should,
And never look back on me!

Rally round the Flag, boys!
Rally once again;
There are traitors in the camp, boys,
And pirates on the main:
There are rebels in the front, boys,
And foes across the sea,
Who hate the proud republican
And scoff at you and me.

Rally round the Flag, boys!
Rally in your might!
Let the nations see how freemen
Can battle for the right;
Make the throbbing mountains echo
With the thunder of your tread;
With music sweet of martial feet
Salute our gallant dead.

Rally round the Flag, boys!
Rally with a cheer;
For all you love and cherish most,
For all that hold you dear,
Defend the brave old banner,
Unsullied from the earth—
Within its folds enshrined it holds
All that this life is worth.

Then rally round the Flag, boys!
Rally, rally still!
Rally from the valley,
And rally from the hill;
Rally from the ship, boys,
And rally from the plow;
Now or never is the word—
Never! failing now.

REMINISCENT.

A cottage white, near a winding stream,
Quite hidden by trees from the sunlight's gleam;
A field near by, on a sloping hill,
Where the violet grew, and the daffodill
A little girl and boy at play,
Whiling the summer hours away.

One had darksome auburn hair;
Both were young and both were fair;
One a boy not quite eleven,
One a girl of summers seven;
There upon the grassy lawn
They'd play till twilight's hour from dawn.

Months passed by, and soon came years,
Fraught to many hearts with tears;
The girl to womanhood had grown;
The boy claimed man's estate his own;
Both had lived to learn that life
With care as well as joy is rife.

* * * *

A cottage white, near a winding stream—
Yet not the same as in youth's bright dream—
Is the home where dwells a man and wife,
With not a cloud to bedim their life;
And by their side, with a curly head,
A baby sleeps in a trundle-bed.

QUITE ALONE.

CHAPTER XLIX.

AGAIN THE SULTAN.

It must have been at least a thousand years ago that the countess was the ruddiest and drunkest Will-o'-the-wisp who used to go about the fairs and exhibit herself to the bumpkins at so many hards a head. She had always been a lady of fashion—of the very highest fashion. Of course. Yet for all that, when the visitors had taken their departure, she sent out Mr. Kafooze's handsomest niece for a little brandy, the which that meek young person, who was her servitor and half governess, brought in from the adjacent public house, with a corner of her ink-stained apron thrown over the bottle.

It may here be not inappropriately remarked that, as Mr. M'Variety was following in the wake of his illustrious visitors, he met little Mr. Kafooze in the passage, and that, in the most affable manner, he immediately smote the schoolmaster on the shoulder, and inflicted a playful blow with one of his fists. "What the dickens brings you here, my moon-raker?" was the inquiry of the manager of Ranelagh.

"Why, I'm Mr. M'Variety." The little man replied, rubbing his hands together with somewhat of an uneasy expression of countenance.

"Live here! Why, I thought you didn't live any where, unless it was in the moon."

"There's my name on the door-plate, Mr. M'Variety. I keep a school. I keep a little school to eke out a livelihood. Times are very hard, and I don't get much of a salary at the Gardens, as you know, Sir, although I've been there these five-and-twenty years."

"Those five hundred years, you mean. And so you keep a school? What a rum 'un you are, to be sure! Find it pay? Eh! my noble star-gazer?"

"Pretty well, Mr. M'Variety; only you'll oblige me by not calling it a mention it. It really very important that you shouldn't mention it. It might do me harm with the parents. You see, Sir, that this is a very pious neighborhood, and party-feeling runs dreadfully high. I might lose all my pupils if it were known that I had any engagement—you understand—that I had any thing to do with the Gardens. Parents are so very prejudiced, you know; and people who grumble at the sight of a toy half a guinea a quarter make as much fuss about it as if they were sending their young ones to the University of Oxford."

"All right, my Trojan. By-by, Kafooze." And Mr. M'Variety walked away. "Queer little customer that," he mused. "I wish I ever have thought of his keeping a school and teaching the young idea how to shoot! I wonder if he tells the young 'uns any thing about the sun. He's a good deal more than three pairs cracked is Kafooze's school. He'll up to his business, and is as worthy a little soul as ever breathed. Curious, now, that man believes in all the humbug he's paid for every shilling a week, and looks down people's throats. He believes in it as strongly as if he got twenty pounds a week. He's not a bad sort, and is worth every penny of his sal to me. Egad! I'll put him down for a snuff-box some of these fine days."

It was one of the most amiable traits in Mr. M'Variety's character to be continually presenting snuff-boxes to the persons in his employ. There was scarcely a carpenter, a scene-painter, a property-man, a lamplighter, or a fiddler in his service, who had not been to some period or another gratified with one of those tokens of the manager's esteem and confidence. Mr. M'Variety purchased them cheap at the pawnbroker's, and with the old inscriptions burnished out (for it frequently happened that they had done service previously as gifts to deserving employes) they looked quite beautiful. Indeed, it was rumored that, in this manner, the manager had often to buy his own testimonials back again. Times had never been so hard with Mr. M'Variety as to render it impossible for him to dispense at least two sets of these snuff-boxes in the course of a season. Once, when business was dreadfully bad, he had been forced to come down to tortoise-shell; but the pull up of a good benefit was speedily the means of the precious metal asserting its accustomed sway.

A remarkable interview took place in the afternoon between the countess and Lily. The former had told her that she was to dine out that evening with some gentlemen—the gentlemen she had seen that forenoon, in fact—and bade her get on her bonnet and shawl. They would take a cab, she said, to the other side of the water, and purchase some articles of dress; for the countess to be a very grand one, and she wished Lily to appear as smart as herself.

To the countess's astonishment—to her simulated astonishment, rather—the girl cast herself at her feet, and with passionate entreaties begged to be allowed to remain at home. And, again, she implored not to ask her the reason of her reluctance to attend the dinner. She would rather be beaten, locked up, starved, than confess that reason.

She was sincere; although, Heaven knows, she was interceding in her own despite, and uttering untruths against herself. She had seen Edgar. She saw him: handsome, happy, and splendid. She would have given the world to be allowed to speak to him, to look full in the eyes, to touch his kid-gloved hand. To sit by his side at dinner, to be in his company a whole evening, to listen to his voice, to see him eat and drink, would have been to her ineffable bliss. But she dared not confront it. It would be happiness nothing only to be destruction and her death. If she saw him again she must once more fly, once more bury herself. She felt that she loved him more than ever, and that to go reins to her love was to court ruin and invite despair.

And Edgar Greyfaunt! Had he seen her? Had he recognized her when she swooned? Yes; she saliva's eye had encountered his as she sat on the horse-rider's little drudge. He had felt flattered and gratified when he was aware of the influence his presence had exercised on her. He was gratified, but not grateful. The girl's fainting away was naturally the subject of conversation among the guests after they had left the house. Sir William Long was driving Greyfaunt in his cabriolet to town; and the subject did not long remain a secret to the knee something of the "little party" who had been so suddenly the means of breaking up the interview with the countess.

"I think I've made something like an impression in that quarter," he remarked, with an intimate leering wink.

Sir William Long repressed his first impulse, which I am afraid was to lift up the cab apron and fling Edgar Greyfaunt headlong out of the big wheels upon the freshly macadamized pavement of the Westminster Bridge Road.

"Indeed," he rejoined, biting his lip. "I was not aware that you had ever seen Madame Peterstyn's interesting family."

"Madame Anybody's daughter," the young man went on, carelessly. "She must be a kind of foundling, I fancy. The little party and I are old friends."

"Old friends?"

"Yes. My aunt, Madame de Kergolay, picked her up from some snuffy old priest in Paris, whose niece she was said to be. You understand. A priest's niece. Nothing of relationship that. The aunt never turns up, somehow. Stop, I think the little party was at some school where I was in training for. Yes, by my aunt, who was always picking up waifs and strays of some sort—it didn't much matter whether they were puppies, dogs, or children, or china monsters—took a great fancy to this little Lily. Yes; that was her name."

Sir William Long's face flushed, and another and stronger impulse: to shorten his whip and lay the lash heavily across the shoulders of the Sultan Greyfaunt; but he controlled himself again, and observed,

"A very pretty name, I think, Mr. Greyfaunt?"

"Not so pretty as Leopoldine. I knew a little woman by the name of Leopoldine Du Bois Joye, what a little devil she was! She used to live in the Rue de Seine. Well, Madame de Kergolay grew quite fond of our little party. She turned out badly, however."

"Turned out badly, Mr. Greyfaunt? What do you mean?" Sir William's voice quivered as he spoke. He was very nearly saying, "What the devil do you mean?"

"Why, she gave my aunt a great deal of trouble. She used to say that she was shocked ingly hysterical and deceitful. One day she gave the little party a horrible fright by singing, whereupon, her monkey being up, Miss Lily bolted."

"Do you mean to say that the poor friendless young creature ran away?"

"That's the fact. Unfortunate Miss Bailey, and all the rest of it, though she didn't hang herself in her garters. I'm afraid that the real state of the case was, that Lily had become smitten with your humble servant. I'm sure I couldn't help it. It was no fault of mine that she took to love me. I'm sure I was a very very soft-hearted old lady, was very much cut up when she found that the bird had flown. Would have been glad to have had her back to get her back. But it was no use; they couldn't find the least trace of her; and now she turns up in the company of that horrible old hoxwelling woman. Faugh! how she smells of brandy! How, in the name of all that's wonderful, she and Lily came together, passes my comprehension."

"It is indeed wonderful; but am I to understand, Mr. Greyfaunt, that it is your intention to continue to pay your attentions to this young lady?"

"How danced solemn and formal you are, to be sure! But you're rather out in your reckoning. In the first place, it's rather stretching a point to call the little party a young lady. Persons of gentle blood are usually chary as to how they apply that appellation. You and I are men of old family, and don't sow the names of 'lady' and 'gentleman' broadcast."

"Indeed! What would you call this unfortunate child—this young woman—then? I have every reason to believe that she is the daughter of the Madame Ernestine, and she, I know positively, is the widow of an English gentleman of very good family indeed."

"You astonish me. I shouldn't have thought she had ever gone higher in the marriage line than a dancing-master. However, we will call the little party whatever you please. I ordinarily speak of this description of persons as 'the little party,' as I have no paying attentions to her you are again slightly in error. I never paid her any. It was all on the other side of the bridge. She was the natural sinner. The little party took a fancy to me, and for that you will, I hope, agree I am not to blame. I don't think I have had ten minutes' continuous conversation with her. There is time, nevertheless, to improve the acquaintance. Ah! here we are in Whitehall. I have a call to make at the Foreign Office. Thank you for the lift. Au revoir until dinner-time."

"And it is for this senseless, brainless puppy that Lily has made herself miserable!" Sir William Long muttered, as he drove furiously away. "Confound the fellow's coxcomb, I should have liked to twist his neck!"

CHAPTER L.

THE COTTAGE.

The proposition made by Mr. M'Variety to the countess that evening, at dinner (a repast, by-the-way, which was not present, as it essentially satisfactory to that lady. It was of a duplex nature. First it had reference to the augmentation of Mrs. Kafooze's weekly stipend; and, sundry pounds and shillings being added thereto, the countess vouchsafed to express her opinion that Mr. M'Variety was "an hon enfant," and exceptionally free from the vice of stinginess, inherent, if she were to be believed, to the managerial race.

"You needn't give me credit for too much generosity," the candid manager observed, in return for the countess's somewhat profuse expressions of gratitude, "even when I tell you that your sal can go on, if you like, all the winter. The concert-room will never say thing like it, and I must shut up very soon, or, by Jove, I shall be shut up myself; but that will have nothing to do with your engagement. I mean to come out with a bang next spring, so you can be practicing something stunning in the high school way between this and next Easter. Open or shut, you'll find the ghost walk very Saturday as liberal, dear boy, as ever, and if ever you want a fiver on account, you'll find Billy Van Post always ready to honor your I O U. Sounds very liberal, don't it? But I needn't imagine, for all that, that I'm one of the Brothers Cheerybyle. The fact is, countess, that what suits your book suits my book, and we'll talk all about it."

As he spoke, Mr. M'Variety slapped, per chance involuntarily, his waistcoat-pocket. Of course Kafooze's nephew, not being a clairvoyant, could not see, through the well-shrunken tweed and glazed calico lining of that garment, a neatly-folded document of a dull gray hue, which, had it been opened, would have proved to be a check, the amount of which has nothing to do with the "little party," but is the work of M'Variety, Esq., or bearer, by a person signing himself William Long. But, morally, Madame Ernestine had the key to the secret, and could see through a millstone or a plaid waistcoat as well as her neighbors; and she understood the enterprising manager perfectly well when he hinted that it was not through any spontaneous intuition of munificence, but for divers reasons well known to himself, that he proposed to pay long fee engagement on terms so exceedingly liberal.

"And, while we're talking business," continued the manager, "I don't see why you should go on working so confoundedly on the desert as in that poky little hole where I found you this morning. Old Fooslum"—it was by this irreverent name that Mr. M'Variety called the Duke of the Planets—"is a very good sort of a card; but he's a desperate slow coach; has been ain't much longer at the horse-trap, and there isn't an inch of style about him."

"Who is this Monsieur Kafooze?" the countess asked of Mr. M'Variety quickly on the departure of Mr. Kafooze's nephew, with his mooms, and his stars, and his other imperti-nences."

"Poor old Fooslum. There's no harm about him. How sharp you do take one up, to be sure! Monsieur Kafooze is right to let luggings, and he is a little cracked, as long as he don't hire any body, if he likes. I was quite staggered this morning to find out what he was in the day-time."

"And what is he at night? A clown, a manager, a lamplighter, a fiddler, a pouseur de cornemuse?"

"That's tellings. Ask me no questions, and you shall hear no lies. Billy Van Post's got him down in the pay list, and he draws his sal pretty regular. That's all we've any of us any right to know. It ain't much, but he's worth his salt to me and more. However, it isn't about old Fooslum that we're talking. His shabby little rattletrap of a place ain't good enough for you and missy to live in, let alone receiving your friends. You want some place more stylish—something slap up."

"I don't want to live in town," the countess returned. "I can not afford to keep a carriage —there were days when I kept two—and in eight days I should be ruined in cabs."

"Don't want you to be ruined in any thing. Don't want you to live at the West End. You'd be getting into some devilry there. Why don't you come to the Cottage, you and missy?"

"The Cottage, where is that?"

"Don't you know that queer old crib behind the ball-room. Two hundred years old, they say it is. I think it is a thousand. There's a good many rats, and a ghost or two, but it's very comfortable. I'll tell you what, Brooks, it won't cost you a penny for rent or taxes, and old Sally Burn—that's the Ranelagh housekeeper, you know—who's been there ever since the time of Gog and Magog, will see that you're all right and comfortable."

The countess was nothing loth.

"But," she said, as though making terms, "I shall be able to see all my friends there, Monsieur Mac?"

"The whole boiling of 'em. Tom, Dick, and Harry. Lords and ladies—beautifully you please."

"An bout du compte, elle me va, votre offre. I accept it," she answered, simply.

"Try, and I don't grin. You'll be as jolly as a sand-boy there, and if you want a nice little supper as often as ever you like, the kitchen's open for you, and I don't give a French shag-cock six pounds a week for nothing. What an extravagant rascal he is to be sure! That fellow would fry his grandmother in the best Spring butter at one-and-sevenpence a pound, if Billy Van Post did not keep a sharp look-out after him."

The bargain, then, was concluded. It suited the Van Post in every way. She wanted an oasis in the midst of a desert, a solitude where none but her intimates could hear her, and where she could be as strange and uproarious as she pleased. She was calmed and cribbed in the Little South Lambeth Street, with the schoolmaster and his nieces, and the widow on one side, and the nurse on the other. "Va pour la chaumière," she cried, joyously. The Cottage was christened, and, something Bohemian, something uncivilized, like herself.

The removal was soon effected. They had no packages. Mrs. Wardrobe could be easily conveyed in a peck measure. The girl was sorry, nevertheless, to leave the little old schoolmaster and his kind-hearted niece. Her mother, indeed, cried very bitterly on the day of the lodger's departure, and, as she wound her arms round Lily, frequently complained that she had now nothing worth living for. It touched Lily to find that there was, after all, some one to like her, although Mrs. Kafooze was a drunken hag and troubled with bunions.

Mr. Kafooze was sorry too—very sorry. He had more than once that he did not like the turn affairs were taking, and that some one must interfere to put a stop to it. The same to him so. But the celestial bodies, vouchsafing him no further information, he was forced to assume a look expressive of contentment, and to mutter that it was no business of his, and that he had no right to interfere. He kept very carefully out of the way of the countess, whom he was honestly afraid, sending for the rent by Rhodope, and requesting his late lodger—in a three-cornered note, which he folded round in round hand—to do him the extreme favor of returning the latch-key. But he stole a quiet opportunity to bid Lily good-by on the kitchen stairs.

"It isn't a Kathleen Mavourneen farewell, after all," he whispered; "for one don't take up one, and it won't be forever. The stars tell me so. I shall see you often, my dear, much oftener than you'll see me. But one don't take up practice of me, unless there's something very particular. I'm nobody, but I'm always about. God bless you, and beware of the genteelfolks!"

SUCCOTASH.

BY LEWIS GAYLORD CLARK.

WILL you do me the honor to sit up at the table and try another dish of my? Literary Succotash? You understand me: I make the mixture myself, and (although different, I hope, from the contents of Macbeth's witches' caldron) yet "stab and good," notwithstanding.

"CONSIDERATE" AND "CONSCIENTIOUS" MEN.

I was thinking, this lovely September morning, in the cool shade of my desolate thoughts upon this twin theme; and, as I collated my thinkings, I came to this conclusion, that while a conscientious man always does (as he considers) certainly is not always so; but that, on the other hand, a considerate man is always both considerate and conscientious.

I have an illustration in point. I "seem to think."

There are many of our "metropolitan fellow-citizens," as Mr. Fernando Wood would call them, who are in the habit of passing the walkers down Broadway (which in twenty years from this date will have become one of the most splendid and costly thoroughfares in the world—an avenue of marble and granite —incrustable edifices of varied and tasteful architecture)—many of these, I say, we see, who will remember the bazaar of Mr. Hart, at the corner of Cortland Street and Broadway, west side, upper corner. Let the reader remember most of most of our townsmen as they traversed the great boulevard, going up or coming down; and as the proprietor was a very popular man in his manners, and his establishment an omnium gatherum both of "men and things," his snug place was, at the time, quite a "head-quarters" of town news.

Thus much for a brief "prologue to a swelling act."

It was my custom also, at that period—my office at that time being a little below Mr. Hart's, in Broadway—to stop frequently at his place and have a chat with him. I had been absent, however, for two or three weeks, with a few congenial friends, among the trout-streams of Sullivan and Orange counties (O! Catskill and Mongaup! would I were luring "the speckled" from your swirling, murmuring, bubbling, sunny and shady bosoms to-day!), and it was a week or more after my return when, walking down Broadway one lovely morning, I overtook my friend, Mr. Hart, a few paces from his store, walking slowly between two friends.

"How are you to-day?" I said, as usual, whenever we encountered each other; but he looked pale and sad, and did not instantly respond; so I added at once, "but I am afraid you are ill; you don't look at all well?"

"Have you heard of my terrible accident?" he asked.

I explained that I had been out of town for several days, and since my return had been very busy, and had therefore had no time to call at his store.

He, upon this, parted his frock-coat in front, and directed my attention to a protuberance above his right groin, to the extent, I should say, of a medium-sized cucumber.

"About two months ago," said he, "in walking down to the store in the morning, I happened to step upon a piece of banana-skin, slipped my foot, and fell suddenly to the pavement. I got up in a moment, and felt no pain, but only a little awkwardness at the ridiculous figure I cut and the laughter of the passers-by.

"The next day, however, I became sensible of a dull, heavy sensation in my right groin, and that night, on examination, I found exuding from an almost imperceptible orifice a whitish fluid. This continued to increase, day after day, with additional pain, and as it issued is ossified—darned to base—until it has reached the enormous size you see. It not awful to think of?

"To-morrow morning Dr.—— and Dr. ——[two of our most distinguished surgeons] are to perform the operation of excision, which I'm told is not a very painful one; at any rate, I am willing to undergo almost any thing to have it cut off."

Two days afterward, as we passed the bazar, we saw that it was closed, and the black and white crape upon the shutters and the following announcement explained the reason:

"Closed in consequence of the death of the proprietor."

Mr. Hart had died under the operation!*

And this incident brings us to the illustration of a "Consolation Man," who, if he had preceded Mr. Hart on the fatal morning of his fall, would have saved him from that and the terrible catastrophe which ensued.

We were walking in the same street one day with the late Mr. Abbott Lawrence, and remarked to a merry now and then he would pause, and with his cane knock from off the pavement a peach-skin or some other slippery rind of its kind, saying, at the same time,

"Lewis, whenever you see any thing like that lying on the walk, pick it into the street—it may save many an accident—perhaps a human life."

Here was a Considerate Man.

It was the same spirit of considerateness which prompted him, he afterward said, never to notice any bodily infirmity in persons whom he met; to pass on the right side, or sit on the right side of a rail-car, of any one afflicted, for instance, with those painful blood-red "marks," forms of grape-shot-wounds, etc., which so often seem to disfigure the human countenance. And we may add that it was the same spirit which prompted him to invent the chairs which have prevented, since then, the achings of thousands upon thousands of little children's backs in the Public Schools; and how to say that would keep clean and neat their books, so that daily use might not render them distasteful in their externals.

We have never forgotten the first two lessons as above imparted by a Considerate Man.

We shall speak, it may be, of the Conscientious Man hereafter.

* Few of my city readers but will remember the case of Mr. Halsey, father of three opulent and well-known metropolitan merchants, who slipped upon a piece of orange-peel, and was so seriously injured that he was compelled to keep his apartment for fifteen years! A very active old gentleman too, who suffered only from this terrible casualty.

VERY PELLIC WHITEWASHING.

"In the days of some time ago," when one of the publishers of this journal was Honorable Lord Mayor of Gotham, a most amusing scene was enacted in front of the City Hall, of which there are two original witnesses, the very first who saw its commencement.

The late Charles M. Leupp (so long the near and prominent neighbor of the publishers hereof, in the adjoining "Brick") was crossing the City Hall Park, in company with "the present writer," one summer morning about eleven o'clock. We had been "delightful company" all the way as far as Printing: "Here is an article of apple which we can put to you at a penny;" but those in front would not be afforded under three cents, for they are of a very superior quality," etc., etc.

Well, as we neared the City Hall we beheld and lo! a great blue-breeched black man, with a pail of lime-water and a whitewash-brush in his hand, was belabaring the southern basement-story of that beautiful edifice (of brown stone, as every body knows) with his plastic fluid. He hadn't given more than four or five "dabs" with his broad splasher (the stains remained there for years, and may be faintly seen there now for ought I know) when Leupp asked him

"What are you doing that for?"

"Gosh! to whitewash de basement all in front."

"Who told you to do it?"

"Dare was a man on de corner over dar who hired me to do it last night. He give me two dollars and a 'all to begin; and he's gwine to git me twenty dollars when I finish de job. Take me 'bout a week, I reckon."

By this time several people had gathered round, and the news had been carried in to the Mayor's office that "a big nigger outside was whitewashing the City Hall!"

His Honor came out, and, looking with wonderment through his gold spectacles, saw that it was even so, and ordered the sable artist to "hold up."

"Can't do it, massa; it's a 'big job,' and I've been part paid: goin' to have some every day tel I get twenty dollars."

And on went another spattering splash with his broad "instrument," while he smoothed down the part laid with professional pride.

After a while "necessity was laid upon him," and he was compelled to desist; not without much remonstrance.

"What's any body's business of I do de job, and do it good as I kin? I told de man I would, an' I mighter! He said it was a dirty place, outside and in, and wanted cleanin' out!"

Some wag of a partisan, who "belonged on the other side," had collected the paper fellow in a thicket of "cleansing the Augean stable;" and much spoil did the commencement of the operation create in the minds of all the looking Tadmi.

Leupp never forgot this scene "to his dying day," and he could describe it better than any other one human eye saw, or the eloquence of the spectator, his disregard of remonstrance, and his disdain for the laughter which was echoing from the by-standers who were witnessing his labors—O! it was very funny!

SPEAKING OF Mr. Leupp, it may truly be said that no man more thoroughly appreciated "a good thing." Whether that I could ever relate him here describe a scene which he once witnessed at Bloomer's old celebrated Hotel in Canandaigua!

Bloomer was a great entity at that time in the western part of the State of New York, and were not frequently seen even in its loveliest village; but Bloomer, who always would have his look of "a crook, every luxury upon his table which could be obtained in the markets of New York, one day had consigned to him some delicacies, which he then thus attractively presented upon his "full-spread board," where to some of his guests there was a relish—relish, especially, a generous old fellow from the neighboring "country," who asked:

"Mr. Blossom, what's them red critters with the big claws?"

"Those are lobsters, Mr. Blank, a very great luxury. Try a piece of one with a little of that fruit to manage at first, but when you come to the juice you'll say you never tasted any thing more delicious!"

His guests laughed, for they "understood" Blossom, and while he was waiting to dress one of the crustacea, he drew off a claw, and presented it to his country friend.

The man had but two teeth in his cadaverous jaws, but he took the claw, and began its mastication and manipulate it.

"It's rather hard, Mr. Blossom," said he, the blank-ness of disappointment upon his wrinkled forehead.

"Yes: I told you so," said Blossom; "but when you get to the juice as I said, you'll admit that you have been repaid for your trouble."

By industriously and steadily established a hole, a fact which was made apparent to his host by the old fellow's manifest satisfaction.

"How do you like it now?" asked Blossom.

"Wa'al, it's pretty tough eatin'; but I kinder like the pith on't."

But as Blossom began to crack the lobsters' claws and shell, and extract the "pith on 'em," and the laugh ran from one end of the table to the other, "the pith and by that," the victim saw the pith of the joke.

TOPOGRAPHY AND PATRIOTISM.

WHATEVER strengthens our local attachments is favorable both to individual and national character. There is a saying and a wise one, the connection between Topography and Patriotism. What do you think our soldiers, fighting for this very sentiment for a united country and undivided homes, North and South—think of it? If the one is desecrated, will not the other be jeoparded, if not destroyed? Show me a man who "cares not where for one place than another," and I will show you in that same person one who loves nothing but himself. Beware of those who "care not where they live." Such have no hold on a human being whose affections are without a tap-root.

GOOD COOKING AND PIETY.

I DON'T think "Sam Slick" himself, shrewd and sharpened old trumpet as he is, ever gave vent, in his inimitable way, to a more irrefragable truth than is contained in this short sentence from "Adam Bede?"

"I've nothin' to say agin her piety, my dear, but when you've got a wife you like her to cook ye victuals. When a man comes in tired and hungry, pretty won't feed him, I reckon. I called in one day when she was bakin' her Tremain dinner, and I could see the potatoes was as watery as water. It is right enough to be spiritual—I'm up to envy to them—but I like my victuals done. I don't see as any body 'ull go to heaven any sooner for not digestin' their dinner; providin' they don't die the sooner, as perhaps Mr. Tremain will, poor man!"

It is a rare thing to find proper names introduced into verse with ease and effect; but you gave, Messrs. Editors, in a late number of the Weekly, a very happy illustration of the "way to do it" in the equally caustic and facile lines of Professor Lowell, of Cambridge. Dr. Maginn, of Blackwood's Magazine, excelled in this kind. Do you remember his tread burlesque "poem" of "A lady who once lived in Leith,

A lady very stylish, indeed,
Who, for whose coil of hir teeth,
Felt in love with an Irishman:

A nasty, ugly Irishman,
A wild, tremendous Irishman,
A hairy, swearing, bumping, thumping,
Ramping, roaring Irishman.

"He came to a terrible name indeed,
Being TIMOTHY TRAVY MELLIGAN,
And whenever he finished his number of pawns,
He always wanted a fresh legion:

The boozy, bruising Irishman,
The bumbling Irishman,
The great he-rogue,
And the big swearing Irishman,
The fighting, rioting Irishman!"

About the breaking out of the present unhappy war, somebody (and I wish I knew his name, for he fully equals Hughey O'Doherty" of the "Noctes," in his way) wrote the following. Its satire is as pungent as its style is "humorous." Can only give a piece or four verses, but they will "tell the story:"

"Two Irishmen out of employ,
And out as the crow flies so easily,
Adrift in a grocery store,
Were smoking and talking it lazily:
The one was a "broth of a boy,"
Whose cheek-bones turned out and turned in sp'ile,
His name it was Mickey M'Finnigan,
The other was Mr. M'Flannigan.

"'Bad luck to the rebels,' says Pat,
'For kicking up all this botheration;
They call themselves gintlemen, too,
While principle seems to be money and robbery:
Now if it's gentale for to stale,
And take all your creditors in agin,
I'm glad I'm no gintleman born'—
'Your're right, Sir,' says Mr. M'Finnigan.

"'The nagur States wanted a row,
And they got it, bedad, they've got it in;
They've chosen a bed that is hard,
However they strive to make it thin;
Now if it's the nagurs they mane,
By "chivalry," then it's a sin agin
To fight for a nagur, I'm sure, I think;'
'Your right, Sir,' says Mr. M'Finnigan.

"'There's never an Irishman born,
From Malone to the end of Secessiondom,
But longs for a chance
To fight for this country in Hasiendom:
And so if our Government would try
With a treacherous friendship to sin agin,
They'll be all up in the air at once;'
'Your're right, Sir!' said Mr. M'Finnigan."

This is very far from being an easy style, as any one will find who may try to adopt it.

"I was over at Greenwood the other day," writes a friend, "and while traversing the multitudinous avenues and lanes of that most beautiful City of the rather than 'City of the Dead,' I could not help but think of that expressive sentence you quoted in your last number, 'Death is continually waking' the sounds of a great city, and sooner or later steps at every man's door.' For each of the two hundred thousand human beings here, thought I, 'Death has stopped at some door in yonder smoky metropolis, from which I hear but the solemn silence, like the distant under-tone of Niagara, you can hear the subdued din of "multitudes of men commercing"—the ever-busy hum of mankind."

Yes: two hundred thousand shells of men and women repose in Greenwood, who but a little while ago were thinking, feeling, scheming, "getting gain," or giving life and grace to society in yonder city. Yet I remember Greenwood when as yet not many persons had been buried in its lovely grounds.

Major Douglas, a graduate of West Point, who had an office at No. 5 Wall Street, started this great enterprise, and he was the grounds. I was then among some fifty representatives of the daily, weekly, and monthly New York press, who, at the invitation of the Major, visited the place for the first time; and although at that period only the difficult "points" and paths had been marked out, the grounds and views were quite as beautiful as they now are.

The lunch was "debouched," I remember, upon the banks of "Sylvan Water," and while we were doing justice to the sandwiches and the Champagne a big bird flew across and disappeared in the foliage. Then there ensued quite an animated discussion as to what manner of winged creature it was.

"It was a heron," said Charles F. Daniels, then associate-editor of the Courier and Enquirer.

"I think not," answered the present writer, affecting to misunderstand him. "It was not a Scotch herring, that is certain, nor a red herring."

The next morning, in an account of the visit to the future Greenwood, the Courier said that its contemporary of the Times became so obtuse in observation over the lunch that he couldn't tell a hawk from a Scotch herring!

There was not much to be won at the hands of the witty C. F. Daniels.

"Enough for the present."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THAT was a mean Dutchman, that Hans Karg. He left one morning Mathilda-looking daughter, who no more resembled him than a flower the root. "Hans, how is earth by you making?" inquired his friend from "Fatherland" asked a neighbor, one morning. "Py, I makes potatoes shows up de potatoes," answered Hans; "dat keeps dem from freezin'!"

FREEDOM OF THE CITY.—Coming to a "block" in the streets every ten minutes.

OLD CLOTHES, a great advocate of economy, and never lets an opportunity pass for commending this virtue. Not long ago he was speaking in favor of a couple of young men who were dandified, and remarked, "It don't cost them any thing for dress; each one wears out the other's old clothes!"

A gentleman at an inn being supplied with two candles which gave a very dim light, called to the waiter: "Here, waiter, let me have a couple of decent candles to see how these others burn!"

"Barber," said a former to his tonsor, "now don't change your mind to shave for half price." "Can't, Mr. Jones," said the man of razors; "I ought really to charge you double, for there's down farmers make much long fuss that I have twice the ground to go over."

DRILL FOR MARRIED VOLUNTEERS.

Fall In.—To your wife's widow; you'll find that you are a gainer by doing so.

Attention.—To the children pay a little.

Right Face.—Your husband, and follow it with all your energy.

Quick March.—To the call of duty, and never mind the consequences.

Halt.—When your wife points out to you that such and such a course is not the proper one.

Right about Face.—When you are invited by a "friend" to take another glass of wine, tell him that you've had sufficient.

Present Arms.—When your wife asks you to push the perambulator for her.

Break Off.—Attending the public house so much, and keep at home. You will be benefited by it physically, mentally, and socially.

Lanky and Joe H—— were neighbors, and, with the exception of an occasional quarrel, always lived in peace. Lanky was a man of the sort that requires just the proper dose of Lorby, whereupon he terminated his existence very suddenly; and when Joe appeared, he thought he deemed satisfaction or to avenge his death, Lanky sought to cause consequence by pleading ignorance. "If I had known that it was your dog," said he, "I wouldn't have touched a hair of his head; but on the fax is, he mistaked, with terrible earnestness, "I didn't know that he has any relation to you."

An old miser, who was notoriously parsimonious, being ill, was obliged reluctantly to consult a doctor. "What shall I do with my head?" said the old man. "It's so dizzy I seem to see double." The doctor wrote a prescription and retired. The prescription was thus: "When you see double you will find relief if you count your money."

A manufacturer has succeeded in making such an improvement in Britannia that it is asserted that it is asserted he is obliged to warrant them not silver.

A married woman can acquire nothing, the proper tie of marriage making all she has the proper-ty of her husband.

What is the difference between a sailor and a soldier?—One tars his ropes, the other pitches his tent.

"You say, Mr. Snooks, that you now plaintiff knew the house. Was you in it?" "Yes, Sir." "Do you know what caused the hosts?" "I'm not certin, Sir, but I think it was the fall of a two hundred." "That will do, Clerk, call the next witness."

"I should like to pay you off," as John Bull said to the National Debt.

"What plan," said an actor to another, "shall I adopt to fill the house at my benefit?" "Invite your creditors," was the reply gravely.

Why is type-setting beneficial to a nervous man?—Because he can compose himself.

Why is the letter t like your nose?—Because it goes before you do.

"Mr. Thump!" bawls Type, to a brother in trade, "The ministry are to be changed, it is said." "That's good," replied Mr. Thump, "I hope they would be With a thinking erratum." "What?" "Dele the c."

A gentleman has discovered an excellent way to disperse a crowd of idle boys. He offers to teach them the Decimals, and they instantly run away.

A merchant having been attacked by some thieves at five in the afternoon, said: "Gentlemen, you open shop very early in the day."

Booth, the tragedian, had a broken nose. A lady once remarked to him, "I like your acting, Mr. Booth; but, to be candid, I can't quite overlook your broken nose." "No wonder, madam," replied he, "the bridge is gone!"

A SCHOOLMASTER'S PROVERB.—The softer the head the harder the work—the harder the head the softer.

The man who was lately "struck with a new thought," has resolved to overlook the act, it being the first time, and there is little danger of a repetition of the offence.

Mrs. Partington wrote to know, if it were not intended that women should drive their husbands, why are they put through the bridal ceremony?

A mother admonishing her son as lad about seven years of age that he should never defer till to-morrow what he could do to-day. The little urchin replied, "Then, mother, let's eat the remainder of the plum-pudding to-night."

An old maid, being at a loss for a pin-cushion, made use of a pin. In the following morning she found all the needles had tears in their eyes.

SNOW-DROP.—Nature's delicate announcement that she is coming out in full dress.

MONUMENT TO STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS.

IT is known that a monument is soon to be erected in Chicago to the memory of the lamented Stephen A. Douglas. We are enabled this week to present our readers with an accurate engraving of the monument, from a drawing made directly from the model by Mr. Weekly. In this we will be apparent to every eye, and no word of encomium for the artist is necessary from us.

The monument will be one hundred feet high, wrought in marble on a granite base. Through the arched and grated lower story of the shaft, and above the noble sarcophagus containing the remains of the departed Senator. Directly over it an eagle with outspread wings is sitting, a suitable emblem of mourning for a dead statesman. The four seated statues upon the pedestals at the corners of the base are designed to represent Illinois, as the right, holding a medallion portrait of Douglas; 2d, America, at the left, supporting a shield—the U. S. shield—in her left hand, and with tablet and pencil; and 4th, Fame, holding a wreath and a trumpet.

The bas-relief upon the sides of the column-supporting pedestal base are designed to represent in panorama the progress of American civilization, especially in the Western States—with which Mr. DOUGLAS was so peculiarly identified. That which is presented in the engraving represents the life of the untamed Indian, with a woman and papoose, and a hunter dragging a deer up to the door of a wigwam. Following this is a scene representing Agriculture and the first settling of the country —the settler's cabin and family, the plowing of the ground, and the felling of the forest. Then comes a view of Commerce and Science—with cadeuses, boxes and barrels of merchandise, locomotives, and the telegraph. The last relief is Education—with the humble school-house, the church, and the National Capitol.

Wreaths, scrolls, etc., adorn the pedestal above, while higher towers the marble composite column, forty-two feet in height, and bearing stars, indicative of the States of the Union. The whole is surmounted by a colossal statue of DOUGLAS, standing upon a bronze globe, with his right hand upon the fasces—symbolical of the Union—and his left holding the Constitution.

The monument is well suited to the level character of the Illinois country, and in that regard follows a recognized principle in art and architecture among the ancients, hitherto too little regarded in America. The location of the monument will be upon the shore of Lake Michigan, in a beautiful grove in the southern suburbs of the city of Chicago, already consecrated as the resting-place of Senator DOUGLAS'S remains. From the various approaches to the city, by land or water, the tall shaft of the monument will be seen pricking the blue of the skies.

It has been erroneously reported throughout the country that the cost of the monument will be $500,000. It will cost, as estimated, only $50,000. In this place we think it proper also to correct a statement, which is being widely circulated by the press, to the effect that Mr. VOLK is a German. LEONARD WELLS VOLK was born at Wellstown, Hamilton County, New York, in 1828. His ancestors were among the first settlers of New York city—then New Amsterdam—which brings him in the eighth generation on this continent. He is American in his every sentiment, loyal to the core, thoroughly Western in his ideas of art, as well exemplified in this his last and one of his greatest works. He is also a relative of Mr. DOUGLAS by marriage, and has an earnest reverence for the memory of the departed STATESMAN. His work has been, in the deepest sense, a work of love.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S ARMY DESTROYING THE MACON RAILROAD BETWEEN ROUGH AND READY AND JONESBOROUGH, GEORGIA.—[See next Page.]

GENERAL SHERMAN'S VICTORY.

WE give on pages 629, 636, and 637 Illustrations of General SHERMAN'S recent victory.

The sketch given on page 636 represents SHERMAN'S army tearing up and destroying the Macon railroad below Rough and Ready. SHERMAN had swung his whole army round upon this road, leaving only the Twentieth Corps to guard his depôts of supplies, and his line of communications across the Chattahoochie. Jeff C. DAVIS'S Corps held the extreme right of the army after it struck the Macon Road, and was therefore nearest Jonesborough, where the rebel HARDEE'S Corps was posted. The other Corps, the Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth, commenced early in the morning of September 1 to tear up the railroad. "At eight o'clock," says the Tribune correspondent, "the whole of the Third Division, Twenty-third Corps, was strung out along the track, each regiment taking hold of what lay along their front and capsizing it with a crash sidelong into the ditch. In this manner several miles were thrown over in the course of two hours. The ties and rails were then separated, the ties piled up, and the rails laid crosswise upon the pile. Fire was then applied, and soon the whole track, as far as one could see, became one mass of seething, crackling, smoking pyramids of fire. Marching down the track General HANCOCK'S Division, under his own personal supervision, continued the work until there was nothing more left to be done or destroyed in the way of destruction. In the afternoon the Twenty-third Corps reached the army in front of Jonesborough."

Hardly half the content been decided at Jonesborough before Mud made preparations to evacuate Atlanta. The immense destruction of property which preceded the evacuation of the city is illustrated on page 637, especially the destruction of nearly a hundred cars loaded with Rebel ammunition which were set on fire, on the Augusta Railroad, one mile from the city. The scene is thus described in the correspondence above quoted:

"The detonation of the bursting shells shook the city to its foundations, and filled the air continually for the space of two hours with fragments and with the débris of the general wreck. The explosions were heard twenty-five miles from the city. Visiting this spot, I saw the naked trunks and axles of cars for near a half mile in extent, the ground for a long distance on both sides of the track covered over with the melted iron of the terrible agency which had been at work. A large locomotive had been thrown off the track at one end by the explosions. These locomotives are said to have been reserved for running order. Four field-guns were lying near the track in one place, and four others were in each other place. The latter had but recently been brought up for siege-guns. A considerable number of guns, which the Rebels could not take away in their hurried flight from the city were buried, and head-boards with lying epitaphs placed above them to persuade parties of old soldiers: 'General Sherman states the number of guns captured as 27; and 7 locomotives.'"

Another sketch on page 629 gives a view of the rebel prisoners as they appeared returning to Atlanta as prisoners of war. The party was under the care of the Hundred and Thirty-seventh Illinois regiment, in command of Lieutenant-Colonel LANGLEY. Among the prisoners was Brigadier-General Cockrell and several colonels, and other commissioned officers, mostly Kentuckians. They filled the road for a mile, and as they marched back to the city-which they had so long defended-they appeared to excite in those living near the city much curiosity and consternation. There people came out in force to see the procession, and not infrequently offered them Water and refreshments.

On page 636 are portraits of Brigadier-Generals CARLIN and MORGAN, who have taken part in the honors and hardships of SHERMAN'S victorious campaign. Brigadier-General WILLIAM P. CARLIN, a native of Illinois, entered the military academy at West Point in 1846, and graduated in 1850 with the rank of Second Lieutenant. He then entered the war as Colonel of the Thirty-eighth Illinois Volunteers. When JEFF THOMPSON was advancing into the interior of Missouri in August, 1861, Colonel CARLIN had command of three regiments, the Twenty-first, Thirty-third, and Thirty-eighth Illinois. In the battle of Fredericktown, fought October 21, this force was prominently engaged. General CARLIN commands the First division of 2C. DAVIS'S Corps, and was in the advance in the recent attack on Jonesborough. General MORGAN commands the Second division of the same Corps, and was also prominently engaged in the battle of Jonesborough.

THE FISHER.

THE wife in the cot is lonely
Since the father went away,
And the sun-baked child is hot
This many and many a day.
And the schools of mackerel come unscared
To the rocks of the inner bay.

The boat lies bottom upward
On the edge of the crawling tide,
And the tangled net is green and wet
In the slime and acrid weeds,
And grass through the alder hurdle shoots,
Where the salted fish was dried.

The autumn brings no bounty
And brings no wealthy Banks,
Though the fishers come to their winter home
With a thousand well-filled tanks;
And every village beckines craft
Has a golden cause for thanks.

The fisher said one spring-time,
"Good wife, I have set my sail
To the very coast for the northern mere
Of the iceberg, mist, and gale,
And my country has paid the shot, good wife,
Whenever I refused to fail—

"Paid for my sailor knowledge,
And the skill of my sturdy hand,
And blue on my arm as a sacred charm
Is the flag that guards the land.
The time has come to pay up the debt,
Though my life it may demand."

And bravely the loyal fisher
Sailed to the southern sea,
Never a doe or a bait he took
For the deathly fishery;
But the starboard man at the straining rope
In the Northerner was he.

On the bloody deck of the Hartford
Last month the fisher lay;
The azure charm pricked on his arm
Was striped with red that day:
And the debt of twenty years was paid
With a life in Mobile Bay.

THE ACROBAT'S REVENGE.

I.

THE sun was setting behind the hills of Malbon one June evening in the year 1845, when an acrobat with his wife was seen plodding along the road toward the next market-town.

They were weary and sad. The acrobat himself was a man about thirty, of dark complexion, with raven black hair curling over his forehead. His eyes were black and piercing, and there was something in his look which bespoke a nature above that of a mountebank.

His wife was some years younger, and carried an infant child at her breast. She, too, had the appearance of a person superior to her lot, and her face was exceedingly pale.

Their life was a hard one, but they bore it well. Nor, as yet, had all the hardships which poverty had brought them quelled their love, as the proverb has it, flying out of the window.

They were now journeying to the market-town of Malbon, and, as to-morrow would be market-day, Duval thought he might come in for a portion of the money that would be changing hands. But as it was very dusk when he and his wife should have stopper after their long day's journey, and a place to sleep in, he was anxious to earn a few pence either in the town or before entering it, and presently an opportunity arose by which, as he thought, he might do so.

Almost opposite to him, at two or three hundred yards distance, was the lodge and noble gateway of a gentleman's park. As Duval approached it he heard voices mentioning his name in the air—the voices of children making merry, with their light young hearts and their clear ringing laughter.

As he came nearer he perceived that there were the saw between twenty and thirty children, in holiday attire, playing upon the lawn before an old and ancient mansion which had belonged for ages to the family for many generations, and was now in the possession of Sir William Wardle, Bart. Duval knew it, and it was the birthday of his little daughter which the children were celebrating.

The acrobat's eyes kindled as he looked in at the bevy of holiday-makers. Here was a grand chance for him. Surely it would delight the children to see him climb his gallows-tree, or to see his wife throw them up and up, like the ever-springing stream of a fountain. Surely all the other wonderful things he could do would be hailed with delight by them. Surely the great and wealthy parents would pay handsomely for the amusement of the little ladies and the little gentlemen. Duval looked in at the merriment, then slowly pushed open the gate, and walked in toward the lawn, followed by his wife.

He had there been at once, but for one permission he could have asked he would have done so. But there was no one but the children themselves; and, therefore, although he was in the park, he knew that they would like to see some of his feats. The girl smilingly replied that they would; and all the little fairy, white-frocked children looked as wide as they could go. And so intent was the little audience in watching the acrobat, and so intent was Duval in catching his various balls, that none of them perceived that Sir William Wandus was approaching from the mansion, and stood looking on with surprised strides, and when within a few paces of Duval he called out to him, in a voice of thunder,

"Vagabond! what are you doing here?"

For a moment Duval stood astounded and dumb at this sudden interruption. He saw before him a well-known uniform other than himself, a shooting coat and boots, with a felt hat; narrow-shouldered; fair, with shaven lip and chin, but bushy whiskers of deep red, and eyes of a pale steely grey, large and bright; and his bearing that of an aristocrat, with a strong dash of the bully.

"Come, pack up your company, and begone!" said the baronet, seeing that Duval stood looking at him. But the acrobat had recovered his self-possession, and now said, with a low bow:

"I meant no offense, your Honor; nor to harm any one or any thing belonging to you. I saw the children at play, and thought I might perhaps if would please them to see my—"

"Oh, that's a very old story," said the baronet. "What children and gipsies prowl about gentlemen's parks we all know that their intentions are perfectly innocent!"

"Do you call me a thief, Sir?" demanded Duval, his dark cheek coloring and his eyes flashing fire.

"Scoundrel!" exclaimed Sir William, his blood rushing into his face, and seeming for a moment as if red with rage; "do you think I would chat logic with a strolling vagabond like you? I said you to pack up and be off! Do so at once." And as the baronet uttered this command he raised the hand in which he held his whip, as if about to strike the acrobat.

Duval looked at him with a savage glare of his keen dark eyes, and slowly, as if with great reluctance, piling with suppressed rage, said—

"You had better not!"

"Duval" said his wife, gently pulling him by the sleeve, and in a tone of mingled pathos and humility, "never mind the gentleman. We shouldn't have come in without his leave. We humbly ask your pardon, Sir; come, Duval, let us go."

"Take your wife's advice, my man," said the game-keeper, "and don't come into gentlemen's parks no more till such times as you're specially invited. There, now, gather up your toggery and get out."

While Martha and the game-keeper had been speaking, Duval's eyes remained riveted on Sir William's. The baronet had dared to threaten him with a blow; with a blow of that whip with which he was wont to chastise his dogs. Duval would have died sooner than endure such a degradation, and he felt half-inclined to spring upon Sir William as it was, and try to obtain that vital grip of his to close fighting between man and man wealth and rank make no difference in pride of manhood or strength of limb. Sir William saw the fierce spirit that was struggling in the acrobat's breast. He felt that he could not beat the steely gaze he fixed on him, and that his proud and overbearing nature had met its match. His blood boiled with rage.

"Impudent villain!" he at last exclaimed, stamping on the ground, "do you dare to beard me, to browbeat me with your insolent look? Take that!" And lifting his arm he brought down his whip with a thud upon the acrobat's back that could be heard as far off as the lodge.

Mad with pain and rage, and with insult, Duval, with a tiger-spring, rushed at the baronet; and dearly would Sir William have paid for his rash act if the acrobat could only have had one blow at him, delivered with the prodigious strength of his muscular arm and terrible desperation. But as Duval rushed forward, Leo, one of the noblest hounds in Sir William's kennel, which had for some time watched the proceedings between master and beggar with grave, sedate face, sprang upon the acrobat and intercepted his attack. Meanwhile two undergame-keepers had entered. And Lady Wardle from her bedroom casement saw the struggle between the man and the dog, and wondered what it all could be about.

"Down, Leo, down!" cried Sir William, and the dog sprang away from the man and sat down by his master's side.

"Now pat him out," said the baronet, as he turned away and walked off toward the hall.

"It's no use attempting any more fun about it," said the good-natured game-keeper, as Duval sprang upon his feet, his face and hands covered with dust and blood. "Come, my man, be off in the lightest. Be advised and go your way quietly."

And Duval was advised, for more easily because of the appealing look his wife gave him as she quietly wiped the blood from his face. He slung his dress over one of his shoulders, and walked slowly toward the gate; he passed through it, closed it, and then pausing, he clenched his hand, and lifting it toward Heaven, cried out, in the agony of his heart,

"My God! I ask only this favor of thee—that I may one day be revenged!"

So he and his wife resumed their journey.

Presently a pony-chaise, driven by a lady, was heard behind them. They drew near to their side as the lady drew up; asked them, with slight agitation, the way to Natwich; then asked Martha whether she could tell her, and as it was a boy she looked at it, kissed it, dropped a sovereign into Martha's hands, and drove on. It was Lady Wandus.

II.

Two years passed, and a beautiful July by-gone found Sir William in a large and richly furnished drawing-room of a country mansion, every thing about which betokened the great wealth of its proprietor, who was at that time putting the finishing touches to a noble untilt, which every now and then looked up at his master, and gave a bark as if to ask what he could do for him. The baronet was not much the worse for the wear of the wealthy owner of Windus Park; for time had lavished on him all her favors—health, strength, wealth, a wife, a family, and two promising children. Well might Sir William be a proud man.

Suddenly the luxurious silence of the room was disturbed by a loud clamor in the hall, in which questions were heard rapidly put by some one in an agitated manner—"Where is my lady? Where is Sir William?" and the next moment Emily Carter, Lady Wandus's maid, rushed into the drawing-room.

Sir William and Lady Windus started up.

"What is the matter?" demanded the baronet.

"Oh, Sir William! oh, my lady!—oh, my dear good lady—"

And then Emily shrieked three or four times running, and, turning white as death, fell back into a chair in a fit.

"Heavens on earth!" exclaimed Sir William; "what is the meaning of all this? Chambers, do you know?"

"Only, Sir William," said Chambers, very slowly, and following the words with a provision which showed that she was resolved neither to under nor over state what she had heard from Emily; "only, Sir William, that Miss Emily Carter came to the door, as I were looking out on the lawn, and with a awful countenance, and every one knows what Emily's countenances are when Emily's in one of hers—"

"Confound it, woman! come to the point!" cried Sir William.

"So, Sir, she says to me," Chambers suddenly quickening her pace; "'the children,' says she, 'is the best, by—' says she 'Sir William [" says she; 'where's my lady?' And when I told her, Sir, where you and my lady was, she rushes in, and as my master Chambers that's all as Emily Carter said to me."

Though Chambers's information was neither copious nor distinct, it conveyed forcibly enough that the children were in danger, and that the boat had something to do with it.

His impatience to describe the ghastly line which spread over Sir William's face, as the thought flashed across his mind that his children had been drowned—"But he is dead!" seemed to realize the possibility of such a calamity when in stole the curate, with a soft step and a smiling face.

"There is no imminent danger," he said, at once. "There is yet half an hour, during which it is quite possible to save them. But lose not a moment in pushing a message to the horsback to the nearest fisherman, and bid him bring round his boat directly. It won't lend me one of your horses, I'll go myself."

Orders were given for the immediate saddling of a horse, and meanwhile Sir William learned from Mr. Ling that Master William had run his boat upon a sunken rock; that she had filled and gone down; and that the boy, with his sister, were now upon a point of rock a quarter of a mile from the shore, from which they were cut off by the flowing tide. In half an hour the time in which the boat would be a foot below water, and unless a boat could be procured by that time, they would be in peril.

In a few seconds more the saddled horse stood at the door. Mr. Ling mounted it and rode off.

By this time, however, Lady Windus was on her way down to the shore. The moment she heard of the boat she guessed all the rest.

The truth, however, was that Emily and Miss Jean had been sent out in the pony phaeton, under the charge of the page, for a drive; that William, seeing the equipage, ran his boat inshore; and that, as Emily declined to venture on account of her tendency to tide, and her dislike of sharks, he took his sister, if he (as was likely will and pleasure under his protection. The boat struck, filled, and went down; and, by the greatest good fortune, William, with Jean on his back, was able to reach the point of rock on which he now stood.

What were the feelings of Lady Windus when she reached the shore, and beheld her children on a small spot of rock, with the sea all round them—beneath them—was terrible. It is true—but with the tide flowing, and every minute covering a fresh portion of the rock on which her babes were standing.

But in vain did her mother's heart swell within her till it was nigh bursting, as she saw the little dimpled hands of her Jean stretched out toward her, and her lovely boy took off his cap and waved it cheeringly to her with a manly courage, which he drew from her own generous blood much more than from his sire.

But could nothing be done?

Sir William now appeared on the road which ran along the shore. He was followed by the game-keeper; by Emily Carter, who had recovered; by Sarah Chambers, who wished to see with her own eyes what the precise extent of the danger was; by the housekeeper, the stable-boy, and a rat-catcher who happened to be passing along the road at the time, and who was known to the boys by the love of the terrible which hings, pillosephers, high dames and low, rat-catchers, turnouts, and rat-catchers, share equally among them.

Well, was there no one there who could swim?

Unhappily Sir William could not, nor the game-keeper. Sarah Chambers said, if there was no one who could make the attempt, she herself would try it; but, when questioned as to powers as a swimmer, she replied that she could only float; and that even that feat she had never performed out of her bath.

The rat-catcher being applied to by Emily Carter, looked at that young person solemnly for several seconds, and then quietly closed his eyes, and thus addressed her:

"Young woman, do you see this here rat in this here cage?"

"Well?" demanded Emily, with much dignity.

"Then, unless none on you can swim furderer nor me, either in deeps or shallers, you'll never think ole happens, which I sees no promising sign on, I wouldn't give the life of this here rat for the life of them two children."

And the tide was rising. Smooth as glass—unruffled, unbroken, and smiling as a lake—the water was rising, and Lady Windus could see that already it was licking the feet of her children.

"Look here, Sir William!" she exclaimed, at the same time directing her husband's attention to the rock; "he lifts her up. The water is at their feet! Good God! we shall do nothing!"

Yes, it was true. The water was at their feet. William had raised Jean in his arms; and as he was a tall mother distinguished the heroism of action in them, he called out, though she couldn't hear him—

"All right, mamma; there's plenty of time yet." And surely it did seem so. The sea was flowing in. Often as the party on the shore turned their eyes in the direction in which Mr. Ling had ridden to procure a boat, there was nothing in sight.

Lady Windus had fainted. Sir William stood the picture of agony, looking at his children. Sarah Chambers, Emily, and the stable-boy wept around the old game-keeper, who assisted them in shedding a great many tears, but had nothing better to offer his young master and Miss Jean, though he avowed, and perhaps truly, that he was ready to die for them.

The rat-catcher had seated himself on a stone.

"Are those your children?" asked a man who stood at Sir William's side, but whose approach had not been noticed.

The baronet did not turn to look at the speaker. It was some one, indeed, before he had imagined that any one had addressed him; but when he did so, he replied, in a deep whisper of despair—

"They are."

The man's gaze was fixed upon the children. Sir William's was fixed upon him. He thought he remembered him, but he did, for the moment, recollect.

It was Duval!—Duval, who had prayed for vengeance as the sole favor for which he would trouble Heaven. It was Duval, at whose feet his wife could be said ever to have had one, all the miseries of life had knocked, and at whose hearth they had seated themselves—he did not dare, whom he had loved more than himself—Martha—did not she lie in her cold grave, with her baby by her side, in the same stranger's coffin? And now—what was left to Duval?—only to wait for death!

Nay, something more—to live for revenge!

For no time was made in appearance, the tide had risen six inches more, and now they saw the boy kneel down in the water, and look up as if he were praying. And only Duval could save him and his sister—only Duval. He alone, of all who stood there, could breast the flood for the boat, and take the girl on the rock and back again with the boy.

Why not tell Sir William so? Why not, indeed? Is not revenge sweet?

And still the tide was rising. Lady Windus, restored for a moment to consciousness, opened her eyes; but no sooner realized her position than she relapsed into insensibility.

"Sir William," said Duval; "I see you remember me! Once I thirsted for revenge upon you! For two long years I thirsted for it, and prayed for it. Heaven has sent it to me!"

A bright light shot from his eyes as he said this, and then he slowly walked down to within a few paces of the water. He undressed; he waded into the sea till it came up to his breast, and then, throwing himself forward, struck out for the rock.

We shall not describe the joy with which the parents, who had watched in agonized suspense the acrobat's attempt to rescue their children, received them back into their arms. But while they were fondling them, David had dressed and slipped away. He had regained the road, and was pursuing his journey with a light step and a light heart, for he had had his reward.

No, not all of it. Sir William no sooner missed him than he set out in pursuit of him.

"Here," said he to the acrobat, when at last he came up with him, endeavoring to put a well-filled purse into David's hand. "You have saved my children, and are entitled—I say entitled—to a reward."

David drew back his hand.

"I have had it!" he exclaimed, darting a look of fierce and withering scorn at the baronet, and then, turning from him with an expression of contempt, pursued his journey.

And the proud baronet stood looking after him, rebuked and humbled.

American Watches.

The high premium on gold, and the increased rate of duty on watches, have greatly enhanced the cost of those of foreign manufacture, and it will be impossible to purchase a good watch, of English or Swiss make, except at a very extravagant price. For the same cause, the cheaper watches of the same grade, the watches known as Anchor Lepines which flood the country, have risen to the price at which the American Watch Company furnish their well-known "Wm. Ellery" movement, which is a most substantial manufacture, and an accurate and durable time-keeper.

Our higher-priced watches are relatively still cheaper. We have advanced the prices of our movements but about 25 per cent. since the war began, while foreign watches of the same grade cost 34 times their ante-war prices.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical

PINEAPPLE CIDER,

Is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS.—The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years convinces him that it is time the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the public. Every bottle will last a well person one year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring; nevertheless it will save many lives from being sick. It is not better to pay two dollars a year to keep from being sick than to pay the present prices of sickness, doctors, and as much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? To prevent sickness one so believes. Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will impart new strength and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds of flesh in one month, and that he has a constitution he can now be directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire preventive to sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Medicated Cider for a long time past, and has not been sick one day during that time.

Price $5 per bottle (full quart). For sale every where. All orders should be addressed to

DR. T. TALBOT,
Sole Agent,

Brandreth's Pills

Not only cleanse the blood from impurities, but they make it rich in those great qualities upon which its health and strength in a great measure depend. Where ulceration has laid bare ligament and bone, and when no means seemed likely to save life, patients have, by Brandreth's Pills, been restored to good health, as tens of thousands willingly testify.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchasers none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VIII.—No. 406.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1864. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

MAJOR-GENERAL PHILIP H. SHERIDAN.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 653.]

THE BAYONET CHARGE.

Nor a sound, not a breath,
All as silent as death,
As we stand on the steep in our bayonet's shine;
All is tumult below—
Stamping friend, surging foe;
But not a hair's-breadth moves our advanced line—
Waiting us grimly.

The battle-smoke rifts
From the valley, and drifts
Round the hill, where we stand like a girt for the world;
And a glimpse now and then
Through the billows of men,
In whose black boiling surge we are soon to be hurled—
Ready and dimly.

There's the word! Ready all!
See the serried points fall—
The grim horizontal—bright mid so hare!
Then the other word—Ho!
We are moving! Hurrah!
We swell the hurrah! prouder, we plunge in the glare—
Rushing to glory!

Down the hill, up the glen,
Over the dints of men,
Then on, with a cheer, to the roaring redoubt!
Why stumble so, Neal?
No answer. He's dead!
And there's Dutch Peter down, with his life leaping out,
Crimson and gory!

On! on! Do not think
Of single falling, but drink
Of the mad, living cataract-torrent of war!
On! on! let them feel
The cold vengeance of steel!
Catch the Captain—he's shot! Then catch—nothing more!
Forward forever!

Hurra! Here's the trench!
In and out of it! Wrench
From the jaws of the cannon the guerdon of Fame!
Charge! charge! with a yell,
Like the shriek of a shell—
Over the shako, on through the curtain of flame!
Back again! Never!

The rampart! The crowd—
It is ours! It is lost!
No—another dash now and the glacis is won!
Hurra! Hurra! Hurra!
Hew them down! Cut and thrust!
A T-o-g-e-t brave lads, for the rest work is done—
Victory! victory!

There's a ash in the night.
In the gold sun morning light,
I stand on the works, looking back there, with pain,
Where the death-doer of war
Stains the daisy's white star,
And God's broken image scatter the plain.
Hush! Do not speak to me!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1864.

UNDER A WHOLE LINE.

THE divisions in the Union ranks are, as we have been always sure they would be, healed. Mr. FREMONT has withdrawn his name from the canvass in a letter far from magnanimous. Mr. COCHRANE has taken strong ground against the Chicago principles and candidates. But much more important is the fact that Mr. CHASE, Mr. WADE, and Mr. WINTER DAVIS have waived their differences with the Administration upon certain points of policy, and recognising that there are, and can be, but two parties in this contest, are devoting themselves earnestly to the triumph of the Union and the Government as represented by ABRAHAM LINCOLN and ANDREW JOHNSON.

This frank and hearty union for the sake of union is but one of the innumerable auguries of success which are every where revealing themselves. The doubt of a few weeks since has entirely disappeared. The uncertainty has been utterly dissipated by the Chicago Convention and its candidates—one of whom is an honest and sound secessionist, while the other looks for his support to the party which either justifies or excuses the rebellion.

Until the Chicago party made their platform, and nominations there was a chance, although not much hope, that they might take the path which any truly great leader would have seen to be the only possible way to success; and no doubt in the public mind a few weeks since arose from the uncertainty whether they would do this. If Lincoln had been nominated the Chicago Convention would not have been managed by the men who controlled it, nor would it have hoped to carry a Presidential election by appealing to national cowardice and relying upon national disgrace. The nomination of Mr. PENDLETON, an extreme State-Sovereignty man, was the work of JOHN C. CALHOUN over ANDREW JACKSON, of Nullification over Union; and in surrendering to the ghost of CALHOUN and the threats of South Carolina, the Chicago party, usurping the name of Democracy, surrendered the Nation, the Union, and the Government.

It was evident that the public mind would be relieved by the action of the Convention. If by any miracle it should pronounce for a more vigorous war, for the emancipation policy, as a ground of permanent peace, and nominate a man like General DIX, any loyal man, as we have before said, would feel that the canvass was only a generous rivalry of patriotism. Yet such an action as this was no more to be reasonably expected from a Convention officered and managed as the Chicago assembly was sure to be—and as it was—than fidelity to the Union was to be expected in DAVIS or TOOMBS. Still there were many who loved the Democratic name, and who hoped against hope. But when the Chicago party met, declared their principles, and nominated their candidates, the situation was so plain, the consequences of their success so palpable, that no man who did not believe DAVIS to be in the right could possibly support the Chicago action. It was a mere evident fact that all old Democrats who valued the Government more than party must vote for the candidates who represented the unconditional maintenance of the Government, while all old Republicans, however they might differ upon points of policy with the President, could not fail to see that either he must be re-elected or the Government would be overthrown.

It is not surprising, therefore, that M'CLELLAN'S and PENDLETON'S chances have been decreasing ever since they were nominated. The case is too plain. Nobody denies that there are men at the North who wish well to the rebellion —men who, with Mr. PENDLETON, deny the right of the Government to enforce the laws—men who would willingly raise a counter-revolution to secure the success of DAVIS and his confederates—and nobody denies that all such persons are ardent supporters of M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON. But the mass of the American people do not wish well to the rebellion—they do believe that the Government has the right and the power to maintain itself, and they do not desire to counter-action to help DAVIS. And as they are now shut up to a choice between LINCOLN and JOHNSON and M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON, seeing in the two first-named men whom the people at all parts of the country bitterly hate, and in the last two men whom the friends of the rebellion ardently support, they are in doubt no longer, and as sure as fate of victory as SHERIDAN was when he attacked EARLY.

CANT.

GENERAL SHERMAN is as terrible a fighter with the pen as with the sword; and it is an instructive commentary upon our progress in the art of war to compare the letter of the Hero of Atlanta with that of the other General SHERMAN at Port Royal in the beginning of the struggle.

The rebel Generals have canted throughout the conflict as lustily as the Northern Copperheads. From BEAUREGARD'S "Booty and Beauty" proclamation before the first Bull Run battle, down to HOOD'S charge of "studied and ungenerous cruelty," there has been a steady stream of cant from the mouths of the rebel civil chiefs and military leaders, as well as from all their friends at the North and in Europe.

The war has been described as "fratricidal," "sanguinary," "savage," "barbarous," and "of course it is." All war is. And how fearful, therefore, is their responsibility who begin it. The Copperhead orators and papers are very fond of this strain. If SHERIDAN gains a victory, or SHERMAN, or FARRAGUT, or GRANT, these people fall to shedding tears and bemoaning the families made wretched. Tears enough must indeed be shed, hearts broken, and homes desolated so long as the war lasts. Why, then, do not these canting Mawworms entreat their friends the public enemies to lay down their arms and give us peace? If the Copperhead heart is so wrung with the misery of wounded soldiers and widowed households, let it urge the deluded men who are resisting the Government which never harmed them to submit to the laws which they themselves helped to make.

When the haughty leaders of the rebels threatened the country before the attack on Sumter, when they declared that if they could not have their own way they would destroy the Government and dissolve the Union, why did not these plaintive Copperheads hiss them down, and recount the horrors of bloodshed they saw which were provoking? Instead of that they cried to the friends of the Union and the Constitution that if they did not submit to the menaces of those leaders, they, the Unionists, would be responsible for the bloodshed! That is to say, if you awake and find a ruffian with his hand at your wife's throat, you are guilty, if in the struggle she is hurt.

That is the contemptible cant which crops out in the Chicago platform, and in all the harangues and papers of the Chicago party. The war is shocking, they say, and ought to stop. Certainly it ought, and when those who began it choose to stop and disband, then the honorable the American people will fight them—spelling fight as SHERIDAN is reported to spell it, "F-i-g-h-t, kill"—until they do choose to stop.

General SHERMAN says to the Mayor of Atlanta what every true heart in the land confirms and approves: "War is cruelty and you can not refine it: and those who make war on our country deserve all the curses and maledictions a people can pour out.....You might as well appeal against the thunder-storm as against these terrible hardships of war. They are inevitable, and the only way the people of Atlanta can hope once more to live in peace and quiet at home is to stop this war, which can alone be done by admitting that it began in error and is perpetuated in pride.....Now that war comes home to you you feel very different—you deprecate its horrors, but did not feel them when you sent car-loads of soldiers and ammunition, and moulded shell and shot to carry war into Kentucky and Tennessee, and dedicate the homes of hundreds and thousands of good people who only asked to live in peace at their old homes and under the Government of their inheritance .....I want peace, and believe it can only be reached through Union and war, and I will therefore pursue it until it is obtained, or I perish, and early secure."

So in his reply to HOOD'S canting talk about "cruelty" General SHERMAN says: "Talk thus to the marines, but not to me, who have seen these things.....If we must be enemies, let us be men and fight it out as we propose to-day, and not deal in such hypocritical appeals to God and humanity."

Fighting is bad enough under any circumstances, but canting is a great deal worse.

A QUESTION AND AN ANSWER.

MR. JAMES GUTHRIE, one of the makers of the Chicago platform, asks, in a late speech in Indiana, "Who dares say that we shall not have peace upon the basis of the integrity of the Federal Union?"

Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON, who, with General GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN, stands upon Mr. GUTHRIE'S platform, and for whom, as Vice-President of the United States, Mr. GUTHRIE intends to vote, is the man who dares to say it. Mr. PENDLETON says frankly: "If your differences are so great that you can not or will not reconcile them, then, gentlemen, let the seceding States depart in peace."

That is peace upon the basis of the dissolution of the Union. Mr. M'CLELLAN is answered by his own candidate.

NO ESCAPE.

THERE are some supporters of the Chicago nominations who say that it is unfair to charge them with practical disunionism. They declare that they are as good Union men as are to be found. They point to M'CLELLAN'S letter, and insist that it is a Union letter.

But these gentlemen will remember that BEAUREGARD called himself very loudly "a Union man" in 1860. His supporters were indignant if they were charged with want of fidelity to the Union; and they declared that they were, in fact, the only Unionist party.

So to claim to be a Union man is not enough. And if any voter sincerely believes that the Union ought to be and can be maintained, and the authority of the Government re-established over the whole country, and that the war should be prosecuted until that result is achieved, how can he consistently support a nomination which, to say the least, is only half-way for the Union? Suppose General M'CLELLAN could be separated from his supporters, and their leaders, and their platform: but their policy—which comprise all the disunion elements in the country—how can he be torn from his companion upon the ticket? Mr. ROBERT C. WINTHROP kicks over the platform—does he also kick over one of the candidates upon it? He knows, and every body knows, that General M'CLELLAN can not be voted for without PENDLETON. If M'CLELLAN should be elected and die—as Presidents HARRISON and TAYLOR did—then Mr. PENDLETON becomes President, and he will have been made so by the votes of Mr. WOOD, Mr. WINTHROP, Captain RYNDERS, and their friends. The President of the United States would then be a disunionist. But if Mr. LINCOLN be re-elected, and by his decease Mr. ANDREW JOHNSON should become President, there would be as true and loyal a Union man in the chair as if the President had lived.

How can any honorable Union man justify his course in giving such a risk as that of elevating Mr. PENDLETON to the Presidency? There is only one way, and that is by saying, "Oh! well, General M'CLELLAN isn't going to be elected; they will even be sure to be defeated; and if it should turn out that he was, how could any sincere Unionist ever excuse himself to his own heart for helping elect a President who believes that JEFFERSON DAVIS is perfectly right? Let Union men, whatever their personal preferences may be, ponder the following sentiments, and consider if they were not all they must vote for one or the other of the speakers.

In the Congress of 1860–'61 Mr. PENDLETON was a representative from Ohio, and Mr. JOHNSON a Senator from Tennessee. When the secession movement began Mr. PENDLETON in an elaborate speech said:

"It your differences are so great that you can not or will not reconcile them, then, gentlemen, let the seceding States depart in peace; let them establish their government and empire, and work out their destiny according to the wisdom which God has given them."

Mr. PENDLETON is, in fact, a disunionist of the extremest Calhoun school, and holds exactly the same views now as then. In the same session ANDREW JOHNSON said:

"I will not give up this Government that is now called an experiment, which some are prepared to abandon for a constitutional monarchy. No. I intend to stand by it, and I entreat every man throughout the nation, who is a patriot, and who has seen, and is compelled to admit the excess of this new experiment, to come forward not in heat, not in fanaticism, not in haste, not in precipitancy, but in deliberation, in full view of all that is before us, in the spirit of brotherly love and fraternal affection, and fully around the altar of our common country, and by the Constitution upon it as our last bulwark, and resort to our God and all that is sacred and holy, that the Constitution that he saved and the Union preserved."

Which of these two men—however blameless the character of each may be—would every true Union man wish to see President of the United States?

TO YOUR KNEES, YANKEES!

THE Richmond Dispatch, stung to fury by EARLY'S defeat, cries out:

"The Yankees are the most mercenary of God's creatures. If the ministry of our Saviour had been among them instead of the Jews, instead of lasting three years it would not have lasted three days. Some Yankee Judas would have sold him in less than half that time. And yet the Yankee lover his life better even than his interest; and when the universal nation finds that nothing but death is to be gotten by coming here, they will conclude that it was not pay, and will give it up. The best road to peace lies through the blood of the Yankees. The more we kill, the nearer we approach to peace."

This is precisely the view which the PENDLETON-M'CLELLAN Convention takes of the American people; and it proposes to those people to justify the view by surrendering their Government to such armed enemies. If they really were what the rebel paper says and the Chicago party believes, they would submit at once. But as they are not, they will say, "Yes, we are poor, but the ballot-box on the 8th of November, as forcibly as SHERIDAN, SHERMAN, FARRAGUT, and GRANT say it from their shotted guns.

NEWS QUESTIONS!

IT is in vain that General M'CLELLAN, in stepping upon the Chicago Platform and placing himself by the side of Mr. PENDLETON, says: "The Union at all hazards."

If he is for the Union at all hazards, why is he the candidate of all who repudiate the Union?

If he is for the Union at all hazards, why is he the fellow-candidate of Mr. PENDLETON, who avowly thanked God that he "had never voted or given a dollar in support of the war, or in payment of abolition soldiers?"

If he is for the Union at all hazards, why is he the candidate of a Convention which declares the war a failure, calls for an immediate cessation of hostilities, and asks for a Convention to surrender the authority of the Government?

If he is for the Union at all hazards, why has he accepted the Chicago nomination without a word of protest against its assumption that the war is a failure, and without a syllable of dissent from its base proposition to surrender the Government by treating with rebels and offering conditions of obedience to the law?

If he is for the Union at all hazards, why is he supported by every advocate of State rights against the sovereignty of the Union?

If he is for the Union at all hazards, why does HORATIO SEYMOUR support him, who says that if the Union can not be maintained without emancipation, the Union must go that Slavery may be saved?

If he is for the Union at all hazards, why shall the rebel Senator SAULSBURY vote for Jackson, "Our (the rebel) hopes for an early peace are dependent entirely on the success of the Democratic party at the North in the approaching Presidential election?"

If he is for the Union at all hazards, why do the rebel-dissunion papers declare that "the influence of the South, more powerful in the shock of battle than when throwing our minority vote in an electoral college, will be cast in favor of M'CLELLAN?

If he is for the Union at all hazards, why does the news of Union victories decrease his chances of election?

A PLAIN TRUTH.

THE great light which has been shining in the Shenandoah Valley has illuminated the political situation as that it is impossible to misunderstand it. The Richmond Examiner says that "every defeat of LINCOLN'S forces insures the advantage of M'CLELLAN." The Charleston Courier says that the victory of the rebels "insures the success of M'CLELLAN; their failure insures his defeat." Have not the Richmond oracles thus illustrated the strict truth of these remarks? Have not the political friends and opponents of the Chicago candidate been equally aware that every thing depending the original protest of the national heart against the cowardly declaration that the war is a failure, and that we must hasten to implore terms of our victors? Have they not all equally known that the glad bulletins of SHERIDAN'S successes came like tidings of defeat to the Chicago decrying and disunion candidates?

Are the American people conquered? That is the question which the election decides. The friends of M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON declare that they are; those of LINCOLN and JOHNSON insist that they are not. Therefore, if the tide of battle in the Shenandoah had turned against Union, the M'CLELLAN-PENDLETON party would have said, "There! we told you so. It's no use trying. We are whipped, and we may as well own it at the polls as we did at Chicago." If to-morrow news should come that SHERMAN had been driven from Atlanta and GRANT from Petersburg, the same party would exult in the rebel triumph, and see in the national humiliation and disaster the grounds of hope for their candidates. On the other hand, if Richmond should fall before November, would there be much doubt of the election of the Union candidates?

Facts like these tell the whole story. The cause and the candidates which are helped by the victories of GRANT and SHERIDAN, of SHERMAN and FARRAGUT, are the cause and candidates of the country. But the party whose prospects improve with the defeat of American soldiers and sailors is not the party that any loyal American heart supports.

TWO WAYS OF HEARING GOOD NEWS.

In the midst of a heroic and successful war to maintain the Government against traitors in arms a Major-General of the United States army accepts the nomination for the Presidency, offered him by a Convention in which every enemy of that Government was represented, and the leaders of which were fresh from interviews with foreign agents and rebel emissaries in Canada. This Major-General accepts the nomination of a Convention which, on the very day of its meeting at Atlanta, calls for an immediate cessation of hostilities, and just as SHERMAN in the Shenandoah Valley is hard to strike decisively, he will be a failure. The Major-General accepts, and has not a word of censure for such craven and un-AMERICAN sentiments as these, but has plenty to say of conciliation and statesmanship.

Yet on the very day when the electrified land thrilled with the glad tidings from SHERMAN, when every loyal heart was devoutly thanking God for victory, and overflowing in gratitude to the brave soldiers who had given it to us, this Major-General is exulted upon by a number of his fellow-citizens. There is scarcely a civilian in the land whose joy in the victory would not have leaped from his lips in exulting strains; but this Major-General, who had been forced by very fond of speaking of "my own army," and of "sharing the fate" of his soldiers, did not utter a solitary word of sympathy or consolation for the army of the Shenandoah, and did not make the least allusion to the great victory.

Why did he not? Because the crowd were his political friends, and he knew that such news was not welcome to them.

But there was another General that heard the news, and that was General-Commanding GRANT, his hearty congratulations to SHERIDAN and his men, and ordered a salute of a hundred shotted guns to be fired against the enemy's lines in honor of the tremendous victory.

And there was another crowd that heard the same news. It was the army before Petersburg. And the jubilant shouting that their comrades with such jubilant shouts that they were heard in Petersburg, and conveyed to the rebels the first news of their defeat.

Which was the Union crowd? Which means the Union at all hazards?

FROM PETERSBURG.

It is pleasant to know that our paper goes to the army, and that its sentiments are approved at the front. We can not be far wrong if the men who are pushing their fight for the cause send us back a cheer. We receive many letters of recognition, which have always a hearty welcome if we can not find room to print them. But here is one which is sure to interest our readers. It is from a cavalry private:

"NEAR PETERSBURG, VA., September, 1864.

"Editor Harper's Weekly:

"SIR,—I am a soldier who has lost three years, and intend to be during the war. I read your paper, and as a soldier I sincerely thank you for the cause and sentiments it shows.

"During the last two months I stood picket every alternate day within 400 yards of the rebels, and have very frequently exchanged your Weekly for the Richmond journals. During that time I have read at least two in the day of their papers, and am conversant with their views of the war and of peace. During the last month I have discovered with at least 100 of their men recruiting difference between them and us. As a whole, they place little reliance on their own journals, and look to ours for the news, and, I must here say, sympathy. They have told me that they do not expect to whip us themselves, but expect their friends the Copperheads—i. e., Democrats—to decide the contest in their favor at the right moment. I expect they mean next election.

"The Virginians are by far our strongest opponents. They rule the Confederacy; their Generals lead the armies. They are the men we want to catch. They think they are safe to whip the whole North alone. Their State has been completely devastated by our armies, and in consequence they have lost every thing. I can not say they are fine.

"North Carolina is a Conservative, lukewarm State, and wishes they were out of the war.

"South Carolinians are appalled at our resources, and think it is all up with them; still, as they were first in, they can't very well back out. If Atlanta and Mobile are taken the Georgians will not back water in a hurry either. Alabama ditto. Mississippi same. Now what is her chief formidable? Nothing but her last and her army.

"We soldiers are for no peace while a rebel lives. No compromise, no armistice; but we are for subjugation, confiscation, emancipation, and annihilation.

"The blood of the best of our land calls for this. Their children must and shall have a home in the land of their slayers.

"I shall cast my first vote this election, and it will be for an honest man, ABE LINCOLN.

"The Chicago platform, whoever he will be, will be either a traitor or will be governed by traitors.

"If SEYMOUR is a Democrat so is JEFF DAVIS; he wears all the Southern sentiments; or are all the rebel Generals; so was the man who shot my best friend. A Copperhead would say ANDREW JACKSON was a Democrat; but AMERICAN soldiers can see all seceders or rebels of any name; and if he was President he would have put the Governor of the mighty State of New York in Fort Lafayette, and so had a place, MORRIS CHANGO CONVERSMITH, as Bella Wilfer calls every picking at you.

"I don't say much of MCCLELLAN. The rebels think too much of him for me.

"We will vote for old ABE, and we are in earnest. If you were here at this moment and heard the shells bursting over your head, you would be.

"Perseverance, Mr. Editor. You will win, and we will. Then we will have a meeting—peace meeting."

CAMPAIGN PICTURES

We are glad to know that the pictures published in the Weekly are felt to be helpful in the good cause. From among the letters from all parts of the country approving them, we select one, hearty one from a Captain in the Michigan Cavalry:

"MR. EDITOR.—Allow me to suggest that those two excellent designs of Mr. THOMAS—"Compromise with the South" and "Blessings of Victory"—published in your Weekly, be offered to the public at cheaper paper, that they may be framed and hung up in every hotel, railroad depôt, and other places of general resort throughout the North, as being the most natural and powerful explanations of the issues to be settled by our armies and by the November election.

"I am here recovering from a wound received before Atlanta, and when I return to my regiment I shall carry with me those framed pictures. I think I can greatly promote truly loyal and superior paper circulate so generally in this State that they may see them before they return; but I shall make sure of it."

FROM ATLANTA.

A LETTER from an officer in SHERMAN'S army shows how firmly fixed its heart is upon unconditional surrender. It says that the army will regard that as to be bought by national dishonor and cowardice:

"ATLANTA, GEORGIA, September 11, 1864.

"Thanks for the copies of Harper's Weekly for some of the nameless heroes dead. It only remains now to give the same commander of the living and fighting down their arms, and humbly using pardon of JEFF DAVIS and his cohorts for the pain and grief caused them by our most unchristian-like conduct. Surrender! Why, what else can? Can't we have it?

"The Chicago platform proposition high with the President of the United States reading backward all his declarations in favor of the Union, and the resolutions of Conventions, in the words of hope and encouragement to the enslaved, every good and true sentiment which he has spoken as the head of a great nation, in the proclamations of emancipation, standing the scanner rescue and erase all the lines of hatred which he has fought in his Proclamation of Amnesty, dishonored waster of human life to his little place at Washington, and the Chicago platform will be trampled in the all the rest lay down their swords, tear off their coats of blue, and their badges of rank, and, clad in dingy butternut or dirty gray, return to their homes and their employments. Such compromise now commissions of a rank befitting those who have followed our flag, and who have fought that it might receive under the orders of those chivalric men who have striven with unparalleled success to put down the Republican on the ruins of the republic. Let the long procession close with the countless multitudes of those brave men who have fallen in the battles and the sieges and in the battle-field, returning cowed and despairing, and rugged and torn and bloody battle-flags, trailing in the dust, the torn banners dragged in the dust, the scorn and derision of the people and nations who for the past four years looked up to the peace which these soldiers had kept at the North by furnishing the living wall against the desolation of hostile armies.

"I can not believe that such an end to such an enlightened nation as this that our Chicago friends, if they succeed, have started on. The Democratic party presents a sad picture. Really that which has wakened the most anxiety in our minds of late is the fear that this campaign, now so happily ended, has not been the enemy in our rear but that in our rear. It was not so much the bullets of HOOD'S army as the gloomy gaze in opprobrium in the faces of those who were all trying, so many, to, at the cornice of life itself, to save the nation, even at the sacrifice of their own existing it, if so we must, so large a number, that they were the representatives of people belonging to the nation of which we too are a part, should be found who could to alienate that nation from us. I wonder if these men really know what they are about. It is a question that they want, now in the hour of our approaching triumph, to turn their bolts of opposition battery, and treat us as if we did not exist?

"This army is solid, and means that the nation shall be one. For the utterance at Chicago, so full of deceit, and lacking every thing in which any true American can take pride, we have the most supreme. I do not know but we shall yet be called upon to give the greatest proof of the devotion of the army to the nation. I again call again staking the lives of those brave men on the battlefield to save to them demented people the blessings which they have given to us. Now I think we must do it. In the war, that we should only have to do that for our Southern brethren, and now I think we must do it for the North likewise. Pray do not say thing like spathy, or indifference, or any thing of the kind. Pray do not give us the great object of all our struggles, and so imperil the future of the country and of humanity."

WESTERN ILLINOIS SANITARY FAIR.

WHILE the army and navy are pressing on in front, the soldiers and sailors are remembered at home. The Sanitary Fairs, which have already proved so great and efficient aid to the soldier in the field, are not yet at an end—nor, we hope, will they be while one soldier is exposed to wounds and sickness and danger. The Western Illinois Sanitary Fair will open on the 11th of October, at Quincy, Illinois, and appeals now to the sympathy and aid of the loyal people of the North in the West. The State of Illinois has contributed nearly 200,000 men to the army and navy, and, as the circular truly says:

"From Belmont to Mission Ridge, throughout the long list of battles and victories which have immortalized the career of that Great Captain whom our State has furnished to the chief command of the Army; from Resaca to Atlanta, along the route of the great Georgia campaign, which stands unrivaled in all the chronicles of war, and in the remote conflicts in Virginia and the States along the coast, the unconquerable fortitude of her sons has been forth to hurl back the legions of the enemy and secure victory for our arms."

Illinois soldiers stand by the Union; let the Union stand by the Illinois soldiers. The address of the General Agent, to whom contributions may be sent, is Colonel JAMES T. DUCKER, office of Miner's Central Railroad, 31 Nassau Street, New York.

GENERAL SEYMOUR.

IN speaking, a few weeks since, of General SEYMOUR'S admirable letter after his return from Charleston, we implied that his sympathies had been rather with the rebels than against it. We have received a letter from a friend of the General's, dated 'In the field, near Petersburg," for which we can not find room entirely, but most gladly insert what we can:

"EDITOR OF 'HARPER'S WEEKLY.'—You unintentionally do injustice to General SEYMOUR in your last editorial. You say, after referring to his capture and imprisonment, 'and could not, then or since, utter a word of reproach against the rebels, for he had no political sympathies against them.' Now, I know that General SEYMOUR has the same prejudices, if you call them such, against the rebels that all high-minded, chivalrous soldiers of the Union have, and his military record has had any political sympathies with them. Great injustice has been done to General SEYMOUR in asserting him of pro-slaveryism, and all that sort of thing. Because he bears the same name with a couple of gentlemen whose loyalty, to say the least, is of a very mild type, he has been supposed to be of the same politics, and one journal at least has asserted that he is their cousin. General SEYMOUR'S father is a venerable Methodist clergyman, of the Troy Conference, and the General has been brought up in the old-anti-slavery principles taught him in his boyhood.

"True it is that, by reason of his modesty, he has not always made his political opinions as public as his military ones, but the rebels need fight. He foresaw the war long before, and refused the Presidency of the Erie Railroad, Military Governorship which he had been elected, chiefly on that account. He comprehended the war at the very beginning. The day after he arrived in Washington he said that the President should at once call out 500,000 men, for we were going to have a great war.

"His letter has struck a chord responsive in every loyal heart in the army. We are neither going to submit to peace-men at home nor yield to Southern rebels. We intend to fight it out, and compel all rebels every where to lay down their arms.

"We shall vote for MR. LINCOLN—not because we care a fig about him personally, but because he is the honest, patriotic representative of the great principle that has actuated him especially dislike—his large assortment of political blackguards and traitors, for instance—but because we believe he is necessary to the Union.

"No man would be to ignominiously give up the contest. We find fault with him while we have been fighting, and during our blood in defending the country against traitors, but he has stood firm in the face of opposition and public ill, and hinder the draft and discourage enlistments, and scarcely any one has made organized resistance. But we are not on this account going to throw ourselves into the hands of those who take traitors into their councils, and honor them with seats in their cabinet, or to their party platform. God forbid that we should so stultify ourselves! God forbid that we should ever be so false to our country and to the brave dead, whose blood poured out here has made the most sacred ground—consecrated it to liberty and law forever!"

Our correspondent speaks warmly of the injustice which he thinks has been done to General SEYMOUR by not promoting him. We hope sincerely that his merit may be properly recognized; and meanwhile we are sure his friend who writes for us that the General has promoted himself to the honorable admiration and respect of every loyal American.

THE SEVEN-THIRTY LOAN.

We learn from the circular of Messrs. FISK and HATCH, bankers in New York, that this patriotic loan, of which we have already spoken at length, is being rapidly taken up. Its advantages are briefly that it pays a certain rate of interest, unaffected by the fluctuations in gold and larger than upon ordinary investments; it is convertible in three years into bonds precisely like the Five-Twenties now in such immense demand; it directly aids the Government in the most essentially enhances the value of all Government securities. There can be no investment more safe or more promising. The notes are issued in denominations of $50, $100, $500, $1000, $5000.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE MILITARY SITUATION.

SHERIDAN'S victorious advance in the Shenandoah Valley have very much simplified General Grant's combinations for the defeat of General Lee's army and the capture of the rebel capital. The campaign in the West had virtually ended the day before the fall of Atlanta. Sherman's custom was heard in Early's rear. The first step taken by General GRANT, in the execution of his great campaign that May, was an attempt to put his army between Lee and Richmond. In this he failed of success. He then attempted to take Petersburg by assault, and failed in that also. He then began communications, and this also he failed. He then placed his left wing firmly on the Weldon Railroad, and was thus in effective process of the Virginia campaign. In order to appreciate the events of the two months after the occupation of the Weldon Road we need to glance at the other communications of the army with its base of supply. Of these there are four railroads which center Richmond, two, viz.; the Richmond and York River railroad, are now of no account; they drain a country already exhausted. But the Richmond and Danville railroad, which feeds the fertile valley of the Shenandoah, was of great importance. So also was the canal, contiguous to it, chiefly by Lee in keeping a strong force in the Valley. It was, indeed, a part of Early's mission to guard this communication; but a more important part of that mission was to cover the approach to Lynchburg. It was evident to Lee that one of the first things which Grant would attempt would be an advance on Lynchburg, and the same army would, in its advance, also completely destroy the Gordonsville railroad. The occupation of the Weldon Road by the safety of Lynchburg became absolutely essential to the maintenance of the only defensive position in Virginia. For Lynchburg was then the key to all the communications left to the rebel army. Once captured by the federal forces and made a military station, it could be held by a small army, and made the centre of a new system of operations on the west side of Richmond. The investment of the rebel capital would then be as complete as was that of Atlanta when Sherman transferred his army to a position on the Macon Road. There would then be but a single alternative to the evacuation of Richmond, and consequently of Virginia, viz., a glorious battle. To exult the result of a siege would be fatal to Lee's army. To defend Lynchburg, then, is to defend Richmond.

Sheridan's victories, therefore, occurring at just this time, simplify the system of operations against the Virginia capital.

These victories have put out of combat more than one half of Early's command, and have demoralized and paralyzed the other half. If Early is not heavily reinforced he himself will certainly be captured. But to reinforce Early is to weaken Lee's own army. He may, indeed, succeed in saving Lynchburg, but he will lose no more than to effect this that it will be at the risk of losing Richmond. An army on the defensive, strongly fortified, and holding an interior position, has great advantages. Early's position has been made stronger by numbers when it becomes necessary to resist approaches made from so many points as to render such defense impossible. Richmond and Petersburg are over twenty miles apart. The line of communication with Grant's army by the Weldon Road is over twenty miles long. Grant himself is separated from the north side of the James, and takes the Weldon Road. Lee's army, weak in numbers, is compact and strong in morale, deficient in strength and weakens its advantage of position by three long lines of defense. There can be no doubt, in view of these considerations, that the crisis of the war in Virginia is now at hand, and is indeed already nearly past.

FISHER'S HILL.

After driving Early's rebels through Winchester, September 19, Sheridan continued the pursuit. Two miles beyond Strasburg, Fisher's Hill, Early made a stand, and had put a fallen timber, with the divisions of Ramseur and Gordon attacked the rebel front while Crook moved to the left. At this time the Sixth Corps and Nineteenth Corps attacked in flank. Crook's magnificent charge overwhelmed every thing into disorder, and the position, which was considered almost impregnable, was carried. Sheridan's own account of the battle and the thousand prisoners were taken. The rested army pushed on down the Valley. Here the rebel force, consisting of the cavalry, small-arms, horsemen, and every other impediment to flight. Our men were captured in less than a thousand men. Kershaw's division of Longstreet's corps, which Early had detached to guard the communications, came up in time to take part in the battle, but too late to retrieve the fortunes of the day. Sheridan, therefore, fell back to Woodstock, having pursued the enemy all night.

Early was driven beyond Jackson Mountain without further resistance, and on Saturday night Sheridan had reached a point 12 miles south of New Market.

GOVERNOR BROWN'S PROCLAMATION.

The following proclamation by Governor Brown, of Georgia, calls on every man:

MILLEDGEVILLE, Sept. 30, 1864.

General J. E. Hood, Commanding Army of Tennessee:

GENERAL,—As the militia of the State were called out for the defense of Atlanta during the recent campaign, and which has terminated by the fall of the city into the hands of the enemy, and as many of them left their homes without preparation, expecting to be gone but a few weeks, who have remained in service over three months from the time in the trenches, justice requires that they be permitted, while the army reorganizes for the fall campaign, to return to their homes and look, for a time, after important interests, and prepare themselves for active service as may be required when another campaign commences against other important points in the State. I therefore hereby withdraw said organization from your command, in the hope that I shall be able to return it to you in large numbers and equal efficiency, when the interests of the public service require it. In this withdrawal I bid the brave to tender to you, General, my sincere thanks for your impartiality to the State troops, and for the attentions so many add kindness to me individually. With assurances of my high consideration and esteem,

I am, very respectfully, your humble servant,

JOSEPH E. BROWN.

RETIREMENT OF FREMONT AND COCHRANE.

September 22 General Fremont, in a letter to Mount. George L. Stearns and others, published above his name from the political contest for the sake of securing harmony in the ranks of the party. The day before Cochrane had adopted a similar course. It will be remembered that Fremont and Cochrane were Candidates of the Cleveland Convention for President and Vice-President.

NEWS FOR LORD PAM.

LORD PALMERSTON, in his attitude toward the Southern Independents and their cause, has been a constant admirer of secession in England, although he has steadfastly resisted the temptation to recognize it. Within the last year he invariably expressed the hope that the time would yet come for the subjugation of the rebellion. This hope was expressed in very sanguine terms in a speech lately delivered at Tiverton. The following is a correspondent's account of the manner in which the noble lord will sink into his roots on receipt

SONG OF THE PEACE REPUBLICAN.

I go in for Peace—yes, a Peace-man am I,
Of the deepest, the darkest, most permanent dye.
But an own-shall-ne'er-be-whipped kind of Peace is all both:
The Peace that I want is a Peace that will suit.
But some folks shout "Peace!" or "Stop the war!" or "Cry
Peace!"
Being fond as we glorious army and navy,
Who've guarded our banner from insults and stains,
With the sweat of their brows and the blood of their veins.
Now the Peace then folks sigh for,
And curse for, and cry for,
And scheme for, and lie for,
And every thing else for but fight for and die for,
Is the Peace of a mouse with a cat;
And that's what's the matter with that.

No sound can rest content from this bygone, O aunt!
Or ripple from lap of an infant or woman,
Is as sweet as that sweetest word, Peace, to my ears,
When it isn't accompanied by Copperhead cheers.
Those cheers spoil the whole, for we know that the cry
Means dove—the dove emblem of Peace—in a pie.
Pharisees cry, "Give Lamb!" till the cry's hoarse,
Caring only for lamb when it's served with Mint sauce.
Now the things these folks sigh for,
And curse for, and cry for,
And pray for, and lie for,
Are plump little doves they get ready their pie for;
With a bunk that is tender and fat;
And that's what's the trouble with that.

I go in for Peace—yes, a Peace-man am I,
Every inch of my frame, and I'm sure of them high.
But olives, at times, have a worm in the boat;
And the vampire has you while sucking your blood.
All rest is not peace, though the pale ox tread the brush;
There's the slumber of life and the slumber of death:
There's the calmness of virtue, the silence of sin;
Disease driven out, and disease driven in.
Now the Peace these folks sigh for,
And curse for, and cry for,
And pray for, and lie for,
Is a Peace that we'd die of, not live for, nor die for.
That with pain we go bail with a snapping bet,
Otherwise known as a Peace Democrat;
And that, Brother Ben, 's what's the matter with that.

MY PUNISHMENT.

"Isn't it beautiful, George?"

"Well, it is rather pretty," I said, with a half-suppressed yawn.

"Now, George," she said, indignantly, "that is too bad. To be generous for once. Isn't it perfectly lovely?"

"Well, I suppose it is if you say so, my dear;" and I leaned back in my chair, and with closed eyes placidly emitted a dense volume of smoke from my lips.

It was six o'clock in the evening, dinner was over, and I had subsided into the comfortable tranquillity of my dressing-gown, slippers, and cigar. Alice had been busily occupying the afternoon, in several plethoric-looking bundles on the side-table testified; and now I must witness and share in the investigation of their contents.

So I listened while my wife commented on the texture of the linen intended for the bosoms of my new shirts.

She then produced a mysterious-looking package, which, divested of its paper covering, proved to be a very handsome black silk dress pattern. Alice looked so pretty as she stood before me—the bright fire-light shining on her sweet face—and it was all in a glow; and she was so enthusiastic in the praise of her last purchase, which she was holding up before my unappreciating eyes. She was not at all satisfied with the limited praise I bestowed upon it.

"How provoking you are! George Warden, do you hear? Do you think that cigar out of your mouth and come out of your smoke-clouds a little while! I never can get a word out of you when you once get to smoking. Now how much do you suppose I gave for this piece of silk?"

Mrs. Warden's husband opened his eyes and declared he'd no idea—his slightest idea! "Don't scold, now!" Mrs. W. was well aware that he knew little and cared less about the paraphernalia of a lady's toilet.

"Only fifty dollars for the pattern—not a cent more! It's well worth fifty-six; I've saved that much any how. And it's so rich and full, and will wear well, I am sure. Now don't you think it cheap?"

"Well, rather;" and I knocked the ashes from the tip of my cigar and prepared to resume my train of thoughts where Alice's voice aroused me again.

"But it isn't paid for yet," she was saying, hesitatingly. "I hadn't enough money with me, and I was afraid it would till to-morrow; I thought I had the chance; and I was sure you wouldn't care—just this once," she said, timidly, as if she wasn't so sure I wouldn't care at all.

I sat upright—all awake in a moment. If there is any thing I abhor it is the credit system—I mean where women are concerned. Positively, I think that my wife was going in debt for things, and getting into the habit of running up long bills at the dry-goods stores, more than I could meet. All the prophetic eye saw in the future visions of temptation, derangement, unhappiness, and perhaps pain—all resulting from those terrible bills! I had labored so hard to impress on her mind this one lesson, "Live within your means." And she thought she had disobeyed me on the first temptation made me very wrathful. The storm burst over her unconscious head.

"Alice, is it possible?—when I have told you repeatedly never, under any circumstances, to get any thing on credit, if you can possibly avoid it? I must say—"

"But, George, it is the first time I ever did so, and—"

"It must be the last! I hope I am not niggardly. I am willing to give you have all the money you need; but I will not consent to your running up big long bills at the stores. I could tell you how many men of my acquaintance have been ruined by their wives doing so. I tell you, Alice, you have no idea how a bill will run up before you know it. These little debts seem very insignificant until you put them all together. Then the aggregate is enormous. I did not think my wife would act in such direct opposition to my known wishes."

"But, George—" And the tears came into the brown eyes raised to mine.

What a wretch I was! Why couldn't I speak gladly to the poor darling, if I must tell her of her fault? But no; my heart was full of bitterness because she had disobeyed me, and then it always put me out of humor to see a woman cry.

"I don't want to hear any more about it. Take your dress away! I don't wish to look at it. I hope you will enjoy it, and the recollection that in buying it you disregarded my wishes will doubtless add much to your pleasure in wearing it."

I think this last cruel speech hurt her more than all the rest. It makes me furious against myself now when I think of it. But I had opened my heart to a venomous, satirical demon, and he sat there securely throned, defying all my efforts to expel him, and remaining with me for a long while he painted the harbored words which fell like poison-drops from my tongue. I had never spoken so to my wife before; I have never since.

I watched her as she crossed the room and sat down, away from me, in the recess of a window, with tear-drops glistening on her long lashes. And I longed to go and bring her back, and kiss away the remembrance of my harshness! But I did not. I don't know why I did not then, and I did not know what I was reading; I was only conscious of being very resourceful and very unhappy, when a timid, deferring voice broke in on me in my abstraction, and caused me to look up. She was standing before me, with the tears all dried on her pale face, and the grieved look plainer than ever in her soft eyes.

"I don't care about having the dress, George. I'll take it back to-morrow. I know they will allow me to return it; only please do not look so. I can bear any thing but that. I will take it back myself."

Did I fling down that hateful paper, and seat the trembling pleader on my knee, and kiss the poor pale face till it bloomed again? Alas! I did not. I whispered, "Forgiveness easily obtained is not much valued. Hold out only a little longer." And I did; and the opportunity which the wrath of worlds can not buy now!

I steeled my heart against those pleading tones. I said the proper things, and left the room to look from the upspringing tears, and then I said, coldly,

"No, you shall not do that. If there is any thing I hate, it is carrying a thing back after it has been taken. Now you've got it, keep it. I'll pay the bill when I go to town to-morrow." And that was all. Then I turned to the other side of the paper and appeared engrossed in a telegram from Washington. I could have cursed myself as I watched her move wearily back to the window, and sit down with her head pressed against the glass, looking so despairingly; and when one or two convulsive sobs, but half stifled, reached me I fairly started, and rustled the paper I held more.

Seven o'clock. Alice arose and moved across the room. She stopped a few moments before the mirror, and watched her own face in the glass—not exactly how she looked and was dressed. I never can forget it. I knew not then, as I gazed at her with intensity, that it was the last time I should see her with the current of life warming her veins and flushing her face! She wore a black dress. Her hair was always of a golden hue—off her pure complexion beautifully; high and plain, with no ornament but the delicate lace about the throat and neck. Now thick braids of her sweet hair lay on her head, and it suited her better than any coronet. And as she raised her hand to smooth the brown ripples about her forehead the sleeve fell back, and the prettiest round arm you ever saw gleamed out so bewitchingly. I was conscious of all this, and had dressed with so much taste on this particular evening. We were going out together to a birthday party given by a favorite cousin of hers; for which thought nothing could go right without "Cousin Alice" to superintend.

She put her hood and cloak, making a noise purposely to attract my attention; but I heard nothing. Then she came and stood before me while she was fixing on her gloves. I looked up inquiringly, not to speak; but I would not; and at last she said, timidly,

"We were going to Uncle William's to-night."

"Well?"

That was all I said. Then she went away looking very sad. Presently a white face peered in at the door.

"Carriage am ready, missus."

"George, are you going with me to-night?"

"No."

"I'm very sorry," she said, meekly; "but Nora will be so disappointed if I do not go; so I must go."

"Very well."

I had not look up till I heard the door close after her. Then I flung the paper aside with a muttered curse, and strode fiercely to the window. I watched her color fade and her eyes fill with tears, and then I came back to the fire, kicked over a stool, and kicked it again when it fell; flung the paper into the fire, which I poked down with the point of something more substantial on which to vent my fury, and then I sat down with my face in my hands and groaned bitterly through clenched teeth.

I was angry with my suffering, unoffending wife because she had gone and disobeyed me. I thought she ought to have staid at home and spoken her engagement to humor my absurd caprice, when she did not even know that I wished her to do so. I was also angry with myself for treating her in such a shameful manner. Never before in all my life had I felt so. Altogether, I was perfectly miserable.

While I sat there I unconsciously drew from my finger the ring I always wore there. I held it up, as I was often wont to do, and looked at the inscription within; and the words "Grieve not the heart that loves thee" flashed on my gaze—flashed into my heart with such painful vividness that I started and looked around to see who had uttered them. There was no one there. I was alone, and conquered by the talisman of the ring! "Grieve not the heart that loves thee." It was her gift. Those were the words she was wont to murmur, lying with closed eyes and white hands nestled in mine, and the dear head pillowed on my heart. Such the sweet refrain, breaking ever and anon from the fond lips. And I hushed their music into silence by the pressure of my own.

"Grieve not the heart that loves thee." It was her voice that spoke to me in the stillness of that lonely room. Oh! no other could have the power to thrill my soul with feelings such as I had then! Where was she then? Moving amidst the glare and glitter of the crowded ball-room? Oh! did I know how gladly she would leave that gaudy hour to take a last farewell, to breathe a parting benediction on my unworthy head!

That ring was her gift. She placed it on my finger the day after we were married; and I promised her solemnly, with her earnest brown eyes looking into mine, that I would never part with it in life or in death. As I sat there holding it in my hand sweet memories of old times flashed across my mind, like visitants from some far-off land of unshadowed peace. I thought of the time when I first asked her to be to my wife—child as she was. It was not so long ago—only four years; and they had been such pleasant ones! She was very young, was Alice, when I first brought her to my home—only seventeen; and I was twenty-three, and had already seen older in experience even than myself. Excitement from very early life to act and think for herself, I had assisted in the habit of dominating unconsciously; and Alice, with her tiny figure and her young face, was clinging, caressing one, never could think of but as a beautiful child, to be spoiled, and petted, and loved, and governed. Known known how I loved and cared for her? Yes; she had never before disobeyed me. Never before had she so wounded—not my love for her, but my pride of affection.

But my heart was softened now. I thought of all her caressing, pretty ways—how she had nursed me during a fever in the past fall—how she would bound into my arms when I came home every evening; and then I thought how dreary my home would be without her, and all the repressed tenderness of my nature welled up.

"Poor child!" I murmured, regretfully, "how I have made her cry! And I was harsh, God forgive me! Oh, that she were here now that I might take her to my heart and soothe her into forgetfulness, my poor wronged darling!"

I looked at the clock. The hands pointed to ten. She never staid out later.

"She will be here soon," I said, trustfully; and then I rang the bell, and had the fire replenished and the room arranged against her coming. I even let Bayside rub my boots to the bright blaze, and placed my own beside it; then I went to the window, and looked anxiously down the moonlit avenue. Not coming yet! I walked up the floor once or twice; and then, to beguile the tedious moments, entered into a mental inspection of the contents of her little work-basket which stood on a table. First, there was her tiny thimble and scissors, and threads of different colors; then I took up a small piece of flannel embroidered in various cabalistic design—which hat caused me to smile curiously, for I could not comprehend the meaning of so much work, all crowded on one small piece of stuff. But I dropped it quickly, for I heard the carriage coming up the avenue, and ran at the door as soon as it stopped, and opened it eagerly. My wife sat with her face turned from me, and quite hidden by the large wadded hood.

"Are you not very cold and tired, dear?" I said, my voice trembling with impatient tenderness as I extended my hand to assist her to rise; but there was no answer, and she remained quite still.

"Alice, love, are you ill? Do you not hear?"

Silent still! Then I thought she had fallen asleep, and took her hand to awaken her. And then an cold that I dropped it like a block.

"How cold you are, dear Alice! Are you ill?" And I leaned forward and pushed the hood from her face. It was not Alice! It was Cousin Alice—undoubtless it might have been carved in stone. The moonlight shone full upon it, and on the precious blue eyes, which were closed and glazed.

Dead! O God! No!

I would not allow myself to think of it. She had fainted, I said, and carried her swiftly into the house and laid her on the sofa. I knew nothing of the gathering crowd of terror-stricken servants around me, nothing of their horrified looks, or nothing for a time. Every thought, every faculty was concentrated in my anxiety for her. I knelt beside her, and chafed her hands and temples, and pressed my warm, living lips to the beautiful face, and tried to coax back the breath from death's cold breath of life. Vain! vain! She never looked on me or spoke to me again.

A hand was laid on my shoulder; a quiet, kindly voice bade me move aside a moment, and our grave, gray-haired family physician laid his fingers on the white wrist, and then his head on the still heart, and then, shaking his head sadly, turned away. I heard the words "Disease of the heart." That was all.

They left me alone with my dead at last. There in that room where I had seen her alive for the last time—where I had so wounded the dear heart which last throb was for me! The fire glowed as brightly as ever. There stood her piano, still open, with a favorite piece of music. There was her work-table with her little basket open at it, and the book she had been reading, with a bit of ribbon to mark the place! There on a table were the things she had bought that evening, together with the piece of silk which had caused so much grief! The apron she had worn was thrown carelessly over the chair which I had drawn up to the fire to be in readiness when she returned. She never came back to me. But instead of as if she had come in some terrible dream from which I can never awake.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

SPORT WANTED.—"Short whist," says a descendant of Mrs. Battle, whose opinions on the game are very generally known, "is a robber, where two out of four are hard-up players, unable to settle their losses. This is very 'short whist.'" "Long whist," adds the excellent matron, "is Mr. Beattie's constant excuse for coming home from his Club at four o'clock in the morning."

A badly-boned-up Emerald Islander, in response to the inquiry, "Where have you been?" said, "Down to Mrs. Mulrooney's wake, and an illigant time we had of it. Nothing eatable in fifteen minutes; only one whole nose left in the house, and that belonged to the tay-kettle."

HOW TO MAKE A WATCH KEEP TIME.—Never wind it up, it will then keep the same time all the year round.

A new novel by the Hon. Mrs. Yelverton is announced with the title of Is She Wise or Otherwise. The question that she has solved a great social problem! for, of course, life in the equator must be the best circles. The question, nature of the circle, if it is all on the square, will astonish the eages.

BOY. "Please, Sir, tell me the time?"
CROSSY OLD GENT. "Yes, Sir—bedtime!"

FOR THE USE OF SCHOOLS.—George Elizabeth was recently deprived of her personal appearance. She has assumed to herself the title of "Head of the Church," in the New Orleans Bulletin, who suggests that, instead of this title, her Majesty should have that of "The Vase."

WORTH KNOWING.—Tell not your secrets in a confidid it but thousands of cans.

We have a specimen of the Celtic race in our kitchen, says a correspondent, whose partiality for funerals, wakes, and other enjoyments of the repressed sort of that nationality, is frequently manifested in a very ludicrous manner. She asked to-day if she might keep company with a countryman. On her return I asked if she had enjoyed herself. "Faith, ma'am," she said "she," and it was as good as a funeral all the time."

Why is an unwelcome visitor like a shady tree?—Because we are glad when he leaves.

"John, did you leave Mr. Jones's umbrella at his house?" "No, ma, I left it at Mr. Brown's." "And why did you not? Didn't I tell you to?" "Yes, ma," said John; "but didn't you tell me all along while ago to keep company with Mary Day, and what better thing can I keep than an umbrella?"

"PRAY, Mr. Lubricks, why do you whip your children so often?" "Why, Mrs. Worthy, I like to feel their enlightenment. I never whipped one of them in my life that they did not acknowledge it made them smart."

Certain coquettes, gayly dressed, thickly powdered, and well ronged, being at a ball in Paris, asked a foreigner present how he was pleased with the French ladies. "Ladies," he replied with great naïveté, "I'm no judge of paintings."

Some one says that going to law is mighty cold business, for all you ever get is but just-ice, and sometimes you don't even that.

While walking with a friend, a gentleman accidentally stepped upon a lady's trailing dress; she turned with a towering look, and the young gentleman said: "With his usual urbanity he replied, "I am sorry, madam, very sorry, indeed, madam; really I didn't know that I was within a quarter of a mile of you!"

Prejudices are like rats, and a man's mind like a trap; they get in easily, and then perhaps can't get out at all.

A young gentleman with an inquiring mind wishes to be enlightened as the following: If books are, as the poets tell them, the most joyous things in Nature, what are they most frequently about?

"Where are you going?" said Sabsyn to an acquaintance. "To see a friend." "Well, I'll go with you, for I never saw one yet."

Why are young ladies like arrows?—Because they are all in a quiver when the beaus come.

When is a clock on the stairs dangerous?—When it runs down.

All that is necessary for the enjoyment of sausages at breakfast is confidence.

EPIGRAM.

A watch lost in a tavern! That's a crime;
Then see how men by drinking lose their time.
The reason lies in this: the more we drink,
The less we reason why the watch should stay.

You say the key hung out, and you had'n lock it!
Then will not be kept private? Oh, indeed!

Henceforth, if you will keep your watch, this do,
Pocket your watch, and watch your pocket, too.

A lady who went to consult Mr. Abernethy began describing the symptoms of which she was ill, but he soon checked. Among other things she said, "Whenever I lift up my head I get so terribly." "Why, then, ma'am," answered Mr. A., "you are a great fool for doing so!"

HAIRDRESSER'S MOTTO.—Two heads of hair are better than one.

When a man's face turns as yellow as a guinea, he has a rich complexion.

"No matter how often you may fall into the river," said an old toper, "you won't drown if your head swims."

A rich upstart once asked a poor person if he had any idea of the word pedigree arising from it. I believe they give a rogue an advantage over an honest man," was the reply.

An Irish lawyer, famed for cross-examining, was on one occasion completely silenced by a horse-dealer. "Pray, sir," said he, "can you tell me a very honest man?" "I can't say, sir," replied the witness; "for, saving your honor, I think it the most dishonest profession."

A robber who was being led to the gallows saw a crowd of people running on before. "Don't be in such a hurry," said he to them. "I can assure you nothing will be done without me."

The label "MCN——" was writing a letter from an old fashioned country house, when a friend asked him he was cutting at defiance the laws of orthography and grammar. "Why," he said with a look of triumph, "I defied obedient!" but how can a man write grammar with a pen like this?

"Zounds, fellow!" exclaimed a choleric old gentleman to a very phlegmatic watter-of-fact person, "I shall go out of my skin." "Well, you won't have far to go," said the p! ...natic man.

A woman having fallen into a river, her husband went to look for her, and coming up the stream from the place where she fell in. The by-standers asked him if he was mad—he could not have come against the stream. The man answered, "No, she was shameless and contrary in her life and no doubt she was the same at her death."

"NO REST."

Too soon, too soon does the sun ascend from the east at morning,
Too long he lingers at eve by his crimson gates in the west;
Proud of his kingly light, and the ruddy robes of his splendor
While under his eye of fire, I wait and long for rest.
Rest for the busy hand and the ever-aching brain;
Rest for the beating heart that has lost its spring in vain:
So soon the long day dawns, so slow the wing her flight,
While the weary sons of toil are faint for the bliss of night.

Rest! But when night has come and slumber is still denied,
When the hush must still be bury, the hand not idle for aye,
And the pleasant sounds of peace to the toiler, heavy-eyed,
Mock him with restless longings for joys he would fain forget.
Ah! then does he cry by night—O night! more than a night of gloom,
For the hour of toil returns when the Sabbath of night is done.

Let slumber a little longer on these dull eyes he pressed,
Grant to thy child—I plead the precious boon of Rest!"

And the Father majestic answers: "In this a time to be idle,
When thy hand is striving to banish the error that she deplores:
When, calm in a steadfast faith, she celebrates her bridal
With the whole host of war, and—not over a few short hours?
O, pause not now on the way, nor faint till the task be done;
No rest, no peace, no joy while the battle is not won.
Cry not the Sabbaths now, but aid with a willing hand,
And soon the Sabbath of peace shall dawn over all the land."

The sweet thoughts like my heart as the sweet lips of a bride
Fall on her husband's brow, and I wake to toil again:
Up, up! my hands, my heart! Away on the heavy tide!
No Rest for me till the dawn of freedom from death and pain.
Welcome again the morn and the slow-winged hours of toil!
I shall use my life and hope for the peace of my native soil.
I long no more for night; my pillow shall not be pressed
Till the hand of my life and love is welcomed to a holy Rest.

CHRISTY ANDREWS.

Low kitchen walls, but white as drifted snow, with the spring sunshine flinging amber glories across their whitewashedness, a singing kettle on the hearth, and a white-spread table waiting.

Something else waited also. Rocking softly to and fro in her easy-chair, her head thrown back, so that you could see the round white throat with its ruffled circlet, the firm little chin, the serious, thoughtful eyes, Christy Andrews waiting for the husband of three months to come in from the fields to his tea.

"That's a mighty smart husband o' yourn, Christy," said a stout, dumpy-looking woman, in a rusty black dress, who sat near the window, fanning herself in time eying the temptingly spread table; "they ain't another farmer in the county I reckon that's got his crop in this week. Your like some folks always is ahead o' their work, and the rest is always a letting their work get ahead o' them. Pears like, too, that in this yer western country every thing comes so easy that the farmers think they hain't got nothin' to do; and crops does come a'most with lookin' at 'em. Ain't you none afeard, Christy, that Stephen'll take it into his head to volunteer?"

Christy had scarcely seemed to hear the good lady before. At this she drew a flushed face into the room that half rose as it was, heralded with eager light her words.

"I shouldn't say a word, if he wanted to go," she said, almost passionately—"I shouldn't say a word, if it killed me to see him go. Will Lyle and all the old flag treated so—our old flag—I wish I was a man long enough to strike a blow for it."

Stephen Andrews, standing just outside, where he had stopped at sound of Christy's ringing tones, lingered still a moment; but she did not speak again, and he cut short a somewhat prosy speech of Mrs. Dunn's as he entered the room, with no sign upon his manly face of having heard his wife, and saying gently to that lady, protectingly, "Let me up his hat and prepare for tea. Christy's little hands trembled some as she poured and passed the tea, and once or twice when her eyes met Stephen's casually, hers lingered questioningly. Her keen and loving intuitions perceived a slight change in him, and however she had just expressed herself, a vague apprehension troubled her.

Stephen did not evade her look, he even smiled back at her; but her eyes were struggling with mistiness all sea-time. In the softly golden twilight—sweetest of all to come unto lovers as it had to that breezy prairie-land—when Christy had put away the little tea-table, and Mrs. Dunn had gone, and Christy had on the low rocking, looking away across the rustling grass to where the sun had just sunk among green billows, Stephen came and stood beside her with an arm about the round, firm waist, and the young wife clasped her hands across his strong shoulder and drooped her face pensively beside them.

Vaguely she felt what was coming—vaguely.

"We're very nicely fixed here, aren't we, little girl?" Stephen said, in a low voice; "we've got not nicely fixed!" And then, quoting something Mrs. Dunn had said about Christy's housekeeping, he added, lightly, "I wish you understood farming as well as you do housekeeping!"

"Do you?" said Christy, lifting her large eyes to his face. What she read there chained her glance.

"Yes," Stephen said, caressing the little face with his hand, bending his own to it, and speaking low to hide the tremor in his voice. "You could see to the farm then while I am gone."

"Gone? Oh, Stephen!"

He drew her close within his arms, very agitated himself, for he realized what it was he was about to do, and she was but a three-months' wife—the one woman of all the world to him, the one love of his life.

"You will be brave, dear, I know. I have been wanting to say this some time, but I was afraid to tell you till this afternoon. I heard what you said to Mr. Dunn, and that grew decisive."

Christy lay very still in his arms for a little, and then she lifted her head and kissed him, whispering, "I'll be brave, dear; I promise you that. You go than I should be happy in having you stay; but—but—you know, Stephen, you're all I've got."

"I know, child," and he kissed her. After a long silence, which neither broke for fear of betraying too much agitation to the other, Stephen said, wishing to break the current of too sad thought,

"I feel anxious about the farm, Christy. I've got everything ready, it was always safest to do it; pity to have it all run down, as it is almost sure to do."

Ever ready to second him, Christy said, in the same tone,

"I think I'll learn to be a farmer, Stephen, by the time you come back. I'll have every thing going to do, you know, and—"

Tears filled her eyes in an overwhelming tide; but she would not let him see them, and stopped speaking when her voice began to tremble.

Stephen, however, was thinking about his farm, and did not notice.

"Yes," he went on, "I should feel easier if I knew of good hands to leave the farm with. I've got it mostly planted now, and I'd let any good man take it on shares, and give him a good bargain too. But the fact is, there's a set of men about taking farms that way don't, the most of 'em, know any more about farming than you do. There's that lot of orphans, now—if it could be left under care of, I candidly believe there wouldn't be such another yield in the State. It's coming up splendidly, and I never had my heart more set upon any thing than I have on that cane."

Christy let him talk on, stimulating him with a word now and then—Stephen was an enthusiast about farming—but all the while she was thinking how short a time it might be now before his strong arm would cease to clasp her.

Stephen's father lived in an adjoining county. One morning, a few days after Stephen had decided to volunteer, the old man presented himself at his son's house.

"Is this true, Stephen?" he questioned. "I hear you are going to volunteer."

"Yes, father, I was coming over to tell you and mother myself, as soon as I could get," Stephen answered, gravely, while Christy nearly burned her face to a crisp looking in the oven after the pies which she could not see for the tears that blinded her in a sudden rush.

"Well, it's best maybe," said Mr. Andrews, reckless as to how much he was up to; but what's goin' to come of the farm, and what's Christy goin' to do? If I was her, I wouldn't let you go a step."

The conversation between the old man and Christy was rushing out, when Stephen stopped her, and drew her reluctantly toward his father.

Christy thinks you ought to leave the farm in she or the farm," he said.

Mr. Andrews glanced at the red little face and the trembling eyelids.

"Yes," he said, "the women are crazier than the men, I b'lieve, and the men crazy enough just enough. There's plenty to go without you, Stephen, and you just married, and nobody to leave the farm with."

"I'm just the sort of man they need most, father, not so young, strong and hardy. Christy and I think it's right, and so I'm going. I thought may-be you'd look after the farm, and I'd leave it with Christy, if Caleb or Rob, now, would take it on shares."

Caleb and Rob both volunteered yesterday; and it takes all my authority and his mother's entreaties to keep Jack from goin' the same road, young as he is. Those two boys of mine, they hain't got no hangs to Jack, and she was terrible took about on Christy's account to hear that you was thinking of this sort of thing. I'll look after the farm, of course, but I'm old, you know, and I've got my own crops to see after. I don't know how I'll manage with Caleb and Rob gone."

"Never mind, there'll be some way. Whose regiment are the boys in? I ought to be in the same one."

"Denning's like to be their Colonel, Thirty-fifth Regiment; and it looks like it, I reckon. You'll be to git, Stephen, I'd like you to be with the boys."

"I'll go over this afternoon, and call on Townsend as I go. He's looking of Townsend to take the farm if you couldn't."

This afternoon! Christy's fevered face grew suddenly white and chill; every thing seemed to whirl about her.

Mr. Andrews saw, and exclaimed, almost impatiently, "Townsend's a better farmer than you're wanted, Stephen, and attend to your own business!"

"I think I'm wanted now, father." And then, seeing Christy's white face, "It's only to volunteer, you know, child; the regiment won't leave for months yet, and I'll be back before the boys' Caleb and Rob."

"Yes," Christy said, catching her breath.

Stephen volunteered that afternoon, but Townsend couldn't take the farm; and nobody was found to take it up on the shares Stephen had offered. He promised to do what he could, and Stephen had to leave it so. A sore thing it was to him too, for next to his wife and his country that farm occupied the largest place in Stephen Andrews's thoughts.

Poor little Christy! She had coaxed a reluctant consent from Stephen to stay in their own little home while he was gone, and his sister Sarah was coming to live with her. But she thought, then and always after to her dying day, the pain of his absence, and the fear that haunted her about him, could scarcely be endured long.

Stephen was gone. Warm, cheery letters, and had much to say about the farm. It worried him yet. They had tried a great deal to find some one to take it, but nobody was to be found. It was too late in the season; and meanwhile Stephen's hitherto carefully-tended fields missed him terribly. Mr. Andrews and Jack had done something, and now and then Christy had succeeded in hiring a man for a day or two, but the farm looked badly.

"I hate to tell him how things are, Sarah," said Christy, as she sat with Stephen's last letter open before her, and a pen in her hand preparatory to answering it. "He insists upon knowing just how every thing looks, and it's discouraging to have to tell him how it is."

She sat thoughtful a long time; Sarah, who was elderly and talkative, keeping up a glib dissertation on ways and means, none of which were practicable.

"I've heard Stephen say that if he wanted any thing done really, it was always safest to do it himself."

It was not easy to tell by this speech exactly in what channel Christy's thoughts were running; but presently she said aloud,

"Sarah, I believe I can do it myself. I'm not strong like Stephen; but I know how things ought to be done almost as well as he does. The farm needs a head more than any thing else. That stupid Fritz used to work well enough with Stephen to watch him, and I almost know I could plow corn. Andy Johnson—that little fellow, you know, Sarah, that was here a few months last year—hoed potato plants—he can't be stronger than I am, and he plows corn by the acre. Then there's the sorghum; and the cane-patch—I'm at first, you know—practice for a man's hands any how. Andy and I could do that much, and then I'll tell Stephen that I've got somebody at last to take the farm—somebody that knows how, too. It will relieve his heart of one care anyhow."

And she forthwith wrote precisely that, despite Sarah's demurring and astounded expostulations.

Mr. Andrews was having a busy time, and did not happen to come over to see them for about ten days, so that Christy had an opportunity to put her project in execution, despite of the probability of success before receiving his remonstrances.

They were loud and long when they came; but Christy had a loving, pleading way, and a little sharp firm, and then she had a coaxing way of her own; and in the end the good old farmer grumblingly promised to keep her secret and let her have her way.

No one was to tell Stephen who had taken the farm; and Christy, in her letters upon the subject, was singularly neglectful about giving names till he gave up asking.

"She is out at it, sure enough," Mr. Andrews muttered to himself every time he came to the farm, though he was fain to confess that so far she had done well enough.

It was hard work—literal hard work—physically and mentally. Her little hands grew brown with toil, and the young head ached with weariness and anxiety. She worked early and late, overtaxing herself through her intense scarcely conscious of it, she was so eager. Fritz worked better under her eye than under Stephen's even, and after a while he brought a great overgrown Dutch brother of his to work with him. Little Andy came to help as long as the corn needed plowing, and Christy herself, after the early weeds, learned to plow too.

The sorghum was the most troublesome of any thing; but Christy would not suffer it to be neglected. Stephen knew the know much pride Stephen always had in it.

It was hard work—harder romance nor poetry in Love-in-a-mist thought of Stephen. She accomplished nothing by any romantic sleight of hand. It was what I tell you, literal hard work, not poetical nonsense, that is important. Her Stephen depended upon the profits accruing from the farm to pay off a small debt yet upon it, and he was to be relieved from his brother-in-law's pay. Being a private, that was not much. Hard work of head and hands, but not of heart. Even the cane and the sorghum—how many of you ever saw a field of the Chinese sugar-cane rustling its slender, graceful leaves in the wind?—the long, lance-like leaves in a constant quiver, the tall arrowy canes bending and swaying, plant as willows, and the heavy heads, like those of broom corn, but tasseled, nodding, nodding—that field of sorghum was the comfort of Christy's lonesome, tired life. She never looked at it without a thrill, it reminded her so much of Stephen. Just so tall and straight, and supple of limb was he; and if suddenly one of those weapon-like leaves—they sometimes—had fallen upon that field and felled those green and serried ranks, I think Christy would have taken it as an omen almost, though she wasn't superstitious.

Meanwhile Stephen's regiment, ordered to the Eastern Department, had already been in active service. Possibly it was incessant occupation only that kept Christy's senses from forsaking her in the anxious months of the bloody battles of Bull Run. News came at last—all three of the brothers were alive and unharmed. August, and the first week in September, passed safely, and then a long silence—an awful suspense, strangely unbroken by news of any of the three—and then, news.

Caleb and Rob were wounded, and Stephen—a comrade home on a sick furlough brought the word, and as the stunned from Christy when he tried to tell her of her husband's fate.

"He is dead," she said, in cold, still tones, a white little creature with a set face and mouth.

"Not dead," the man answered; "but I have heard him say that death would have been better than to be blind."

"Blind!" Christy covered her pale face with her hands and crept quietly away, thanking God for her husband's life. Blind! Had she not sight, and was not she his—oh! all his, God granting; but "poor, poor Stephen!"

The first terrible lightning from the deadly missiles flying round him one day in the hottest of the fight had flashed blindness upon Stephen Andrews's eyes. Some days, hours, even, were not; but he was better of them now, and was coming home in a few days. Christy went to meet him, putting tender arms about him, and crying upon his neck, "Never to leave me again, my darling." And then she led him home, the great, strong man, like a chained eagle, but already in her sweet and loving presence he felt it less.

At home—and he had not said a word about the farm. Christy would not speak, for she was afraid of hurting him. He could not see what she had done, not even the sorghum lot, and she always looked at it through tears now. How could he but pictured his surprise when he came to know that it was only his little Christy that had taken the farm from his hands and had imagined to herself the stare and look of surprise, and then the loving, loving chiding she should get! And now—now he would have no any of it never more. Well, God was good still; God knew better than she what was best for her and Stephen.

Stephen said little. He was moody and taciturn, with a hard, unreconciled expression upon his face that reminded Christy constantly of what the man said about his wishing that death had smote him rather than blindness, and it hurt her somehow terribly to have him feel so. She could never be thankful enough that his life was spared her, and that she was able to be what she was to him. He did not know yet what she was capable of being to him.

One day Stephen, stumblingly, and with a more despairing look than usual, asked some questions about the farm. The night drew him on to talk of it, and finally coaxed him out, telling him how every thing looked in such apt phrase that it might have been Stephen's eyes that looked like seeing it. His face only hardened. She led him among the breezy, silken rustle of the sugar-cane, and told him how she had taken the farm, and that it was then, with her face upon his shoulder as in the old time, she tried to comfort and soften him with loving talk.

He seemed to listen, but he said little in reply; and she noticed that his hands were hard clenched upon the chair-arms; he seemed to sunder himself all his strong muscular frame as with a sort of rage at the strength and stature that was yet so impotent.

Poor little Christy! Her heart ached and ached to see him so, and all the while she talked the tears were slowly gathering in her eyes, and falling one by one. How should he know it though?

Meanwhile, a cloud scarcely larger than a man's hand at first, had grown, and, almost before Christy became conscious of its presence, had overspread the heavens. An awful hush suddenly filled the air, and then, with a fearful, distinct, hissing sound, yet an indescribable suggestion of sound—a panting of the very atmosphere.

Christy knew well what these signs foretold, and turned at once toward the house. They had scarcely gone ten steps, however, before, with a swirl and a whirl, like some immense and winged destruction, it was upon them—a true Western tornado.

Imagine a body of wind impassable as a wall of fire, sweeping with the seeming swiftness of lightning, and yet slowly, marking its track in the ruins of homesteads that have crumbled before it like dust, breaking great strong trees short off at the base, and flinging the wrecks long huge timbers, and launching them like Titanic bolts through the air. Imagine thunder, like the crash of all the elements, and lightning like the flash of their meeting—imagine crash and blinding glare, and mighty wind all in one, and so swift that while you said, "Let us flee!" it was upon you, and you have some idea of one of those tornadoes that have in late years so desolated portions of Illinois and some other Western States.

Stephen had sufficient self-possession to drop instantly to the ground, and feel his wife fall beside him. Almost in the same moment she was torn from him by the wind, and he called after her vainly. The roar of the storm, and a wet rush that was like hail upon him like a tide-wave meeting breakers.

Almost saddened, between his impotence and an awful dread, Stephen endeavored to rise, but due to his feet, but was instantly dashed again to the ground by the wind, and with a force that left him for a few minutes senseless.

The storm spent itself, however, in that first rage, and by the time he could rise again to his unsteady feet, comparative lull had come. Clearing his way, he moved on, calling frantically at every step. What he suffered in those moments no one can know. It is possible to tell of many human instances of awful and swift destruction in these tornadoes storms; and, when after what seemed to him hours of search, he still received no reply to his calls, he groaned aloud.

"Oh, Stephen! can you safe?"

She had come up from the ground right there at his side. Some missile of the many filling the air had struck her on the head, and the blood was dried and shed dashed upon her, and caused that unconsciousness from which she had only then roused. It was she, then, who had found him, and it was she, then, upon clasped her once more to him, after those moments which had seemed ages of darkness and agony, Christy's head upon his shoulder, and sobbed out:

He was still silent, as, drenched with the rain that was yet falling in torrents, they turned again toward the house, and it was left for Christy to him with a nervous clasp, and his face wore an expression that had not been upon it before since he came home.

Their house, as by a miracle, was unharmed; but, looking from the doorway, the extent of the destruction had swept over the farm. Acres of corn that this morning had waited in green and golden splendor for the sun-kissed fields look now like mere wet threshing-floor. The sorghum, to use Christy's own simile, was as though a gigantic flail-iron had been dropped suddenly upon it; every cane was down, and the field looked as though strewn with rushes. She could not help catching her breath with consternation.

To her surprise Stephen bent quickly toward her, just as he used to do in the old times at any sign from her, but as he had not done of late. He had felt too bitter and unreconciled to his own fate to scarce be grateful even for her.

"What is it, Christy?" he asked.

Wondering, she told him; and then gradually it came out how she had busied herself during his absence.

He could scarce believe her, but he comprehended at last; and when, her tongue once loosed on the subject, she went on in her own wise little way to tell him, first, what a summer it had been, and then to speculate on the ways and means for soonest remedying the mischief which the storm had done, perhaps the homely heroism that was manifested under all the discouraging circumstances that surrounded her—and he nimbered himself among those—touched him, in his sensitive state, more than any thing else could.

Holding her suddenly in his arms he poured forth all the pent-up emotion of the weeks of the day just dying gloriously now, after the storm. Standing in the red glory of that sunset the two took up the burden of life again, resolved cheerfully to bear it to the end, thankful to bear it together, and happier, perhaps, in each other than though suffering had not so tried them.

The corn and sugar-cane were saved with little waste; Christy was eyes and Stephen hands, and both had head; and they have worked so together ever since. And that is how Christy Andrews came to be a farmer.

GOOD-BY; GOD BE WITH THEE!

GOOD-NIGHT, the day is paling,
The sun will set in rain,
And I—by heart is failing,
And weakening with pain.

And thou—the tears will rise, love,
What dare I say of thee?
I gaze into thine eyes, love,
As though they were the sea;

Unsatisfied, unweary,
I look into their deep,
Till even vision dreary
Are safely laid to sleep;

And not our parting sorrow,
Not even coward fear,
Can make me feel the morrow,
While still I linger here.

Ten years—they must be ended
Some time before we die,
What hope and anguish blended,
Seem breath, beneath thy sigh.

Ah! dear one, did I bid thee
Be calm and bear the pain?
God-by, love, God be with thee,
And bring me back again!

TIT FOR TAT.

I WAS coming one morning into the city. I had the carriage to myself for some distance; then a little man got in who at once attracted my attention by the peculiarity of his dress, appearance, and manner. He was in evening dress, every thing about him, from the silk-faced dress-coat to the patent leather boots, being bran-new. A fact of which he was far from being unconscious; each of his garments, in its turn, attracted his notice and approving smile.

The only thing about him that violated evening etiquette was his head—a head, so to speak, negligently arranged à la Byron under a rolling collar.

From this I augured that he was a poet, for fashion-collars were by no means so common then as now; the fashion prescribing terrific gills, which, in short-necked men, endangered the safety of their whiskers or ears. My surmise was confirmed by his long hair, its natural tendency to curl being combated by the copious exhibition of grease, and probably by curling-irons also.

Further reasons, he was somewhat against my theory: instead of being slim and pale, with eyes "in fine frenzy rolling," it was round, dumpling-like, and rosy; his little eyes deeply set in tunnels of fat, which, as he chuckled from time to time, were half closed by his rising cheeks, and presented to view a mere slit; his nose short, turned up, and garnished at the tip with a tuft of sandy hair; his mouth expansive, and his teeth very good: fortunately, as he showed them all, not even concealing the wisdom teeth, which were not quite come down.

He was well made, what there was of him; he was not much above five feet high, rather disposed to embonpoint.

In his button-hole he wore a magnificent white camellia, which, I regret to say, I, myself, coveted, and determined to possess, by fair means if possible, if not, foul.

This flower, too, attracted much of his attention; he bestowed frequent glances upon it, muttering what I conceived to be poetry, inspired by the purity and delicacy of the flower.

I was considering how I might best commence a conversation which would acquire me the good graces of this gentleman, and ultimately make me the possessor of the camellia, when he saved me the trouble of breaking the ice by saying,

"Candidly, Sir, what do you think of my tailor?"

I replied that I had not the advantage of knowing him, a circumstance which I regretted the more, as his work showed him to be a man of no common ability; I added, that he was fortunate in having a client whose figure and air would set off garments, even though fabricated with less consummate skill.

He tried to look modestly unconscious, and said,

"And who, Sir, may this client be with the disgrace figure and air? As you say that you do not know my tailor, I might almost fancy that some of the flattering observations were addressed to me; but my figure, though not deformed, is small, that is to say, rather below than above the average size; and as for my air, though I flatter myself that I possess some of that je ne sais quoi which distinguishes men like you and me from the vulgar herd, still neither my figure nor air is worthy of the very glowing eulogium which you have bestowed upon them."

"No, Sir, really," he added, Sir, really!" and he chuckled, blinked his eyes, and cast glances on his little round limbs of more than parental fondness.

I perceived that he was not insensible to flattery, and did not despair of obtaining the camellia by fair means.

"I should apologize," said I, "if so personal a remark; it slipped from me unconsciously: but you must have heard it frequently from the lips and seen it in the eyes of the ladies, for I am sure you are insensible to their witcheries; I see that in your eye, nay, that camellia in your button-hole proves you to be the happy Benedict or the lucky-eyed lover."

"How did you find that out? You must know something about me; you might have guessed that I was in love; but how did you find out the color of her eyes?"

"Well, I did not know positively. As though it likely, most in accordance with the eternal fitness of things, that you, who have blue eyes, should be enslaved by black ones. Was I right?"

"Well, I can hardly say; I trust you may be right, but the fact is, I have never seen the lady's eyes."

"Never seen her eyes! Ah, I see: a mysterious courtship, truly poetic, veiled lady, gentle voice, little hands, never lets her face be seen peeping from concealment, fairy form, taper ankles, little tiddly-iddly feet."

"Sir," said he, grasping my hand, "we are kindred spirits—you have felt the divine afflatus—you have struck the wild harp, and burst into the inspiring melody of song. We are poets, Sir, we are poets. Were it not a breach of confidence she has reposed in me, I would tell you the history of our loves, our songs, our words and deeds."

"You forget that so long as you conceal the lady's name there can be no breach of confidence. She is the wife of Cæsar: let Cæsar govern her."

"Not X; I shall have to repeat her name often in the course of my narrative; she would then become double, triple, or even quadruple X, and she is not stout."

"Well, then, let Y represent her; it is a slender and graceful letter."

"Good, let Y, for the moment, represent, unwittingly, the name of my adored charmer. I am a poet, Sir, as you have already perceived, and have altogether unknown to the public; in the 'Poets' Corner of the Waverly Repository very many communications are perennial? You may have some of my contributions to that journal signed 'Beta.' I will just repeat my 'Ode to the Morning':—

"Pray don't take the trouble; I know the poem by heart, and recited it only last week to D——at the Adelphi Club. Just now I am burning with impatience to hear your story."

"You have read my poem then: I had scarcely ventured to hope that the sweet effusings of my muse had penetrated so far as New York."

"Why, my dear Sir, there are six copies of the Waverly Repository in the club-room regularly, and it is difficult to get hold of one of them; yet no one reads any part of it but the 'Poets' Corner.'"

"Not Waverly Herald, Waverly Repository. Well, I'll go on with my story. One evening I had just finished my 'Invitations to Heaven,' and had taken down the volume of Keats, when Mary entered. The last feeble flicker of twilight was about to give way to the solemn darkness of night. There was a holy stillness, a sweet calm, which seemed designed to soften the heart, to prepare it for gentle impressions. Mary sat down by my side, and her love-story is a garden. There roses should vie with geraniums, the graceful woodbine should twine round the trellis-work of the rustic arbor, and Mary be in the pride of her virgin purity; but I regret to say it is planted with potatoes.

"In this garden there are two gates, one by which lends to one of them, and repeating a beautiful stanza of my own composition. (I never read the works of other poets, lest I unconsciously steal of thought.) As I was going down this path I chanced to look toward the other gate: a fairy form was passing there. I will not attempt to describe the beauties of that glorious vision. I rushed straight across the garden in chase; but the potato patch tripped me up, and I fell under my lady's feet, and was incapacitated for further pursuit. I limped back to the other, and met the clerk.

"'What is that divine creature who has just left your office?'

"'Mary,' said he, grinning: 'she is a contributor to our "Poets' Corner."'

"'She is a poetess, then—I knew it must be so. What is her surname?'

"'Won't do,' said the clerk, with his tongue in his cheek; 'she wishes to remain incog.'

"Rebuffed by my friend, I went back to my couch, but not to sleep. That vision still haunted me; I thought of the white hand, the raven locks, the velvet ankle, the lily-like form, and the fairy feet. The evening did I lie in wait before the office in hopes of again meeting her, but in vain. Things went on so for a month, and I grew pale and thin. I lost all my appetite diminished, and I lost nearly two pounds in weight, and was a happy inspiration came upon me. I would pour out my heart in poetry, I would tell my love in the 'Poets' Corner' of the Waverly Repository, and in this manner she would read it: the sympathy which exists between kindred minds would tell her that she was the object addressed. I wrote the lines called 'A Gracious Twilight Vision.' Never in my most inspired moments had I so successfully portrayed the inward workings of the tender passion; for I then only imagined them, now I felt them. I will just repeat you those lines."

"Pray don't, Sir; I remember them well."

"I felt sure that she to whom they were addressed would read them, and reply; and I was not deceived. The next time I went to the office the clerk said, 'There is a letter here meant for you, I suppose.' It was directed, '—— Esq., contributor to the "Poets' Corner" of the Waverly Repository.' The dear girl evidently did not understand Greek, and by the similarity of sound was led into this very pardonable mistake. It showed she wasn't a blue-stocking, and I rejoiced at it.

"To make a long story short, we commenced a correspondence, but have never met; but this day she has given me a rendezvous at Pursell's, the pastry-cook, in Broadway. It is in honor of this occasion that I wear for the first time those garments, the fitting of which you so justly admire."

"And Mrs. Camellia," I suggested, "don't you think that a budding rose would be more appropriate of your rising hopes? If so, I think I could manage to get you one."

"By no means; I should have told you that in our signal for recognition: we are each to wear a white camellia over the heart."

How truly has it been said that the first step in crime is the only difficult one! Facile est descensus Averni. I had, like Camilla,* suggested, "don't you think that a budding rose would be more appropriate of your rising hopes?" If so, I think I could manage to get you one."

If such a thought could have entered my head in our signal for recognition: we are each to wear a white camellia over the heart."

How truly has it been said that the first step in crime is the only difficult one! Facile est descensus Averni. I had, like Camilla,* suggested, and resolving to obtain it by fair means, if possible. I now resolved to resort to the foulest means. I necessarily, in my profession, am not a little versed in the various modes of disguise, and to use it as a decoy to obtain the other white camellia now in the possession of the poetess of Waverly. To what a principle will lead the white camellia when barrying me!

As it was essential to prove his identity in the coming rendezvous, it was evidently useless to try to persuade him to give it to me; my only chance was to steal it, and this I resolved to do.

Calling his attention to some objects on the roadside, I dexterously severed the stalk with a tap from my cane, and slipped the flower into my pocket unperceived.

I then said that, though I had read and learned by heart his contributions to "Poets' Corner in the Waverly Repository, it would still be a treat to hear some of these chefs-d'œuvre repeated by the author.

He needed no pressing. Without once thinking of his camellia, he favored me with an uninterrupted stream of poetry till our arrival at the city. I then took a hasty leave of him, jumped into a cab, and, transferring the camellia from my pocket to my button-hole, drove to Pursell's to complete my conquest.

We soon arrived there. Being in a capital humor, I was about to give the cabman a double fare. But what! money is that I tired my pockets one after another: no purse; the cabman began to eye me suspiciously.

"My good man," said I, "I find that I have lost my purse, but my pectuniaries is a sufficient guarantee for the payment of your fare. Come with me, the St. Nicholas. I have a friend there who will lend me some money." The cabman saw the justice of this reasoning, and drove to the St. Nicholas, where my friend received me with open arms, and placed his purse at my disposal.

The poetess was not an exquisite one for me, for not only was my purse gone, but my watch and a valuable gold snuff-box. It appeared that the card and I had attracted the similar designs, and while my ambition extended no further than white camellias, he had a weakness for articles of value and greenbacks.

It is needless to add that I did not return to Pursell's to complete my conquest, nor have I ever again met my friend the poet.

A GERMAN, who was awarded of Europe and had come to America, mixed spectacles so greatly that he grew blind suddenly. "I am blind," he said, "because my eyes are not even sparrows," he said, and returned to Germany. "I AM BLIND," he wrote home, "I ask no one in a country where the police pour every thing out into the street," and wrote no more.

Sparrows are among the most common birds, and are repeated several times. The absence of sparrows repelled him here, the presence of sparrows repulsed him there. How to found peace at last it is difficult to say. Great efforts are now being made to introduce sparrows into America, for their great value has been recognized.

CHARLES EDAN, the noted burglar, visiting the United States, was detected in the act of picking the pocket of a Wall-street broker. Opposite to him at the table there sat a lady, who, with commendable tact, drew him into conversation, and at last called on the host to present him to her. "Mr. Edan, Mr. Edan, allow me to present Mr. Edan," by drinking wine together, when the stranger, with much unpretentiousness replied, "I say you is the biggest liar last night." Keen, feeling, but unnaturally, that a compliment was intended, he bowed, and said, "Thank you." "Yes, Sir," continued the other, in a slow, almost jubilant tone, "I have been confined a dozen in Richard's cell, as the last Mr. Cooke." Another pause, in which Christie Edan's triumph was complete, and he responded, "Indeed!"

"Yes, Sir. Cooke, Sir, was better than your father; and your father, Sir, was better than you."

The following, from W. H. Diadrich's Life in Java gives an idea of Japanese marriages:

"I questioned Bontang concerning Japanese weddings and courtings, and was surprised to learn that the man and woman in Japan do not see each other before marriage, according to the rites of the Mohammedan creed, they had been introduced to each by a whole week. The bridegroom sees as yet only young through a probational period, which, in the case of the rich bridegroom, is sometimes the only opportunity that separation sometimes continues three months. Should the bridegroom not return home in that very afternoon in the presence of a number of friends invited for the occasion, the whole affair immediately ceases to exist. When feel is set before them, it is the duty of the young man to partake of some before all the others, and then on merrily till midnight, when the bridegroom rises to take his departure, and the bride follows him, and nothing further. When he has sent her comfortably home, he returns to his own residence, where he receives the congratulations; after which, retiring with the bride, he is left alone to see his bride home till the middle of the next day."

The Dauphin appears to find much romance in the recent marriage of Belle Boyd to Lieutenant Samuel Harding, an officer of the U. S. Army, at Carleton, Canada West, province of Connecticut. The marriage took place at St. James's Church, Piccadilly, London.

"The lady, who is about the same age as the bridegroom, was the daughter of General Boyd, of the army of the Southern States, who lately expired in prison, having been made prisoner at the battle of Bull Run. The lady's early life of the most eventful and romantic feature. Her father, who passed very much of his time in Europe, bestowed the cause of Southern independence, was soon imbued with the enthusiasm which fired the rank of Gaul. Her daughter, the bride, enthusiastically embraced the same cause. Before she was in her teens she would accompany him throughout his campaign with the celebrated 'Stonewall' Jackson, and on two occasions, heroically, as a modern Joan of Arc, led on the troops to battle; she was, however, on a skirmish captured, and made prisoner, and conveyed to Washington, where she was imprisoned. Here she remained 13 months, when she was exchanged for General Cochrane, who had been made prisoner by the Confederates. On her return to the South she went on board the Greyhound, a blockade-runner, which was then captured by the Federal steamer Connecticut while running the blockade. Lieutenant Harding was sent on board the Greyhound as a prize-master, with his young bravine as a prisoner. The acquaintance which then formally became enhanced and ended together from the ship, and found their way back to country, the bride having succeeded in vividly drawing her lover from his allegiance to the United States Navy, and entering the Confederate service for the South. But to the intention of Lieutenant Harding with his bride to Canada, and carrying at the act of application, to run the blockade, and enter the service of the Southern States. The marriage, it is said, was celebrated with éclat, being attended to the brilliantest and two or three lady friends. In the bridegroom being attended by a number of American gentlemen connected with the South."

An Englishman, being recently "doing" Scotland, was ambitious to tell his friends on going home that he had scaled Goatfell without a guide. Against this project a "parky" western Cockney who knew not the mountain-tops out of Snowdonia visitors, earnestly sought to dissuade him for obvious reasons. All was urgent, however, in vain. He convinced the stranger of the utter impossibility of not accompanied with a guide, and that the ascent was only remarkable objects in it. "For instance," said he, "a little way up there is a stone, called the Cat's Cradle, which I endeavor to imitate.—See instance," a happy thought suggested itself on the spur of the moment, "there is a stone, and a strange thing connected with it is that if any one lands upon it he can hear no sound, however loud." "Indeed!" said the Cockney. "Try her," said the Highlander. He stood himself upon the hero of Bothwell Bridge mounted the boulder, and Donald put his mouth into all the grotesque shapes which an accomplished Gaelic gutturals requires and presupposes—dyby at the same time he was speaking. The Cockney, supposing he was calling loudly, vowed he could not hear a word. "Still, you understand the principle," said Donald, and he endeavor to imitate."

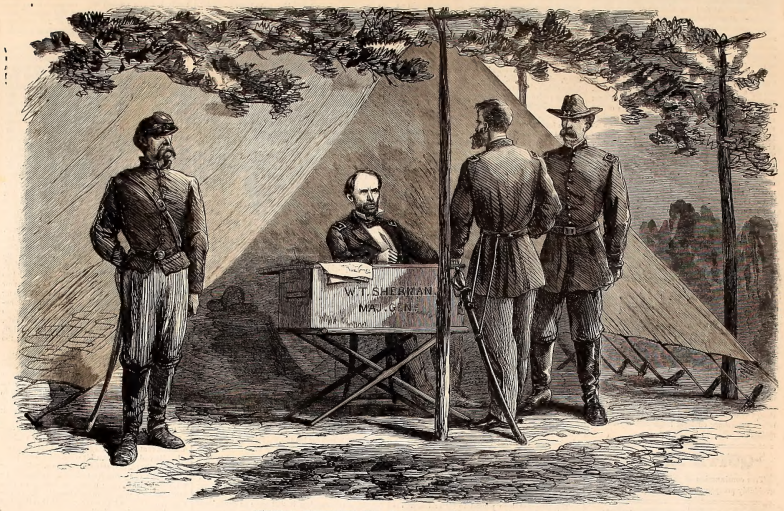
THE LATE GENERAL RUSSELL.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ANTHONY.]

GENERAL RUSSELL.

THE late Brigadier-General DAVID A. RUSSELL, whose portrait we give above, was born in Washington County, New York. He entered the West Point Military Academy at an early age, graduating in July, 1845. He entered the army as Captain in the Fourth infantry, and until 1855 was engaged in operations on the Pacific coast. As Colonel of the Seventh Massachusetts he entered upon the present conflict, participating in the Peninsular campaign. For distinguished services in the battle of Williamsburg he was made a Brevet Major, and soon afterward a full Major in the Eighth infantry. When General BURNSIDE became commander of the army RUSSELL had been nominated for a Brigadier-Generalship, and the appointment was confirmed March, 1863. In the attack on Fredericksburg his brigade was engaged, and also in the battle of Gettysburg. It was in November, 1863, that General RUSSELL took command of the First Division of the Sixth (SEDGWICK'S) Corps. With this command he was engaged in the battles of the Wilderness, and lately in the important and decisive battles in the Shenandoah Valley. In the battle of September 19 he was killed. General RUSSELL united to the accomplishments of a soldier the courtesy of a gentleman. He was noble in stature, heroic in action, and was beloved by his command.

THE LATE COLONEL GROWER.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY FREDERICKS.—[See next Page.]



GENERAL SHERMAN'S FLY.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

COLONEL GROWER.

THE late Colonel GROWER, whose portrait is given on page 652, and who was killed in the recent battle of Jonesborough, was a native of Brooklyn, New York. At the beginning of the war he held a responsible position in the Metropolitan Bank of this city; but his patriotism induced him to enter the ranks of the Seventeenth New York Volunteers, under Colonel LANSING. From Captain he was soon promoted to Major, and finally from Major to Colonel. After the term of the regiment expired he reorganized it, and was sent to the West. He had been severely wounded, yet he entered upon the new campaign under General SHERMAN with all his original enthusiasm. When his regiment was ordered to Decatur, Alabama, after SHERMAN'S expedition into Mississippi last winter, he commanded a brigade. In August, 1864, his command was ordered to the front, and formed part of the storming party which carried the enemy's works at Jonesborough. It was here, while leading his command in a spirited onset, that he was killed. Although only twenty-five years of age his rapid promotion indicated rare soldierly ability, which would have doubtless met still higher awards of honor had his life been spared. He has received, however, the highest award which the soldier ever asks, that of dying on the battle-field while fighting for his country's honor.

VIEW OF GENERAL SHERMAN'S HEAD-QUARTERS.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

THE "GEORGIA."

WE give on this page a sketch of the Confederate Privateer Georgia, which was captured by Captain WYTHECOMBE, of the United States frigate Niagara, August 24, 1864. The Georgia is a screw steamer. Since it was employed as a belligerent vessel in the destruction of American commerce it has been sold to Mr. E. BATES, a ship-owner of Liverpool. Mr. BATES having purchased the ship she was chartered by the Portuguese Government to convey passengers between Lisbon and the African coast of the West Indies. She had been dismantled for this purpose, and was under orders from Lisbon, sailing under the British flag at the time of her capture by Captain WYTHECOMBE. The crew of the Georgia was landed at Dover, and the vessel itself sent to this country for the purpose of adjudication in a prize court.

ATLANTA.

WE give on this page, and on pages 645 and 652, sketches of ATLANTA and the BATTLE OF JONESBOROUGH, together with a picture of GENERAL SHERMAN'S HEAD-QUARTERS at Atlanta and a sketch of his FLY.

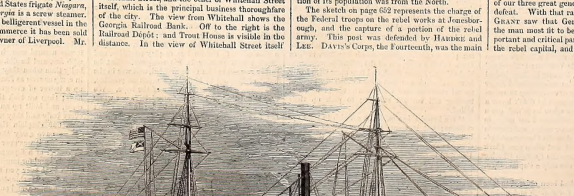
The two views of Atlanta given on page 645 represent different portions of the city, one of them being a view of the city as the spectator stands on Whitehall Street, and the other of Whitehall Street itself, which is the principal business thoroughfare of the city. The view from Whitehall shows the Georgia Railroad Bank. Off to the right is the Railroad Depôt: and Trout House is visible in the distance. In the view of Whitehall Street itself the large corner building is one now used by the Twenty-third Corps as a hospital; it was formerly used by the rebel army as a signal-station. Atlanta has long been considered one of the principal centres of refinement in the South. A good proportion of its population was from the North.

The sketch on page 652 represents the charge of the Federal troops on the rebel works at Jonesborough, and the capture of a portion of the rebel army. This post was defended by HARDEE and LEE. DAVIS'S Corps, the Fourteenth, was the main force engaged in the attack. Generals CARLIN and MORGAN, whose portraits we gave last week, led the advance.

The two engravings on this page relate to General SHERMAN personally. One of them gives a view of the General's Head-quarters; the other represents him sitting at his "Fly," engaged in correspondence or other details of an official character.

MAJOR-GENERAL SHERIDAN.

WE give on our first page a portrait of General PHILIP SHERIDAN, whose recent victories in the Valley of the Shenandoah have given us a foretaste of the glorious prospect awaiting the country of victory and peace. General SHERIDAN was born in Ohio in 1831 of Irish parentage. He graduated at West Point in 1853, with the rank of Brevet Second-Lieutenant, First Infantry. After two years' service at Fort Duncan, Texas, he was engaged in surveys in California for the Pacific Railroad, and was afterward one of the most prominent officers engaged in the adjustment of difficulties with the Indians in that vicinity. March 14, 1861, he was promoted to a Captaincy, and in the subsequent year became commander of the Second Brigade of the Cavalry Division of the Army of the Mississippi. After his victory over the rebel General CHALMERS before Corinth he was promoted to the grade of a Brigadier-General, and in BUELL'S advance upon BRAGG commanded the Eleventh Division of the Army of the Ohio. For distinguished service in the battle of Stone River he was appointed a Major-General December 31, 1862. Robust and energetic, yet skillful and cautious, he is one of our three great generals who has never met with defeat. With that rare instinct which never fails, GRANT saw that General PHILIP SHERIDAN was the man most fit to be intrusted with the most important and critical part of his combinations against the rebel capital, and appointed him to command the Middle Military Division of his army. The victories gained by SHERIDAN over EARLY in the week commencing September 19 are more important in their bearings than any series of operations since the war commenced.



THE PRIVATEER "GEORGIA," CAPTURED BY THE "NIAGARA," AUGUST 24, 1864.—[SKETCHED BY MR. KILLEEN.]

THE BATTLE OF WINCHESTER.

THE engraving on page 644 illustrates one of the most spirited actions, and certainly the most imposing spectacle of this war. It will be remembered that SHERIDAN, after having got the Sixth Corps across the Opequan, was compelled to wait full two hours for the arrival of the Nineteenth, and as a consequence of this to form an entirely new plan of battle in the face of an enemy already prepared and in line. At first the advantage appeared to rest with EARLY, whose fierce cannonade broke SHERIDAN'S first line, and threatened to disturb his second. But this state of affairs changed as soon as the Federal artillery got in position. The line of battle was re-formed, and the conflict opened in terrible earnest. The two opposing armies were at some points not more than two hundred yards apart. The slaughter is described to have been terrible; but the advantage rested now with SHERIDAN'S advancing columns. At a critical point in the battle the cavalry charge was heard above the din of the strife and the shouts of the contending armies; then followed the charge, led by such officers as MERRITT and CUSTER and TORBERT, upon the enemy's right. This decided the fortunes of the day. The movement was in accordance with Sheridan's deep-laid plan, and besides being the most magnificent spectacles was also a most wonderful success. "The unbroken columns of EARLY's cavalry mand," says the Tribune correspondent, "were forced to give way, and break before the fierce onslaught which our cavalry made upon them, who, with sabre in hand, rode them down, cutting them right and left, capturing 721 privates and non-commissioned officers, with nine battle-flags and two guns." This was fought and won the battle of Winchester, September 19, 1864.

BEFORE PETERSBURG.

THE two sketches on pages 648 and 649 relate to General GRANT'S campaign. The ground-plan is made by the relief cavalry under General HAUPTON on the 10th of September, though not published for a great importance, yet it must be confessed, a very mortifying incident of the campaign. About 2500 horses were captured. These cattle were intended for the army north of the James especially, and were captured at Harrison's Landing. The attack was very bold, and in such force that our guards could make no efficient resistance. A force was immediately dispatched under GREGG to pursue the enemy "ride," but in such force that it overtook them. The other sketch represents the two armies before Petersburg engaged in an artillery duel at midnight.

QUITE ALONE.

THE continuation of this Serial Story is unavoidably postponed until this day fortnight.

COLONEL CHARLEY'S WIFE.

"YES, they are a splendid pair! There's no discount on that. There ain't a braver man in the Army of the Potomac than Colonel Charley; and as for 'Mother Jane,' as the boys call her (because you see she's like a mother to us although she's only a chick in our company), I wouldn't be one of the nerves a fighting man for a husband, for she's just the gamest woman that ever I see. Tell you what, if you follow us when we start for the front, and see the pulled a party of us Forty-ninth boys out of the fightest place ever I was in (and that's saying something, too), you'll just take your oath that she'd ought to be a soldier's wife.

Sergeant Blake was conveying a squad of new recruits for the Forty-ninth. They were to join the Rifles of the Army of the Potomac, and were making their last halt before joining the regiment at Falmouth. The sergeant had his horse, and, unwarmly by a noble-looking officer, who rode up while they were selling coffee, accompanied by a handsome woman with a pleasant brown face and short, thick, black curls, which made a glossy fringe for a bewitching little jockey-hat, with a broad, scarlet feather, held in place by a silver eagle, gave her a military air charmingly in keeping with the martial surroundings. The lady had also addressed the Sergeant with great cordiality, while the officer, whose shoulder-straps marked him as a Colonel, addressed a laughing "Glad to see you, my lads!" to the admiring squad.

"Sergeant," said one of the men, as the subjects of the foregoing remarks cantered off, the lady with her spirited bay mare with the greatest ease and grace, "would you mind telling us the story?"

"Well, I don't know if I do. I'll tell you fellows what you may have to come to some day yourselves, and it'll teach you the value of keeping a stiff upper lip when you are hard pushed." And the Sergeant took up an easy position against the trunk of a huge tree, and began to fill their pipes and gathered around him to hear his story.

"Well, you see, Colonel Charley was only a Captain then; that's the work away I began, and I'm not upon his shoulders. Little Williams ('Matches,' the boys used to call him, because his legs looked like a couple of matches, who was appointed to me because he was first cousin or something to somebody that had influence, although he didn't know a rammel from a ramrod when he joined) was made a bit shortly after the circumstance I am going to tell you about that he had better resign, and Captain Charley got his place, and then the Lieutenancy fell to me, and I took to soldiering, and when poor Clark got his finish at Chancellorsville Captain Charley got to be Colonel. But he was only a Captain then, as I told ye.

"You see, the Captain had been ordered to take two companies of the old Forty-ninth and make a reconnaissance down the railroad (I didn't tell you that we were then holding one of the bloody forts), for it was said that a gang of Mosby's men had been seen in the neighborhood, and it was thought they were trying to cut the road. We scouted for about six miles down without seeing a sign of a grayback, and had about made up our minds it was a false alarm. About three o'clock in the afternoon we turned and started for camp. We had just halted to rest a bit at a spring that ran out of the side-hill, where the railroad makes a deep cut through a very narrow ledge, when we heard half a dozen shots in our rear, followed by a loud yell, and then Gus Lynch, one of our fellows who had lagged a little behind, came riding 'round the point of the hill as if the old boy had kicked him. Gus sung out as he came up, 'Look out boys, Mosby is after us full chisel!'

"We had barely time to obey Captain Charley's order to fix bayonets and form when the first of the ragamuffins hove in sight around the curve. There were about two hundred of 'em all told, and some dirty, sheep-stealin' looking rascals they were. They didn't charge on us right away, as we expected, but pulled up when they got in sight, probably not knowing how strong we were.

"Now in numbers they greatly overmatched us, for we had only about four hundred men all told, and we had much the best of them in our position. If we had expected them we couldn't have picked out a stronger place to make a stiff fight. Captain Charley saw this at a glance. It was, of course, impossible for us to retreat, for they, being mounted, could have ridden down on us in a minute. But we could hold the cut easy enough.

"You see the cut was narrow—just about enough for the track—and was back wood fence with three was a pretty deep drain-way running across the line between us and the rebs, which was uncovered, and about fifteen feet deep. It was easy enough to cross it on the trussels, but it was a stumper for a horse. Our rear was open, but we knew well enough that they couldn't get at us there without dismounting or riding several miles around, for the side of the ledge they were on was like a house-roof, and as it was an ugly trap, after all; for if they couldn't get in, we couldn't get out; and if they could hold us there until night it would be all up with us, for they to swarm up the bank and pop us over from the top, while we couldn't get a sight at them at all. But we stood and made the best of it, and made up our minds to trust in Providence, and to charge them five graybacks for every blue-jacket they knocked over.

"And let me tell you, boys," said the Sergeant, knocking the ashes out of his pipe, "that this trust in Providence and the bayonet is the best sort of humbug, as you'll find out when you get under fire. A soldier may get kind of reckless and devil-may-care sometimes, and often looking for death is the way and escaping; but you may be sure that few men go in where the bullets fly, and the bullets begin to whistle blood-thirsty devils, and their comrades are struck down right and left, without feeling that they are in the hands of a merciful God. In such moments as mades, there are no truer prayers spoken than those which go out from soldiers' hearts, though they may not see a movement of the close-shut lips along the lines of battle."

The Sergeant here paused to fill and light his pipe, while a solemn look fell over the faces that stood around him, and more than one emphatic "That's so!" and "Thrue for you!" went up from the vetterans of the corps.

"Well," resumed the Sergeant, "as I was saying, Mosby's men had a bad job before 'em; worse, a good deal, than we had behind us, for we had good hill-hour before they undertook to disturb us, although a couple of the dirty critters did ride to within the range of our guns. It was impossible for a shot or two sent them to the right-about in quick time. If it was possible to get a message to our order, for we only had ten rounds apiece, so although we might have picked off some of 'em as they stood, we must hold our fire for closer quarters.

"By-and-by we could see that they were getting ready for a charge; so it was certain they didn't know anything of the fight in the cut, or they would have been business to have charged with that in front of 'em. They came on first at a slow trot in single file, riding one after the other in the form of a count of the narrow track. Captain Charley had, before this, picked out ten of his best shots, boys that could hold the sights on a rifle-barrel at a hundred yards. This detail he now moved to the front, and on the further side of the gully. As they neared close the rest of us were to fire by file,' says the Cap, 'Men, count from right to left, one, two, three, and so on.' They counted up to ten. Now when these fellows reached us on the curve they will be out of line, and I want every one of you to cover his man. Number one, fire at number one the second, and so on; and when I give the word pelt the scoundrels.' So there our fellows stood, ten men in a straight line.

"Well, when they got within about three hundred yards of us they set up one of their devilish yells, and came on at the charge. They thought they could stampede us; but we belonged to the Army of the Potomac,' said the Sergeant, with a proud glance at his two companions.

"As soon as they got well strung out around the curve Captain Charley sung out, 'Fire!' and those ten pieces crashed as one piece of artillery. Then I'm a living sinner, six of the Johnnies were tumbled off their horses dead, and two more were badly hurt. Text always counts for ten. They thought they'd struck a regular hornet's nest, and were in a panic in no time, turning tail without stopping to pick up their killed.

"We hoped this would put a finish to their operations; but it seems they were determined to have one more crack at us, for they rallied, and showed us a trick that I never saw before, although I've read of something like it in accounts of Indian fights. It was a pretty 'cute dodge, and if it hadn't been for the ditch in front of us it would have fetched us among 'em. They came on in the same order as they did before, but, just as they got fairly on the wind around the turn, we heard their officer yell out some order, and every man in a body down went every man's head and the best part of his body behind his horse, so that they were pretty well covered by the necks of the animals. The thing was done so sudden and unexpected that it threw our fellows off their sight; and, although two or three horses were badly hurt, not a man, so far as we could judge, was hit.

"Of course there was no time to pick out another detail. The men were ordered to load and fire, and the orders were to fire at the word, the front rank to fire and kneel, the second rank the same, and so on. Captain Charley kept the men in front of the ditch as long as it was safe, and then gave them the order to fall back, the ranks opening to let them pass to the rear. They all came off safe but one, Reuben Banks, who was shot dead by the rebel Captain. Well, of course as soon as our fellows jumped back the rebs saw the ditch, and the foremost of 'em pulled up sharp with a loud yell. But those in the rear came tearing on, and in a second the cut was jammed full with men and horses and coming men—and such caroling I never heard before nor since. It seemed to me that every one in Dixie and Hades was our chance, and the way we pelted 'em with cold lead was a caution. Twen'ty-five minutes between the whistle and the whiz was running like beans. Our fellows gave three rousing cheers as they went off; and felt good just then for any number of graybacks Mosby could send against us.

"We now thought, most of us, that we had whipped them off for good and all, and wondered why Captain Charley didn't give us the order to fall in and march to camp, for we were by this time about used up and as hungry as wolves. But he was wiser than we were. He knew very well that they had got their wind up, and that they would hang on to us now for revenge. The moment we marched out of that cut we were doomed—our only safety was in that gully, and we must by all means prevent what we were in.

"But it was certain that something must be done and very quickly. Our camp was only three miles off by the road, and if we were sure that our offering must have been heard, and would bring out a rescue party; but Captain Charley thought that as much time had been spent up in the cut as would prevent its reaching any distance, and the result proved that he was right. A man might be sent round the top of the hill, but it was probable he could slip off without being seen by the Johnnies. But the best he could do he couldn't get to camp and a relief-party out to us less than two hours, and it was now five o'clock. By seven it would be dark, and our flints would be fixed. Captain Charley was familiar with Mosby's men, for he had often scouted over it, and he knew that a short cut along the top of the hill would carry a man to our lines in half an hour. It would be of it was a fellow of couldn't get away without the rebs sighting him, and he would be sure to be shot for it sure, and there's just a big bit hill to get over.

"Now, boys, there never was but a brave fellow in that party of ours, or a coward, and yet for a full minute there wasn't a foot budged. I tell you what, it's one thing to face death in company with other good men and true, and t'other is a wicked sight fat thing to brace a man's-heart—but when you are asked to cut loose from your comrades and make a report of yourself for sure, and don't know how many bullets, it's no use talking; not many men would do it. But there was a good deal more than the nerves' papers about 'gallant actions' and 'daring deeds' of individuals; but I tell you, boys—and it's no disgrace to any man to own to it—there's little in it just as precious to a soldier as to any man, and he is no more eager to expose himself in cold blood to the danger of death than any man on the narrow powder. I've seen things done in action that you would talk about as long as you live; but in a fight I hold that a man is not himself. There is a kind of intoxication in the smell of burnt powder, the banging of the guns, the shout and tumult around, and, more than all, the sight of power that is given over a man in the mere handling and sighting of that cold, hard thing that can kill—that carry men on to do things that, in spite almost of themselves.

"But I must get on with my story. As I was a saying, at first not a man budged; but just as we all began to feel so cruelly ashamed of ourselves that I think we'd another minute we should have been ready to fight for the honour of going, out steps a young fellow belonging to Company H, and said it was ready to go.

"This lad was called Mark Wilson. He was a fine, good-looking chap, who had never been considered of much account by his companions, for the truth was that the boys suspected that he considered himself too genteel to be a soldier. Camp is a poor place for a man's gentility, and Mark wasn't popular in his company. But he rather seemed to like to be avoided, and was in the habit of keeping himself as much as possible, and never joining in the sports of the boys. We all noticed that he never got any letters nor wrote any; never spoke of home or friends; in fact, didn't seem to have any, or any body to care for him. Sometimes the boys would be curious, and try to bring him 'out,' but never got any satisfaction; and, to be candid, when they pressed him pretty hard he actually burst out crying. The theory about him was that he was some rich man's son who had run away from home, and was too proud to let his father find him out.

"Well, when Mark stepped out, I suppose at least a score of vets jumped to the front and wanted to go, but, to every body's surprise, Mark wouldn't back down. He insisted that, as he was first to volunteer, it was his right to go. The Cap says to him: 'Well, Mark, you're a plucky boy, and you certainly shall go if you wish it; but it seems to me you had better let me pick out a stronger and tougher man.' But the little chap wouldn't yield. He said, 'No, Captain. If I am killed I have nobody to grieve for me; and I suppose I am the only one in the regiment that can be best spared.' The poor little fellow looked as if he was going to cry, and some of us felt like crying too.

"Well, Mark,' said Captain Charley, 'go you shall; but you mustn't say you haven't got any friends. A brave boy like you will make friends every where, and if we come out of this safe you shall never want a friend as long as Charley Hewing is alive.'

"There was a tree growing out of the side of the cut just a little ways back, and its top reached above the top of the bank. Captain Charley gave Mark a few directions, and handed him his revolver, and told him to be off as quick as he could. We all of us stared to see Mark, as the Captain put out his hand to shake hands, seize it and press it to his heart, and kiss it, turning as red at the same time as a ripe strawberry. Then the little fellow ran to the tree, climbed it like a monkey, and jumped off on to the bank. Captain Charley, after a couple of minutes, couldn't keep quiet any longer, as he shinned up the tree too to take observations. 'They haven't seen him yet,' he sung out to us below. 'Ah! there comes the rear of the scoundrels up the bank, and put after him. By George! the boy runs like a deer. He has got a fine start too; but one of the graybacks on the rise has got the longest legs, and gains on him. There, the leading man halts and fires his carbine. Curse it, he's hit; he's down. No, he only tripped, or fell on purpose. He's up and off again. But Long Legs is coming to close quarters. Ha! Mark wheels and gives Mr. Reb a taste of his revolver; number two. By Jove, he has tumbled him! And he don't get up. He passes by it done for, thank God! Now they have come up and stopped. The Captain now said nothing for another minute, and then he flung down his cap with a yell of exultation. There was a reward or two, and then the cavalry skedaddled in every direction. Several were killed and wounded, and about twenty taken prisoners. We got back to camp in high spirits about eight o'clock.

"And now, boys, I come to the most curious part of the story. As soon as we got in Captain Charley was told that Mark was in the hospital badly wounded. He had been brought in when the fight began, but the lad, half breaking his left arm badly: but the plucky chap had kept right on, although he hadn't dared to tell us the minute he got into Captain Charley's message to the Colonel. And when they came to dress his arm they found that they had a woman on their hands!

"Sho!" "You don't say so!" "Holy Mother!" "Sob!" "Bully gal!" A chorus of ejaculations of astonishment broke from the many-bloodied group as the Sergeant came to this denouement.

"Yes, a woman; and, what's more, dead in love with Captain Charley. You see I happened to get the story from Jake Downing, who was nursing in the hospital at the time. It seems that when she came to, and found she was fixed so she couldn't fit to break any one's heart, and begged them not to expose her, and, above all, not to tell Captain Hewing. They comforted her the best way they could as they could, and promised to keep her secret for her. Before we got in she was delirious from the pain and excitement. It was while she was out of her head this way that they found out that she thought so much of the Captain. When he came in the surgeon thought best to speak of his commendation to give him a hint of how matters stood, and he had the girl taken to a private house in the neighborhood, and nursed until she got well. He came out that she was the daughter of a farmer in Erie County, New York, and that her name was a perfect she-devil. Jane—for that was her name—and a brother, a little younger than herself, left the day of capture, and finally the boy came to grief, and, was shot at Pea Ridge. The girl then had nobody left to care for, but she stood her step-mother's bad treatment as long as she could, until one night the old termagant beat her like a dog for what she called her 'impudence,' and actually shut her up in an outhouse, and kept her there all night. The next night Jane dressed herself in a suit of her brother's clothes, cut off her hair, and slipping out of the house, ran away. She got into the Forty-ninth I never heard, but I know she did serve with us two years, and we never suspected her. Well, the upshot was that when Captain Charley found the plucky little girl had taken a fancy to him, and no human power could get her away from him when he found, too, that she was, when her natural self, a right pretty girl, and a good girl, too, it was natural enough that he should fall in love with her, and he did. It was quite a lively time when they got married, which they did in camp as soon as the regiment settled down. We had up a bower of evergreens, and made it gay with flags; then we took the drums of the regimental band and got a keg of rum, and had a regular frolic; and every body said they never saw a handsomer couple than our chaplain tied that day. Old General Grant gave away the bride, and he gave her a buss when it was over that the boys swore was like the crack of a 6-pounder rifle. Then we had the brigade band for music, and the jolliest spread and dance that ever you saw. We had lots of ladies down from Washington, and several officers' wives and daughters, and our Jane was just as much of a lady as any o' 'em.

"That was Colonel Charley and his wife you saw a bit ago. They've got a nice place near Alexandria, and it's a regular soldiers' hotel. No fellow in the Union blue ever passes there without being hailed to stop in; and if one of the Forty-ninth gets astray in that neighborhood his own mother couldn't use him better than does Mother Jane. She can't keep away from camp long, though; and her boy, the pet of the regiment, has learned to keep under fire. The boys would rather see her pretty face than the paymaster's any day. Fall in! March!"

American Watches.
The high premium on gold, and the increased rate of duty on watches, have greatly enhanced the cost of those of foreign manufacture, and it is now impossible to purchase a good watch, of English or Swiss make, except at a very extravagant price. For the same sums, the cheapest qualities of foreign make, the worthless ances and Lepines which flood the country, have hardly risen to the price at which the American Watch Company first put their well-known "Wm. Ellery" watch—a watch of the most substantial manufacture, and an accurate and durable time-keeper.
Our higher-priced watches are relatively still cheaper. We have advanced the prices of our finer movements but about 25 per cent. since the war began, while foreign watches of the same grade cost three times their ante-war prices.

Davis Pain Killer.
GENTS,—The confidence I have in Perry Davis' Pain Killer, as a remedy for Cramp, Colds, Burns, Sprains, and Rheumatism, for the cure of which it have successfully used it, induces me cheerfully to recommend its virtues to others. A few months ago I had occasion to it to destroy a felon: although

I had never heard of its being used for that purpose, but having suffered intensely from a former one, and having no other remedy at hand, I applied the Pain Killer freely for about fifteen minutes at evening, and repeated the application very freely the next morning, which entirely destroyed the felon, and increased my confidence in the quality of the remedy.
Yours truly, A. W. CURTIS, Rumen, Mich.,

HUNT AND DUANE.

We give on this page sketches of Brigadier-General HUNT and Major DUANE, the former Chief of Artillery, and the latter Chief Engineer of the Army of the Potomac. Both are soldiers of the first class. HENRY J. HUNT entered the Military Academy at West Point from Ohio in 1835. He graduated with the rank of Second Lieutenant of Artillery. In 1846 he was appointed First Lieutenant. He commanded a section of DUNCAN'S Battery in the Valley of Mexico. For meritorious conduct in the battles of Contreras and Churubusco he was raised by brevet to the rank of Captain, and subsequently to that of Major. At El Molino he was wounded. JAMES C. DUANE graduated from West Point in 1844 with the rank of Second Lieutenant of Engineers. The responsible position held by General HUNT and Major DUANE is sufficient testimony to their worth and soldierly ability. The siege operations of General GRANT'S campaign — which, although they do not attract public attention, are yet of the greatest importance—have been principally conducted by these officers.

BATTLE OF WINCHESTER.

On page 669 we give two sketches of SHERIDAN'S great conflict with EARLY in the Valley. One of these represents the Sixth Corps in action after crossing the Opequan. The general engagement commenced a little after noon. The Sixth Corps was commanded by Major-General WRIGHT, who succeeds the gallant SEDGWICK. In the Valley this corps did not forget its old record under its former commander. The other sketch relates to a later period in the day, when the rebels had already given way before the impetuous charge of CROOK and TORBERT. In their retreat from the Opequan the rebels fell back upon Winchester in great confusion. In order to cover the town, or at least to check SHERIDAN'S advance, their right flank was drawn in at an angle with the principal line. RUSSELL'S division is in the front in this the final charge of the battle. The brave commander has been killed, and General UPTON commands in his stead. The retreat soon became a rout, and the rebel army was pushed back through the streets of Winchester. General UPTON was slightly wounded.

GENERAL HUNT AND MAJOR DUANE, CHIEF OF ARTILLERY AND CHIEF ENGINEER OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1864.

THE VALUE OF CHARACTER.

THE personal character of the President is the rock upon which the Opposition is wrecked. It dashes against him and his administration, hissing and venomous, but falls back again baffled. From the day when every rebel press in wait to assassinate him in Baltimore, through all the mad hate of the rebel press to the last malignant sneer of Copperhead Conservatism and foreign jealousy, the popular confidence in the unswerving fidelity and purity of purpose of the President has smiled the storm to scorn.

The rebel charge against the Administration, thundered in every key, is its despotism. It is incessantly asserted that personal liberty is destroyed, that original rights are annihilated, that we are all the cowering, shivering subjects of the bloody Emperor ABRAHAM, who brings us all to our knees by pointing to one of the innumerable bastiles which shadow the land; all of us, except ARNOLD VON WINKELRIED VALLANDIGHAM, and JOHN HAMPDEN WOOD, and WILLIAM DELL GOUVERNEUR, and PATRICK HENRY LOVE, and GEORGE WASHINGTON SEYMOUR, who bravely withstand the tyrant for the sake of justice and human rights. But with these exceptions, we are all groaning under the most intolerable tyranny, from which there is no hope of deliverance but by intrusting the Government to the hands of these heroes.

This is doubtless a cunning line of attack in the confusion and doubt of civil war. Indifference is always willing to see any Administration overthrown. Cowardice is always glad to end hostilities with the enemy by exciting hatred of the Government; and party-spirit, in every form, plays the dangerous game of seeking political power by tampering with national existence. But nothing balks such an attack so readily as personal qualities which no calumny can reach. The public is mad with the lust of political power in this country does not hesitate to declare that the President is deliberately prolonging the war as a political game, that every act of his is performed solely with reference to his re-election; that if EARLY should return and overturn Lincoln, if GRANT should retire from Petersburg and SHERMAN from Atlanta, it would be because the President took care that they should not have men enough, and in every way thwarted and perplexed their plans. Yet the same party declares the war both wicked and a failure. It entreats, by its leaders, the interference of British influence, and it receives British sympathy, while it opposes the draft. And when you ask them how the President can send men to the Generals if men are not raised, they reply that it is no wonder he can not raise them for such a wicked war.

But these frantic efforts are vain. The profound confidence of the great mass of the people in the President is unshaken. It is simply impossible to make them believe, after their experience of his patient fidelity to the Union, that he is a monstrous despot and political gambler. The American people, we are very sure, are firmly persuaded that Mr. VALLANDIGHAM does not love the Union more than Mr. LINCOLN; that Mr. WOOD is not truer to popular rights; nor GOVERNOR SEYMOUR, whose "friends" are the remote relations of the public peace and the mad assassins of the poor and defenseless, more faithful to the Constitution than the President of the United States. The conservative power and influence of pure and lofty personal character, in a time of great national peril, was never more signally illustrated than in the official career of ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

THE BRITISH LION CHEERS FOR CHICAGO.

THE London Times bursts into a shout of enthusiastic delight at the nomination of M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON, and the principles which they have been selected to represent.

We have always insisted, says the Times, that the North could not subdue the South, and the proof is the Chicago Convention and its nominations.

After three years of tremendous effort the American confess themselves conquered, shouts the Times, and the proof is the Chicago Convention and its nominations.

They are forced to try to conciliate and compromise, sneers the Times, and the proof is that the Chicago Convention has nominated a General who first discovered that his countrymen were whipped.

Will not the cost the South back again? replies the Times. No, it is simply impossible, replies the Times, to its own question; victors are not in the habit of receiving terms from the vanquished. Conquerors dictate their own terms, says the Times, and the Southern leaders are not such fools as to relinquish what they have proved their ability to hold.

We understand, says the Times, the Chicago talk about Union. It is a tub to the whale. We do not wonder the Convention shrank from blurting out the truth that the South must go free. But that is the meaning at the platform and the nominations. The Chicago leaders know that what they confess can not be done by force will not be accomplished by persuasion. Palaver must always prevail, not follow, powder. The United States of America are gone, exults the Times. They have split, scattered, and sunk to the bottom. We always knew they would. They were an insolent, upstart republic, mesuring British ideas. Their success would have taken from us our commercial sceptre. It would have been a fatal blow at our precious aristocratic system. It would have stimulated the hopes of our poorest classes, and have made them suspect that they were not born to slave. It would have encouraged the laboring man every where. Thank Heaven that danger is past. The United States have ceased to be pieces, and are gone utterly to ruin and destruction. Laus Deo! Hurrah for M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON!

Here are the two thanks of the Chicago moment. First, the rebel papers and orators had already told us that their only hope for success lay in the Convention and its action; and now our bitterest most malignant British enemies are perfectly satisfied with the Chicago proceedings.

Two years ago the men who control be Chicago party, and who have now made its platform and nominations, went to the British minister and asked for British interference in our war. The honor of the country is something unknown to them. To secure their return to political power they would humble the United States at the feet of England or France. Last year they would allow the Union to be dissolved, according to their candidate, Mr. PENDLETON, who says we have no right or power to help ourselves. They would yield the authority of the Government to a rebellion, and confess its overthrow by treason. They would make the name of the United States a theme of open contempt. And therefore the rebels look to them as their last hope—and therefore the English Tories and all our foreign enemies cheer for their platform and candidates.

Is that a cheer in which the faithful American citizen—civilian, soldier, or sailor—can unite? Are the cause and the devotion which are acceptable to rebels at home and to enemies abroad the cause and the candidates of the true American people?

TO AN HONEST DOUBTER.

THAT the whole Chicago movement is, what the London Times calls it, a disposition to surrender to the rebellion, and to make peace upon such terms as the rebels will grant, is perfectly understood by the great mass of intelligent voters. But there are some who still honestly think that as Union men they can as properly vote for the Chicago nominations as for LINCOLN and JOHNSON.

Now such men will not deny that Mr. PENDLETON frankly avows, that whenever any State is dissatisfied and wishes to leave the Union she ought to be allowed to go. In other words, that the Union exists at the pleasure of any single State, that Kentucky and Maryland or Delaware and no stronger, and that the credit of the Union is measured by that of the smallest State in it. In Mr. PENDLETON'S view we are a league of thirty-five sovereign States, no one of which has any authority over any other; and the duty of a citizen of the League to its Government may be shown by the way in which he the State in which he lives. Will any Union man seriously say that if these views are correct there is, in any true view, a Government of the United States, or a Union in any national sense?

Yet these are the honest opinions of Mr. PENDLETON, who consequently and properly holds that the war is a crime, and he has therefore always consistently spoken against it, and voted against it. How then can any man, who sertionally believes that the Union can not ought to be maintained against all armed attack, honestly vote for Mr. PENDLETON when he knows his position?

For the purposes of the election General M'CLELLAN and Mr. PENDLETON are one. You can not vote for one without voting for both. And why do they stand together? Simply because the men who made the platform, and who would, if the Chicago ticket were successful, control the policy of the party, agree with Mr. PENDLETON; and being sure of him, of the platform, and of the great body of the voters, are cunning enough to shake General M'CLELLAN in the eyes of Union men as a decoy.

But would any such Union man as we speak of and to, believe that this paper were thoroughly and in good faith devoted to the Union if it supported a ticket composed of ABRAHAM LINCOLN for President and of VALLANDIGHAM for Vice-President? Would any such man not at once say: "If Mr. LINCOLN were a true Union man he could not accept the nomination of men who call for surrender to rebels, and who nominate VALLANDIGHAM as his substitute in case of death."

What he would justly say to us we say to him. The antecedents of the men who have nominated M'CLELLAN—their openly-expressed views at the Convention—their platform, which is the official manifesto of the party—their candidate for the Vice-Presidency, a frank disunionist and artisan of absolute State sovereignty —M'CLELLAN'S acceptance of their nomination and of his fellow-nominee, without a word of dissent from the principles announced or the least censure of the humiliating policy proposed —all these things combined must prove to every fair-minded man that when he votes for the M'CLELLAN-PENDLETON electors he votes to commit the country and the Union to the measures made the Chicago platform, for whose success the rebels pray, and in the hope of whose triumph every foreign foe of the American Union rejoices.

REBEL TERRORISM.

IN "Pea Ridge and Prairie Grove," a little work by WILLIAM MONTGOMERY, an Arkansas refugee, sold by him in Cincinnati, and sent upon receipt of a dollar, we have another tale of the terrible sufferings of the Union men at the South.

In the plain talks of Mr. F. W. SUMNER, of Texas, describing his personal experience, we have another picture of the thrilling and heart-sickening scenes of the same tragedy.

No speeches or documents seem to us so searching and instructive as such books and talks. They reveal the true spirit of the society which has generated this rebellion. They show how utterly human nature is imbruted by slavery. The systematic division of persons into the Slave States, as we have all long known, was a loud assertion that nothing was so divine and human as personal slavery. When the war began it was assumed that, as secession took place in the interest of slavery, whoever was true to the Union was false to slavery. To betray the least regard for the country, therefore —to be suspected even of a secret love for it—was the chiefest of crimes, visited with the prompted penalty of death.

The terrorism of the French Revolution, the daily culling of the roll of victims at the Conciergerie and the Temple, the universal dread and desolation, were not more appalling than the wholesale slaughter of Southern Unionists. Mr. SUMNER tells us of his best neighbors hung in groups; of their wives who, dressing in women's clothes, dragged a woman suspected of fidelity to the Union away from her home and her children, and hung her upon a neighboring tree, while her little children shrieked all day beneath her corpse. Mr. SUMNER himself, flying by night, was overtaken, and for ten months was confined in a cell twelve feet square.

His testimony is that of one out of a thousand witnesses. Men and women of every position in life, who know the condition of the slaveholding society before the war, find their experience confirmed by these sad and suffering witnesses. Honor and humanity die in the heart of a people who will tolerate among them no one who is not an abject devotee of their brutal deity. And it is to such men—these murderers of their fellow-citizens who dare to love their country, who hang innocent women before their children's eyes, and who are fighting for an infernal expansion of the system which degrades them—that the Chicago leaders propose that the victorious American people shall surrender by voting for M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON.

The "Conservatives" who burn orphan-asylums, and massacre men, women, and children because they are poor and friendless, will naturally vote for the candidates of the policy which proposes to let the assassins of Union women dictate the terms of Union. But every brave and generous citizen, every man who is true to the Union and its Government, will vote and work for the policy which proposes by force of arms to reduce these criminals to entire obedience to the Government and to the penalty of the law.

"BLURTING."

MR. C. GODFREY GUNTHER is an ardent supporter of the Chicago Platform. He also presided at the M'CLELLAN-PENDLETON meeting in Union Square. He is also Mayor of the City of New York. Now when it is proposed that American citizens shall illuminate their houses in honor of glorious victories over the national enemies lately won by American soldiers and sailors, this wary supporter of M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON forbids it.

Some of the Copperhead journals are alarmed. They think that the residents of their meetings refuse to rejoice over Union victories it will be suspected that the Chicago party is indifferent to the Union. So they blame Mayor GUNTHER a little. But it is the Mayor's position. And why do they stand together? Simply because the men who made the platform, and who would, if the Chicago ticket were successful, control the policy of the party, agree with Mr. PENDLETON; and being sure of him, of the platform, and of the great body of the voters, are cunning enough to shake General M'CLELLAN in the eyes of Union men as a decoy.

But would any such Union man as we speak of and to, believe that this paper were thoroughly and in good faith devoted to the Union if it supported a ticket composed of ABRAHAM LINCOLN for President and of VALLANDIGHAM for Vice-President? Would any such man not at once say: "If Mr. LINCOLN were a true Union man he could not accept the nomination of men who call for surrender to rebels, and who nominate VALLANDIGHAM as his substitute in case of death."

What he would justly say to us we say to him. The antecedents of the men who have nominated M'CLELLAN—their openly-expressed views at the Convention—their platform, which with Mayor GUNTHER, to vote for Mr. PENDLETON and General M'CLELLAN.

Mayor GUNTHER is one of the men who, in the words of the London Times, "blurt out" exactly what his party means.

THE LONDON-CHICAGO VIEW.

THE effect of the late Union victories upon the prospects of the M'CLELLAN-PENDLETON nominations are accurately described in the New York correspondence of the London Herald. The foreign enemies of the United States agree with their Copperheads and Mayor GUNTHER, the President of the M'CLELLAN-PENDLETON ratification meeting, that the successes of GRANT and SHERIDAN, of FARRAGUT and SHERMAN, are not matters of rejoicing. Are these persons, who regret the victories won by the valor of United States soldiers and sailors, those to whom the United States Government can safely be intrusted? The correspondent of the London Herald says:

"There is no doubt that the friends of General M'CLELLAN, recently nominated for the Presidency, regret the late Federal successes as downright disasters. . . . Hence the Democrats make no secret of their discouragement and dismay at these chance evidences of vitality in the Union armies."

"THE CHICAGO PLATFORM."

WE publish to-day, in MR. NAST'S illustration of the Chicago Platform, one of the most overwhelming and convincing speeches that can be made for the Union and its standard-bearers LINCOLN and JOHNSON. It represents the exact meaning of the Chicago resolutions, of which General M'CLELLAN and Mr. PENDLETON are the official representatives. It reveals the secret and express tendency of the whole policy of the party of surrender to rebellion, and compromise with treason. We do not undertake to describe or explain the picture, but we commend it to the thoughtful study of every patriot in the land.

We again suggest to Union committees and clubs that they can circulate no documents more effective than the series of political pictures and caricatures which have appeared in the late numbers of this paper. They can either procure quantities of the paper itself, or they can be furnished with electrotypes of the pictures to be printed and issued as they choose. Our hope and our purpose are simply to serve the cause of the Union, which is that of the country; for we believe with the old Continental Congress that the cause of the United States is the cause of human nature.

TWO MAYORS.

FOUR years ago there was a Mayor of the city of New York who regretted that DANIEL TOCOMB, one of the rebel chiefs, that he could not send him arms with which to kill loyal American citizens in battle.

ROBERT TOOMBS and his associates, having fought those citizens for four years, have been vanquished in a series of brilliant battles on sea and land, and another Mayor of New York refuses to rejoice in the national success.

The first-named Mayor was the Honorable FERNANDO WOOD; the second is the Honorable C. GODFREY GUNTHER. They are both "representative men," and both warmly support the Chicago Platform and advocate the M'CLELLAN-PENDLETON nomination.

Are they the file-leaders whom the men who win the victories, and those who rejoice over them, are likely to choose?

DEATH OF CAPTAIN SPEKE.

THUS famous African explorer and discoverer of the source of the Nile, whose funeral of his Majesties was lately published, and has taken place among the most interesting works of African travel, his sudden and most sadly been the means of his own death. The local paper in England gives the following account of the circumstances:

"He had gone down to Bath to attend the meeting of the British Association, where his presence was expected with no ordinary interest. On Thursday morning he went out to shoot. In forcing a way through a hedge, with his gun upon his arm, the piece was touched by the twigs. It exploded, and the charge went through his heart, causing instantaneous death. How strangely and that a man who had been safe amongst so many, who had undergone and overcome so many perils of journeyings, of waters, of robbers, should come home to end his career thus miserably!"

SLANDER.

WE thank a discharged soldier in Vicksburg, who sends us his name, and asks us to refute a slander which he inclosee, for his kind regard for our good fame. But he must be satisfied to know that it is a slander. For we are too busily engaged in defending the country and civil order from the blows aimed at them, to have any time or wish to reject those intended for us. Our correspondent says that the slander is taken from one of the Copperhead papers.

"That trickle the minds of the gebels, disgust all loyal men, and raise the 4—l generally; that go in for VALLANDIGHAM, M'CLELLAN, and giving the South what even they have not had the impudence to ask for after the events of the last three years."

So we suppose; and the source of the slander shows its worth.

FROM THE ARMY OF THE NORTHWEST.

An officer in this army writes:

"I can not refrain from giving you an idea of the feeling existing in the army regarding the recent Chicago Convention. Curses not loud but deep greet the ear as the soldier tells of the traitors who talk of compromise, etc. But when your Heeley of the 3d made its appearance in our camp-mails many knew no bounds, and the members of this company (C) to a man requested their officers to petition President Lincoln to stop their pay, that they would fight to the last if he would only hang the traitors who talked of compromise. They did not want any more pay; if Uncle Sam had no money he could spend it for nothing; only no compromise. We did not begin the war, and have suffered too much by compromising with traitors when the infernal rebellion is tottering on its last legs. I have made it my general feeling in all conversations throughout Minnesota, and I cordially indorse them."

FROM THE ARMY BEFORE RICHMOND.

We quote from an officer's letter, dated "Near Petersburg, September 5."

"I speak for a majority in the army when I say, don't vote for him (McClellan). You could not do the army greater harm than by electing him. He is the last hook the rebels have to hang a hope on."

FROM THE ARMY OF THE SHENANDOAH.

"A Big Stiff Soldier of the Shenandoah" writes as follows of Gen. Sheridan's picture, and adds some very agreeable remarks about the Heeley:

"The Blessings of Victory' have not come too soon; just in time to cheer the despondent and gloomy visitor of the Army of the Shenandoah. Nothing could better represent the feelings of the soldier—a glorious victory, and an honorable peace to follow shortly. The true soldier is brave and confident; while the weak, 'at home,' are despondent. The soldiers are proud of your noble paper, as it takes such high and bold stand for the 'Union now and forever,' and the integrity of our Government. All shout in the elegant shout!' You have won an enviable place in the hearts of the soldier. You are doing your duty as an editor, while the soldier is fighting in the field. Both we could say this of every editor in the land. But how different—while we are finding our 'battles,' many unlucky articles are penned against our cause and us. 'Shame' on such men, if we can call them souls!

"The soldier knows his friends at home; and Harper's Weekly, which has always defended him, receives the enthusiasm of the army. And he can never forget the Heeley, friend in the time of trying hours of our republic.

"God grant to us the means you deserve in the lasting for your country's good!

"The vote for McClellan in the army will be small; and Abraham Lincoln, 'the soldier's friend,' will be their administrative choice. The intelligent will vote for him, and victory will finally crown our patriotic efforts."

A WORD FROM THE NAVY.

The letter of an officer commanding in the waters of North Carolina gives a new view of the rebel conscription. It has now reached the women. The most adjutant of the gallant soldiers is not to fail to re-elect Lincoln shows that the cause and its representatives are well understood by the sailors as the soldiers:

"U. S. Gun-boat, Albemarle Sound,
North Carolina, ——.

"Enough to distress the enemy occasionally even here in the waters of the deepest State of South Carolina. I had a splendid time up at a little place called Columbia some two weeks ago. It averages about three a day of refugees that come off to us. Days and his followers are now about the whole country, taking men, horses, in fact every thing, and even stopping women and send them off to the hospitals to attend to their sick and wounded. We have always been under the impression there was some patriotism in them to attend to those things. I had a contraband woman to come on board, which proves the fact. She was conscripted because her husband joined the 'Yanks.'

"We are perfectly healthy here, excepting occasionally we are visited with a 'case' fever. You will see a great many thing some of these days unless I am mistaken. Keep the army full a little longer, and the rebellion will collapse. Nothing else will do. They are on their last legs; and don't fail to re-elect Lincoln."

GENERAL DIX'S POSITION.

The noble speech of General Dix at Saratoga is in the right key to order. "If any man wishes to leave the American flag, shoot him on the spot." He was received with three rousing cheers, and said, in response to a serenade:

"Fellow-citizens.—I am very thankful to you for the honor you have done me. As I arrived here last night, I was engaged in public business, and shall depart at an early hour in the morning, I know you will excuse me if I limit what I have to say to a simple acknowledgment of your kindness and courtesy.

"I will say one word, however, on the subject which has moved the heart of every loyal man—I mean the rebellion. It has arisen in a conviction from the experience that we can have no honorable peace until the insurgent armies are dispersed and the leaders of the rebellion expelled from the country. [Loud cheers.] Indeed, any discussion of hostilities would lead inevitably and directly to a recognition of the insurgent leaders; and when I say this, I need hardly add that I can have no part in any political movement of which the Chicago Platform is the basis. [Renewed cheering and applause.] No, fellow-citizens, the only hope of securing an honorable peace—a peace which shall restore the Union and the Constitution, is in a steady, persistent, and unremitting prosecution of the war with great vigor[sic]; and I believe the sentiment of every right-thinking man will soon bring him to this conviction.

"With these few remarks, and renewing the expression of my thanks for your kindness, I bid you all good-night."

BISHOP SIMPSON AND THE FLAG.

At the late session of the Pittsburg Annual Conference of the Methodist Church Bishop Simpson, one of the most eminent and apostolic divines, and most eloquent orators in the country, made a speech upon the four questions:

"Shall our Government be destroyed and swept from the earth? Can we be divided into two or more Governments? Shall we have a new form of Government? Is not the Nation to rise out of its present troubles better, more, and more powerful?

The effect of his discourse is described as very remarkable. Toward the close an eye-witness says:

"Laying his hands on the torn and bullet-riddled colors of the Seventy-first Ohio, he spoke of the brave soldier whose they had been baptized in blood, and described their bearing at some small parish of cause, filled with stars, but an angel had snatched from the heavenly canopy to set the stripe in blood. Here his description began a scene that Demosthenes might have envied. All over the vast assembly handkerchiefs and hats were waved, and before the speaker sat down the whole audience was on its feet in magic influence, and screamed, and shouted, and saluted, and stamped, and clapped, and wept, and laughed in a wild excitement. Colonel Mosby sprung to the top of a bench, and called for 'The Star-Spangled Banner,' which was sung, or rather shouted, until the audience dispersed, as it has to disperse."

THE NEW LOAN.

The Secretary of the Treasury announces that he will receive Proposals, until October 14, for forty millions of 5-20 Bonds. The 5-20s have always been so popular that a liberal premium is expected, and a considerable amount will probably be taken on foreign account. The 7-30 loan will not be interfered with, and remains the most convenient investment at par that is now in the market, while the "Proposals" may be desirable for banks and capitalists. The subscriptions to the 7-30s have already exceeded to over forty-five millions. Full particulars in relation to both these loans will be found in our advertising columns.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE KISS IN SCHOOL.

A district school not far away,
Mid Berkshire's hills, one winter's day,
Was humming with its wonted noise
Of threescore mingled girls and boys—
Some few intent on books and slates,
But more on future mischief bent;
The while the master's downward look
Was fastened on a copy-book—
Rose sharp and clear a rousing smack!
As 'twere a battery of blast
Let off in one tremendous kiss.
"What's that?" the startled master cries,
"That, thir," a little imp replies,
"With William Willish, if you please—
I there him Kith Thuthan Primthe!"
With frown to make a statue thrill,
The master thundered, "Either, Will!"
Like wretch o'ertaken in his track,
With downcast cheeks in guilt aflame,
Will hung his head with fear and shame,
And to that awful presence came,
A gawky, stolid, awkward lout,
The butt of all good-natured fun.
With smile suppressed and birch upraised,
The theme was followed, "I'm amazed
That you, my biggest pupil, should
Be guilty of an act so rude!
Before the whole set school, to boot—
What will your mother say to that?"
"Twas she herself, Sir," sobbed the lad,
"I didn't mean to be so bad—
But when Sarah Smith's pretty curls,
And whisper'd I was 'fraid of girls,
And darsn't kiss a baby's doll,
I couldn't stand it, Sir, at all!
But up and kiss'd her on the spot;
I know—boo-hoo—I ought to not,
But somehow from her looks—boo-hoo—
I thought she kind o' wished I do!"

A Love Letter.—"Och, Paddy! swate Paddy, if I was per daddy, I'd kill ye wid kissy intricity; if I was yer brother, and ye knew yer mother, I'd set ye down on her lady. To taste of yer breath, I wid starve me to death, and lay off me hoop skaight! So joost have a taste of yer arm on me waste, I'd barf at the masses of yer hair. Dear Paddy, be aisy, and don't be after bating—you'll find me both gintle and civil; our life we will spind in an illegant manner, and remain your own true love, Bid-

When Carter, the lion king, was exhibiting with Drayton, at Astley's, a manager, with whom Carter had made a bet, was to appear unexpectedly in the lion's private box. The bailiffs came to the stage-door, and asked for Carter. "Here's the gentleman," said Drayton; and when they reached the stage there sat Carter composedly in the grate of the East End, and very much in earnest. "There, Sir!" said Mr. Carter waiting for you, gentlemen," said Drayton; "I'll be with you in a minute." Carter, who was in the secret, pretended to obey, at the same time circling by a series of rapid movements round the bailiffs and manager. The bailiffs staggered back in terror, rolled over each other in their wild retreat down stairs, and nearly fainted before they reached the street.

What we Learn in Foreign Parts.—When last we were in Paris we strolled into the Palais de Justice, and soon found ourselves in the celebrated Salle des Pas Perdus. On inquiring, we discovered that the Salle des Pas Perdus was identical in a comparative sense with Punch's Mary; and we also learned that the Pas Perdus were in no way justified by the Salle des Pas Perdus. These facts were no less new than pleasing to us, and so accordingly we have made a note of them.

A Dundee journal circulates the following story: On one occasion a gentleman was driving a gratuity from the Rev. John Skinner, of Longside, author of "Tullochgorum," to give him by way of thanks. "Oh, Sir, I hope that you and a' your family will be spared many years." "Well," said Skinner, "I am very much obliged to you, only you need not have just been so particular as to the time."

A gentleman awoke to hear a celebrated West-end preacher, found himself in a new pew and in a most unusual respectable. He watched the per-one's eyes looking very hard at him, and at last he began speculating his seats, and he thought to himself, "Oh, oh, a fee is expected!" So he put his hand in his pocket and held it persistingly between his two fingers, and it was not long before the fee was in the plate. Then the preacher beckoned into a seat, whereupon he slipped a half-penny into the plate and left the pew. Before the sitting disappointed the cane bowling round to him with a hymn-book, whispering, as he handed it to him, "You made a mistake, sir, you only gave me a half-penny." "All right," he answered. "I'll pay the rest."

Having recovered his breath, which had been suspended in the office, he exclaimed: "And so this is the last we shall ever see of him! Poor fellow! he has drawn a full house, though, to the end."

An East-India Governor having died abroad, his body was put in strong waters to preserve it for interment in England. A sailor on board the ship being frequently drunk, the captain forbade the liquor, and locked up the ship, so that he has now any liquor. Shortly after the fellow appeared very drunk, and as he could not be obtained no one could guess. The captain resolved to find out, promising to forgive him if he told how he got the liquor. He replied, "After some hesitation he hicupped out, "Why, please to your honor, I tapped the Governor."

A boy being asked what was the plural of "penny," very promptly replied, "twopence."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE VIRGINIA CAMPAIGN.

Sheridan has reaped the fruits of his great victories in the Valley. After the defeat of Early at Fisher's Hill, on the 22d of September, Sheridan pursued the flying rebels as far as Staunton. Early's rear-guard was overtaken 25 miles south of Winchester, at Mount Jackson. Here Sheridan's cavalry were engaged, and the rebels were continually giving themselves up. Taking the Keezletown road, Early reached the Valley on the night of the 24th. Sheridan captured 300 rebel wounded at Mount Jackson, and 1,200 prisoners and deserters on Fort Republic and Staunton. In the pursuit to Port Republic seventy-five wagons with four caissons were destroyed. Early's army reached Staunton on the 26th "and destroyed a large quantity of bridges, forage, caissons, rations, small-arms, hard-tack, flour, rebel-ships," etc. Proceeding to Waynesborough, the rebels burned all the bridges over the Virginia Central. Sheridan, seven miles of the track, and a large amount of property. Custer captured this day 200 more of Early's army had passed through the mountains to Gordonsville. Early's army, broken and disorganized, has fled entirely to Richmond, but as closely was Early pursued that Custer's cavalry were in sight of Charlottesville on Saturday. There will be rest to the rebels with the loss of the Valley. Sheridan's army has left Winchester, and the great body of Staunton was retained for the use of Early's army; while the last is the great granary of the Valley and the chief depend for Lee's army. He denies that the Nineteenth Corps was routed on the battle of Winchester.

General Grant's army is also in motion. On the 25th the Tenth and Eighteenth Corps crossed the James at Deep Bottom. Before daylight the Eighteenth Corps charged on to the Varina Road, drove in the rebel outpickets, and at a distance of eleven miles from Richmond encountered the first line of works of the enemy. Kautz Sheridan's Division, which was in the advance, moved right up to the entrenchments, shelling the fortifications and two other heavy guns. This being carried by assault, the rebels fled, leaving the troops in possession of the fortifications when he was put out of combat by a slight wound. The line established by the 18th corps was then massed, captured the entire works at this point, with 16 pieces of field artillery. Gregg's cavalry division, Heckman's and Stannard's, were engaged. General Burnside's corps was also engaged. A short distance beyond Paine's Colored Division operated with the Tenth Corps on the Kingsland Road, and was in the advance. The engagement occurred near the junction of the Kingsland and New Market Roads, a short distance from Richmond. Here a line of works was captured with considerable loss; and Birney advanced on the New Market Road direct to Richmond. The advance was checked at the junction of the Varina and New Market roads by the rebel forces at this point were attacked unsuccessfully. The loss in the general divisions was very great. Kautz's cavalry at one mean time made a reconnaissance as far as to the toll-gate, within three miles of Richmond. The rebel General Lee brought up Hoth, Hoke, Field, and Wilcox to reinforce Ewell. On the 29th o'clock p. m. the rebels, determined, made an attack on the Eighteenth Corps, whose right was turned, compelling it to fall back to its original line. Our left: Impetus at our front was broken.

GENERAL SHERMAN.

General Hood, at the last accounts, was intrenched on the West Point and Montgomery Railroad, twenty miles from Atlanta, and General Sherman had left Jonesboro' with the Macon Road. What Sherman's plan of future operations may be has not yet transpired.

In the mean time General Forrest is again raiding on Sherman's rear, with a force estimated at seven thousand men, with twenty guns. Advancing across the Tennessee river, he captured Athens, Alabama, on the 24th. He was surrounded by Colonel Campbell, after a fight of two hours, the surrendering of four guns. The rebel Forrest were captured who were on the way to reinforce Hood, and the rebels fled in confusion toward the Decatur Railroad. This road was considerably injured between Athens and Decatur. The rebels, in making a mandatory advanced on Pulaski, seventy-five miles south of Nashville, on the same road. Two regiments of infantry from Pulaski were posted at Ink River, and in destroying the Sulphur Spring Bridge. The Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad is in short distance east of this road. On the 25th the telegraph wires on the Nashville and Decatur road were in communication with Nashville. Rousseau on the 30th took the Nashville and Decatur road at Pulaski. No mention recorded, however, as Forrest withdrew toward the Chattanooga road, which Rousseau immediately took measures to guard.

INVASION OF MISSOURI.

Price is again moving into Missouri with a force estimated from ten to twenty thousand men. He has left the main portion of this force was at Fredericktown in the Arcadia Valley, and his object was great cattle and provisions, and it was thought that a raid was contemplated on St. Louis. Large bodies of militia were making preparations to meet the emergency, and General Mower is expected to move upon Price's rear from the south. The forces in the district of Central Missouri have been withdrawn from the railroad and are concentrating at Rolla. General Ewing, commanding at Pilot Knob, was nearly surrounded by Price's forces, but has been able to keep them off, of which have been repulsed. General Ewing has three regiments of cavalry and two batteries of artillery, and is drawing his force from Pilot Knob. Price was advancing on Rolla.

FOREIGN NEWS.

RUSSIA.

News has reached England of the fall of Atlanta, which the London Times says "may fairly be regarded as crowning with success the campaign of the southwestern army of the Union."

Muller, the alleged murderer of Mr. Briggs, has arrived in London. The excitement on the occasion was unprecedented in court annals.

A disastrous fire recently occurred in London, involving a loss of two millions and a half dollars.

The London gamblers have begun to wear a threatening aspect, in consequence of the refusal of Denmark to agree upon terms of peace. Sweden takes sides with Denmark.

GENERALS BIRNEY AND ORD.

GENERALS BIRNEY and ORD, whose portraits are above given, command respectively the Tenth and Eighteenth Corps of BUTLER'S army. These officers had charge of the late operations north of the James River, in which Major-General ORD was wounded.

General DAVID B. BIRNEY was born in Alabama. He was the son of a rich planter, JAMES B. BIRNEY, who, although a Southerner by birth and a slaveholder, became a radical abolitionist. He carried his political creed into practice by coming to Ohio and emancipating his slaves. He was a Presidential candidate in 1844, when HENRY CLAY was the Whig nominee, and is said to have defeated the election of the latter by dividing the Whig party. CLAY and BIRNEY together had a popular majority of more than 24,000. General BIRNEY was doing business in Philadelphia when the present war began. In August, 1861, he took the field as Colonel of the Twenty-third Pennsylvania Volunteers. From a Colonel BIRNEY was steadily promoted until he was appointed Major-General. He commanded a division in the Second Corps of the Army of the Potomac previous to assuming the command of the Tenth Corps.

Major-General E. O. C. ORD, a native of the District of Columbia, was a son of Lieutenant JAMES ORD. He graduated from West Point in 1839 with the rank of Second Lieutenant of Artillery. In September, 1850, he was promoted to a Captaincy. General ORD was attached to M'CALL'S division of the Army of the Potomac, commanding the Third Brigade. This division of M'CLELLAN'S army held the extreme right, and in the engagement at Drainsville, at the close of 1861, General ORD'S command acted a prominent part. General ORD was during the next year transferred to the West, where he held a command under General GRANT. He has proved himself a faithful and efficient officer, and has under him now "Baldy" SMITH'S old command. His wound, which is a slight one, was received on Thursday, September 28, while he was engaged in giving orders for an assault on fortifications still beyond those which he had captured at Chapin's Farm.

MAJOR-GENERALS CROOK AND TORBERT.

WE give below portraits of Generals CROOK and TORBERT, the most efficient cavalry officers under SHERIDAN.

MAJOR-GENERAL TORBERT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ANTHONY.]

West Point in 1852 with the rank of brevet Second Lieutenant of Infantry. He commanded a brigade, the Third of General Cox's Division, in the Kanawha Valley in the spring of 1862, holding at that time the rank of Colonel. May 23, 1862, Colonel Croxon was attacked by the rebel Colonel Heath. Troops from Ohio were principally engaged. The action was very severe, but Croxon gained a decisive victory. He here received a wound in the foot. He had spent the winter in disciplining the Thirtysixth Ohio regiment, and the result proved the efficiency of a military education. General Croxon took part in the battle of Antietam, his command being attached to the Ninth Army Corps, commanded by General Cox. Soon afterward he was appointed Brigadier-General, and sent to Tennessee. General T. A. Turnbull, a Major-General by brevet, was also engaged in the battle of Antietam as Colonel of the First New Jersey Volunteers. In this command, consisting of a brigade of New Jersey troops, won great distinction on that occasion. In the late victories in the Valley Major-General Torbert has contributed an important part.

THE BALLAD OF A ROSE.

My folded flower last Summer grew
Serenely in a Southern place;
Its heart was filled with peaceful dew,
The peaceful sunshine kiss'd its face.

Beside the threshold of a cot
It knew familiar household ties,
The Negro's beloved forget-me-not
To maidens' lips and children's eyes.

Bees climb'd about it; birds above
Sang in the flush'd year of the rose:
"Our new millennium of Love
Begins with every May it blows."

Warm cottage-windows murmured near
All music making home so sweet—
The mother's voice divinely dear,
The lisping tongues, the pattering feet.

Ah, little rose, another tide
On your dumb lips has waited long
(Since then your tender lips grew pale)—
Speak, darling; make your speech my song!

Another tale than cottage peace,
Than balmy quiet, hovering wings
Of humming-bird and honey-bees,
And Summer's breath of shining things.

Ah, little rose, your lips are mute:
Could Fancy give them words to-day,
Such histories would but sadly suit
Those lips that knew but Love and May!

You woke, one Sabbath, warm and sweet,
The fields were bright with dewy glow;
The sun made for the springing wheat
And spake, "Let all things lovelier grow!"

What answer rock'd the awaken'd earth,
Strange echo to that voice divine!
Before the battle's awful birth
The earth and heaven gave no sign.

The cannon thunder'd every where;
The bomb sprang howling from afar,
A coming earthquake born in air,
A winged hell, a bursting star!

And lo! about the sacred spot
Where late the doves of home would 'light,
Men red with battle falter'd not
Though others lay with faces white.

The lowly roof of Love, behold!
Is rent by hell and cannon-ball;
The rifles flame from casements old!
By bullets torn the roses fall!

Under the rose-tree where you grew,
A soldier, dying, look'd and saw
Your face, that only Sabbath knew,
With Heaven's love and Heaven's law.

He heard with ebbing blood and breath,
At your sweet chaste, the distant cease,
And in that earthquake-hour of Death
The cannon jar'd the bells of Peace.

For while he saw you, tender flower!
So peaceful in that troubled place,
A tenderer vision touch'd the hour
And fled its hate on his face.

A captain pluck'd you, in the roar
Of battle, o'er his comrade slain,
And through the fight your beauty bore
Bloodless upon the bloody plain.

Dear rose, within your folded leaves
I know what other memory lies;
I hear (or else my ear deceives)
Your wail of homesick longing rise:

"O happy Summer, lost to me!
O threshold, mine to guard no more!"
You yearn for visits of the bee
To rose's heart and cottage-door.

Rest in my book, O precious flower!
And seem—a whitening face above—
The witness in the battle-hour
Of Peace and Home, of God and Love!

A MAN'S MISTAKE.

I am afraid I can not make my heroine romantic. There are disqualifying circumstances, several of them. Her name—it should have been Constance, or Genevieve, or Madeline—it was plain Hannah. A good, respectable name; her mother had borne it, and her grandmother, and her great-grandmother. Good, conscientious women, all of them, doing their duty through life in the fear of God; but not such personages as novels and poems are written about. Then her home—if it could have been a stately stone mansion, a graceful villa, or even a white cottage overhung with vines, it would have figured better in a story; but, instead, it was a great, square, brick house, in a great, square yard in front, two immense, prosperous-looking barns on one side, and a thrifty vegetable garden on the other. The garden was behind the barns, the most economical color for painting buildings. He was right, perhaps, but what his farm-house gained in economy it certainly lost in picturesque effect. Last, but not least, Hannah Grant was not a beauty. Her hands were hard and brown; she had a tendency to vary cardinal of her complexion, and her hair was what the people round her called red. It was a shade to be more than ordinarily handsome, and I should call it auburn—but it was not black or brown, and Hannah was greatly exercised in mind thereat, and, in an early stage of her history, did her best to spoil it with pomatum, trying to make it look dark.

Give me credit for taking all the aforesaid disqualifying circumstances into account before I began, and hesitating to tell you the story of Hannah Grant lest you should not find her sufficiently interesting. But she was just one of the persons who do their work in this world as well as well; such a thoroughly genial, healthful nature that I thought it would do you good to sit down for a little while in her company. The people who have their best place in the world and are satisfied without trying to creep into their neighbor's are so rare. I do not think Hannah Grant had ever felt a moment's unnecessary discontent with her lot. She had a clear, strong mind, and saw things at their true valuation. She understood the worth and worthlessness of honest good sense and integrity, such as distinguished her parents, and appreciated the comfort and prosperity of her surroundings. When she was torn away to school for a year or two she did not take the fever after fashion, and "board" with friends; which seems almost as inevitable to girls in their teens as the measles and whooping-cough are to children. She came back to the farm-house as natural and unspoiled as she went away.

She did fall so far into the ways of young ladyhood as to read the sentimental books of the day, of course, her exact opposite. Bertha Mallory was born fine lady, reared like a hot-house flower, and developed into a loveliness as rare as it is valuable, perhaps, but as delicate and dainty. It was not strange that Hannah Grant admired her, for she had a keen and vivid sense of beauty, and Bertha was beautiful exceedingly. Hannah had been struck, from the first day she entered school, with that peculiar grace—the "style," as girls call it—in the exquisite small hands and feet; the haughty little head, with its hair of pale gold waving round it in such soft profusion; the calm, proud yet bright as the heart of a blush-rose; the long-lashed blue eyes so brightly, vividly blue, that they were like gems; the dainty mouth, with lips as red as a scarlet geranium flower. All this was heightened by that appropriateness of toilet and air without which even a diamond lacks lustre. Bertha had a genius for just one thing in the world, and that was dress. She had brought with her to school the idea of parents who lived but to indulge her fancies, to whom her caprices were law, she had never known the need of any other. Her every wish was a rule before every purchase, "How long will it last? Will it dye? Will it turn?"

She wore the daintiest muslins, the loveliest ribbons, the gayest little slippers; and every thing was so harmonious, so perfectly selected, that it seemed but the best-proved economy to be the purchasing instead of at all distracting attention from it.

It was certainly the strangest anomaly in the list of anomalous friendships that a violent intimacy should have sprung up between her and Hannah Grant. On Hannah's part it was natural, perhaps. Like most plain persons she worshiped beauty, and had for Bertha something of the devotion of a loyal courtier for a royal mistress. I think Bertha was attracted to Hannah precisely because Hannah was so unlike herself, and in the matter of dress, had no conflicting pretensions to beauty. She was a selfish little creature, too—profoundly selfish—and the generosity of Hannah's nature was convenient. She sang with a siren sweetness of voice that admirably simulated true feeling, and she danced like a fairy; but these were accomplishments ended. She hated study, and made Hannah write all her exercises and do all her sums, paying her with kisses and caresses. Of real love I do not believe she was capable; but she had a confirmed need of her friend's society, and a confiding in her, which both of them mistook for love.

Still, not even Bertha Mallory had power to subvert that strong, practical common sense of Hannah's, or give her a distaste for her home, and the life that awaited her. That "home" took, as I said, thoroughly unpoised. She took her right place in the household at once, and began relieving her mother of some light duties, leaving for father's accounts, and making herself necessary to every one. Of course she responded well to Miss Mallory. She wrote with weekly regularity, according to promise, good, cordial, loving letters, that must have come like a fresh breeze blowing from the hills into the perfumed, luxurious air of the rose-hung room where they were read. Bertha wrote quite punctually too. In her friend she was sure of an admiring auditor for all her triumphs, and her egotism was unsparingly prolix.

Hannah learned a new lesson that winter, sweeter and stranger than any that had gone before. She learned her: a woman, strong and faithful at heart, vigorously organized, and unspoiled by sentimental fancies, can love a good man. There was a powerful fascination about Paul Everdale, and others felt it besides herself. He had come to Ashford during her absence, and taken the place of the old minister who had preached there ever since she could remember; and of course he was a frequent visitor at Deacon Grant's.

It seemed strange, at first, that he should love Hannah. His nature was so much more ideal than hers—all his tendencies were romantic and poetical. He was just the man, you would have thought, to marry for beauty—to marry, perhaps and repent of it ever after. A man who knew would never have permanently satisfied him—yet you would have imagined his heart must be reached through his fancy. It seemed strange, at first, for his discernment, his keen appreciation of character, that he should have recognized Deacon Grant's true worth, and forgiven her want of the dainty grace, the symmetrical loveliness, which it was a part of his very nature to crave. It surprised her to find herself his choice as much as it could have surprised any one. But she repaid him by fondest and faithfullest love. Now, indeed, her letters grew full of hope and brightness. Joy sparkled in them, anticipation flooded them with promise. Next summer, she wrote, Bertha must visit her. She would take no denial. She should not be satisfied till she had introduced her to Mr. Everdale.

Can it be credited that these letters piqued Bertha—that in the midst of her "great possessions" she envied the poor man's one ewe lamb? Hannah had been for three years engaged—Hannah, in connection with whom she had never thought of lovers—more than a year. Many slave would have been if she had been questioned, to settle down by-and-by as a farmer's wife, and distinguish herself, perhaps, for brains and success in agricultural lore. It seemed unfitting, incongruous, that Hannah should be writing to her of this handsome, eloquent young man, with his elevated ideas, his poet's face, his chivalrous homage.

"Poor fellow!" she thought, "he has seen no one else, and is pitiably easy if he should be allowed to marry; and then wake up afterward to the knowledge that there are women in existence!"

She made up her mind to look into the affair herself. She could go in June, and spare six weeks or so before that time. She wrote a gracious letter to Hannah, accepting her invitation, and promising to dawn upon Ashford in the month of roses. Of course Hannah received it when she received it. She spent half the evening in talking to Mr. Everdale about Bertha's graces, and anticipating the delights of her visit.

That was a happy spring to Hannah Grant. She hunted May flowers with Paul Everdale, following the trail of that delicate fragrance through the spicy woods. She drew nearer to him day by day, understood him better, grew more necessary to him. If he began to comprehend that he had only vaguely guessed at first, the warmth of passion that lay so deep in her heart, the strength of loving that would make her indispensable to every act and duty of a man's life. There was an element of growth in her in which lay much of her attraction. He felt that himself, that his own heart was not done. She would climb to new heights. Standing beside her lover, he could see the steps to take if he would stand beside her next year.

When the first of June drew nigh preparations for getting rid of some of Miss Mallory's receptions. She and Hannah had been room-mates at school, and it seemed natural that they should be so still. The parlor-floor was cleared at once for the sake of the coming occupant. Her father was generous and prosperous, and her wishes were always so reasonable that they were never refused. When she was through, the cool-looking chamber, with its new carpet, the pretty, painted furniture, and the soft muslin curtains, was pretty enough even for dainty Bertha Mallory. In the parlor, too, Hannah had the good taste not to attempt any more than she could do well. Mosses and rosewood were be-yond her means, but creamy matting, and chairs of bamboo and cane, with vases full of flowers, and one or two engravings selected by Paul Everdale's critical taste, gave the room an aspect pleasant and home-like. Mr. Everdale had become so much interested in the coming visitor as his betrothed, and he went over to tea on the evening after her arrival in the great expectation.

She had come in the middle of the afternoon, and had returned with profuse demonstration Hannah's affectionate welcome. Her welcome she had made a charming toilet, and quite untouched by any of the soil and sun-burn of travel she went down with Hannah to the parlor, where her ribbons, to meet Mr. Everdale.

Red Hannah Grant, in spite of all apparent humility, an overweening self-esteem, a confidence in her own power little short of audacity, that she volunteered to enter into contrast with Bertha Mallory? Or was the confidence in him, her lover? Did love mean so much to her that she could not comprehend, and was unwilling of its being turned aside by any outside charms?

You comprehend at once that it will be the old story—that Bertha's beauty, like the beauty of a dream, her airs, her graces, her dainty toilets, will work woe. But at first Paul Everdale meant to be perfectly courteous. The very idea of fickleness would have been abhorrent to him. "Is thy servant a dog?" would have been his answer to any proposition of the kind. From the very first, he could not help seeing that fair was fair. There was a touching contrast between this dainty creature, ugly, and ruddy, hard of hands, and straightforward and self-reliant in manner. The contrast between the natures of the two girls was still wider, if he had but known it, but then it was not so apparent. Bertha's silken softness veiled skillfully her utterly selfish character, petty aims, narrow scope, and circumscribed powers. Hannah's great heart throbbed for all the world. She was ready to spend and be spent for suffering humanity every where. She was as unselfish as human nature can be—honest in her affections, strong of will, and vigorous of mind.

She had so much confidence in both her lover and her friend that it was a long time before any suspicion were awakened to the possibility that they might like each other too well. At first she threw them together with the most unguarded way. Not even for Bertha would she lay aside those domestic cares of which she had once lifted the burden from her mother's shoulders; and busy her host many quite a portion of every day. She thought it was in kind of Paul to come over and help her friend to pass away those hours which must otherwise have been solitary. She took a heart-felt pride in Bertha's accomplishments, and when she heard her singing to the guitar which she had brought with her, she would pause at her work to listen, and think, unconsciously, "He will see now that I have not praised her too much."

Bertha found the Reverend Paul Everdale quite worthy of her steel. She had seen no handsomer man in her own winter in society, and she had seen few who equaled him in grace and culture. Unconscientious as it must be confessed she was, she found something infinitely charming in his poetical temperament; in the grave sweetness of his nonsense, suggesting always something held in reserve. She had commenced with only the intention to flirt a little—perhaps to break a country-heart for pastime as she went to town—but in a week or two she found her own heart, or the sentimental vanity which did duty for one with her, seriously affected. Then with the uncontrolled willfulness which in weak natures like hers is often almost a passion she resolved that she would have her. That was not so hard as some of those which Sir Michael Scott set for his familiar spirit before he found that last awful one, at the end of all, I suppose, for Enemy and liars. She had for weapons her beauty, her wardrobe, her voice, her finished coquetry of manner, and in the lists against her was Hannah, unarmed and unskilful.

One by one she carried the outposts of her citadel. Day after day witnessed some wall fall down —some skirmish, successful on her side. She sang such love, sweet airs, sitting there on a foot-stool at his feet like an innocent child; she listened when he read to her with such sympathetic attention; she was so wistfully anxious to learn and profit with her hair rippling unadorned away from her low fore-head, and making her look placid as a Madonna; again, haughty as a fallen queen, and sometimes ordered above her brow that made her look regal, and putting on with it a queen's dignity and hauteur; yet again airy and laughing, chiding her lover's gravity, slipping through his fingers like a butterfly. It was not strange that he was bewildered; that he felt the old earth-like sliding away from beneath his feet, and dared no longer look his own soul in the face.

It was just at this stage that Hannah woke up to the meaning of affairs. The revelation flashed upon her suddenly. She read it in her eyes as they followed Bertha, perhaps; or heard it in the tremulous tones of his voice. She knew not how—she knew only that, whatever she had been blind to in the days, and only Heaven could understand how sharp was the pang when her eyes were opened. Suddenly as it came she commanded and she did her. She sat the evening through, scarcely more silent than usual. She even bore Paul Everdale's kiss which he went over and unconsciously cold kiss, born of habit and of duty—without wincing.

She was not less kind than usual in her manner to Bertha when they went up stairs. She helped her untie her bows, and untwist her gay ribbons, and when all was done put on her own night-dress quietly, and waited for her to go to sleep. When the regular breath, coming and going so softly, had assured her that it was safe, she got up again and lighted her light. Then she went and stood beside the bed, looking long at Bertha. Passionately as she loved her, she knew by name every dainty through her soul and strove to master her. Hatred shook her, revenge tempted her, lust of self-assertion and self-vindication rose in its strength and defied her. She set the light upon the table, and knelt down with her burden, seeking comfort from the throne of her supernatural heart. I think God heard her. He who fed the Israelites with manna in the wilderness could provide bread, to his children in the wilderness of life, a heavenly manna, and the soul that feeds thereon grows strong.

At last she arose, and again she left the light and stood over Bertha. How beautiful she was, with that faint pink flush on her cheeks, the scarlet lips parted, the golden hair, all unbraided, in a wrapping over the pillow! She looked to sweet and innocent, too, that her loveliness had in it something of profanity. Hannah felt the tears stealing to her eyes. She hated herself for the frantic jealousy she had been feeling. How could she have fallen into such a fit of the blind heart? How could he help loving such grace and beauty? Had not she, a woman, felt that wonderful power? Should she not dwell by Everdale's side, expect a man to look on it unmoved? As for Bertha, she blamed her least of all, for she could help loving Paul? She knelt once more and breathed another prayer, so utterly unselfish that I doubt if half the saints in the calendar ever did any thing so worthy of canonization—a prayer for them and their happiness together. I do not think she slept much that night. She could comprehend herself better now, but sternest duty could not bid her wear her crown of thorns joyfully.

She had meant at first to speak to Mr. Everdale the next day—to release him from all obligation to her, and leave him free to seek his happiness in his own way; but she began after a while to feel that this was not best. She could not release him without giving a reason for it; and how could she bear to seem jealous and suspicious—to accuse him of his defection? Better let things take their course.

So in the morning she went out, and as usual—set herself about her accustomed tasks, and tried not to listen for the two voices that floated now and then to the roof of the parlor. Paul Everdale was drinking a Circean cup, of which the drops would be bitter enough at bottom, however the bubbles might sparkle on its surface. His nature was too noble to let him sin comfortably. He was troubled already by an accusing phantom that sometimes came between him and the siren-sweet face, or drowned in the clamor of its upbraidings the silvery voice. Bertha had cast enough to know that—to interpret aright his expression of devotion and coldness. It only stimulated her to a resolution more intense—a more passionate longing for triumph.

Things went on so until the very afternoon before she was to leave. That day was to decide so much. Such a crisis was feverishly self-accentuated. She thought her stake on the game was heavy, and she waited with frantic impatience to see whether she had won or lost. Mr. Everdale sat with her a while, talking about her going away; then, feeling his self-control failing him, he got up and went into the dining-room, where his landlord and family, busy about some household task. Going to her side, he said, out of his utter desperation and helplessness,

"Hannah, I need you. If you ever loved me, save me!"

There was courage and strength in her look. She put out her hand to him, and he grasped it with dizzying tenacity. I have seen a man whose arm could not swim cling so to a spar in the midst of deep waters.

"Yes," she said, "I will save you. I understand it all. You and Bertha love each other, and you have been feeling that the love was wicked. It is not. It is better that you could not help loving you, and I never should. I only wonder that with that poet's temperament of yours you ever thought of loving me at all. I must go away, and I could never have made you happy; and I am so thankful that Bertha came and brought us all to our senses before it was too late! Of course I should not marry you now, and you are free as though you had never seen me."

Her strength and courage deceived him. He thought she was not suffering—that, after all, they had both been deceiving themselves. Bertha had a desire to think this mailed him into judging too hastily.

"I was never half good enough for you, Hannah," he said, with that lip praise which means so little, and comes so easily on such occasions. "You will find some one some worthy, and I—"

"You have found Bertha," she said, turning away, and putting an end to the conversation; for she felt her strength failing her, and the hopes of her life.

Paul Everdale went back to Bertha. She was crying. She had not understood his leaving her, and she had feared all was lost, and so began, like girls like, to weep over her disappointment. And tears were as becoming to her as they are to most girls. She did not redden her nose and furrow her brow as they do those of ordinary mortals. The round drops just glittered on her long golden lashes, like the dew drops on a fringed gentian. Mr. Everdale took the dainty little creature in his arms.

"Let me comfort you, Bertha," he said, with a grand and passionate tenderness in his voice.

She drew herself away from him a little petulantly.

"No," she said, "you can not; you belong to Hannah. You went to her just now."

"But I belong to Hannah no longer. She would not have me. She has given me up. Child, do not torment me—love!"

Did any throb of compunction visit that girl's heart? Did she feel one momentary spasm of pity for the weak soul she had wrenched, among the ruins she had done her best to wreck? I think not. She crept, with that childish, caressing way she had, closer into his arms, nearer to his heart, and let her love in tones of such murmurous sweetness as intoxicated him still more. He called her by a thousand fond names, such as Hannah had never heard from his lips in the days when he loved her most. He thanked her, he praised her, he blessed her again and again.

Hannah left them to themselves that evening; but when Bertha went up stairs she found her, though the door was ajar, sitting in the dark. The girl's tact did not fail her. She knelt down at her friend's feet, and said, plaintively:

"Paul loves me, Hannah; but that can not make me happy if I have lost you. I loved you first. Don't you see, out of your heart, poor little me! whom you have loved so long."

Hannah was too generous to hear this appeal unmoved. She bent over and put her arms about the little figure, and stooping down she kissed the fatally beautiful face that had willed Paul Everdale's heart away.

"No, Bertha," she said; "I have loved you too well for that. I do not blame you or him. It was Fate."

They kissed each other when they parted the next morning, and said some fond words each of them—but no more, after that, any two could have been a week. Newport, of course, kept Bertha busy; and Hannah found tasks enough at home to employ herself with. I think she found more relief in those days that she was tired. The hotter the work the more welcome, so that it would keep her from thinking, and make her weary enough at night to win sleep.

Paul Everdale was not quite so happy as he had imagined Bertha's love would make him. He missed Hannah when he settled back into the old ways again. Bertha's empire over his senses had been absolute; but Hannah had drawn nearer, though he did not then know it, to that immortal part which must remember and love, suffer or enjoy eternally. He had been used to telling her all his thoughts, to sharing with her his keenest anticipations; and he found himself lonely and listless when the hour came on which he used to go to her. He tried to satisfy himself with the presence of a grimace face, with pale gold hair framing it in. He recalled and fondly lingered over every item of their daily loveliness. But it did not console him as it ought. Bertha's letters tantalized him a little. They were so full of the gayeties and triumphs of her Newport life that the expressions of affection they contained could not quite salve the wound they made. It was vexing to find that she could be so gay and happy away from him—could triumph in in other men's admiration. He did not like to think of her waiting, and polking, and flirting. It seemed to rob her image of half the charm which in the quiet days at Ashford.

When six weeks had gone by a letter came which he read through more than once, as if fearing himself to meet fervently the idea it dealt. It did not break his heart, but it wounded his pride cruelly. He folded it up at last, saying to himself:

"With what meanness he must be shall be measured to you again;" and went with it to Hannah.

He found her sitting alone in the parlor where he and Bertha had spent so many happy hours. He thought as he entered the quiet room that he had never done justice to her attractions. Even when he loved her best he had not realized them. She was now, standing .. moment in the door and looking at her, he saw something nobler in her face than any beauty of white prettiness. The sun stole into the window where she sat, and lighted up the massive braids of her auburn hair till it shone like a crown of reddish gold. Her eyes were earnest and honest; her features had a certain nobility in their expression which very few women possess. Paul Everdale deemed childish carelessness, and cleared up her complexion into those rich, warm tints that go with auburn hair and hazel eyes. She was not a woman to be a belle in a ball-room, but one whom having known well you could not easily forget—such a one as King Solomon may have said when he wrote of her whose price was above rubies. She would be a wife in whom the heart of her husband might safely trust—a mother whose children would inherit rare virtues, and whose influence would make their lives rich and worthy.

But she was no longer Paul Everdale's; so what to him was all he read in the good, serious face? He went up to her and said to her the letter:

"Read that, Hannah," he said. "You gave us to each other; you have a right to know what comes of it."

Puzzled a little by his manner, and by the strenuousness in his voice, Hannah took the letter, and read, as Bertha's art required, from the middle:

"Paul, I am engaged. I write the news abruptly, I know; but what can I say to soften it? I did love you dearly—I do love you dearly; but you are so cold, so fast I never thought about any thing else when we were together. What I got you to say, you know, I thought, I knew I was entitled—could any one be more so?—for a gentleman's coy, shy nature to be brought to the point down into such a life. I am not good enough for it. All my tastes and talents lie in another direction. I can shine in a ball-room—could act as the wife of a minister of any society. I began to realize that if married you should never succeed in the position you occupy now. Mr. Bruyn-Breck fell in love with me. He is rich, and a gentleman—could set me in a sphere where I could shine. He's dead live with him will be a life that just suits me; and I have written him that I will be his wife. I owe you will tell you that I love you best—that I would rather marry you if you were as poor as Lazarus, than him if he were rich, and I can not give up so much. Burn all my little notes, please. They are not worth sending back. Forgive me, and be very unhappy about it, for so Hannah, whom you will comfort you. She was always better than any one else.

"BERTHA."

When she had read the letter all through she handed it back. She hardly knew what comment to make, and Mr. Everdale looked annoyed strange and sarcastic. So she only said, gently,

"I don't see how she could have written it! I am very sorry for you."

"You should congratulate me instead. I am glad—thankful beyond expression for this release. She had misunderstood me, doubted my love, would have met its deserved punishment. I must be unsay the things about me that I was a wretch. Hannah, you are always better than any one else.

Hannah Grant had that generosity which is higher than any other. She was noble enough to forgive freely. But she could not have faith at once in a reaction so sudden. She remembered how she again trusted all. So she condemned him to a long probation, during which they should neither not speak to her one word of love. He and she were both to hold themselves free as if no such word as love existed between them. If, at the end of a year long by, if neither of them had formed any other ties, they should both know themselves better; and then would be time enough to settle their future.

He was obliged to be content with this, for it was the most he could win. She was resolved. She now knew her friendship—her love—better than a month long ago—but she was not a woman facile enough in acceptance to seize a heart flung back to her again.

In a few weeks she heard from Bertha—a letter full of triumph and self-congratulation, with a few penitential phrases, a good many coaxing, caressing sentences about their old love for each other, and an invitation to Hannah to come to New York, and be one of the bridesmaids at her approaching wedding. But though she urged the point with pertinacity Hannah had the good sense to refuse. She wrote Bertha kindly enough, but said that to these how out of place she would be at such a wedding, and was firmly prevailed upon. She invited Mr. and Mrs. Bruyn-Breck to visit her, however; and received a promise, which she did not suppose would be kept for the next summer.

Do you care to know how it all ended? Before the year was quite over Mr. Everdale's perseverance had succeeded in convincing Hannah of the strength and endurance of his love, and by the next midsummer she was again his betrothed wife. He did love her—he had never loved another half so well—loved her all the better that he had wandered away a while after a false idol. Having fed upon husks the bread of home was sweet.

Just after the renewal of their engagement came, quite unexpectedly, Mrs. Bruyn-Breck. Her husband brought her, and left her behind him for a visit. He was a handsome, self-indulgent, pleasure-loving man, who worshiped his wife's beauty, and indulged her whims as lavishly as he did his own.

And to Paul Everdale she had one more opportunity of measuring the two women. Every day while it lasted his wonder and self-contempt at his old infatuation grew stronger. Bertha's very beauty seemed insipid to him, now—her airs and graces had lost their power. Over his fancy, as over his heart, Hannah Grant had gained the direct woman. Forever Fate or Providence had been kind, and given a man an opportunity in this world to correct a grand mistake, retrieve a great error. Paul Everdale accepted his good fortune thankfully.

DEATH of the male sex is much more rapid than in the female. In Prussia, between the years 1849 to 1860, the total number of deaths among males throughout England and Wales was 1,000,000, while the double among females was only 409,059, giving an excess of male deaths in the three years of 15,941. The fact of females living on is not especially surprising, that the number of females in any country should nearly exceed the number of males. At the present time, in London, there are 996,600 females to 815,000 males, or about 181,000 females in excess. Coupled with this fact, and obviously depending on it, is the superior longevity of females. In the year 1860 throughout England and Wales, between 1st July, 1859, and 30th June, 1860, 7,041 males aged 100 years and upward died, while in the same age, there died only 3854 females, leaving what is left of the 100 years old females in favor of the male sex of 1296.

THE EMPEROR NICHOLAS abandoned a fall of manna in Asia Minor. His ministers, M. Haldinger, state that he has received a portion of this manna, which fell with a shower of rain on the 12th of June, 1863, in the valley at the steppe of the Kurghis, and is often carried in those parts by the Tartar tribes called Kirghis. The manna, which are always perfectly detached, have much of the form and of a magnitude of a pea, and are found frequently to be attached to a stony support of granite, sand-stone, or clay. The manna is collected into flour and baked into bread, and is known among the Turks by the name of Kirghis Kebir. Analysis of the manna shows that it contains more than sixty-five per cent. of oxalate of lime, with a small quantity of vegetable matter.

"How stupid you look, always staring straight up into the air," cried one of the Dalesio's to the other, the sons of the Dalesio.

"Oh, no," we see the sun in his strength, and the glories of day, and the soft summer clouds, and the grand old mountains, and the beautiful trees, and—and—Dalesio," answered the Dalesio.

"That was all very well uttered by it, and all the field laughs at you," said the Butter-cup.

"I like to look at the sky," said the Dalesio.

"What poor, mean-looking things the Cockalanes are! I wish you liked to look at me," said the Butter-cup.

"Are they?" asked the Dalesio, in reply.

"Shocking! Do you not think the Dalesio's far handsomer than those clumsy Clover Blossoms—don't you think so?" asked the Butter-cup.

"Can't say, indeed," replied the Dalesio.

"At this hour, Dalesio, especially, they are dull, standing so tall and holding their heads so high; wouldn't you be ashamed of that, Dalesio?"

"Friends," said the Dalesio, "be advised: it may seem to you that I am idle, but it is not so; but it is a secret that if you would follow our example and do it, you would escape being stung by the bumble-bees, and be more happy cheaply, even at the cost of a stiff neck and a pitiful contempt."

"How wise I am!" cried the Finger-post to a Willow-stump by his side.

"Are you?" said the Willow.

"Am I?" indignantly retorted the Post. "Do you see my wisdom in my face, or in the great town, the city of it, and the distance from it, plainly written there?"

"No," said the Willow.

"Then you must acknowledge how superior I am to you. Why, I am a Finger-post!"

"True indeed," answered the Willow, "and learned in many things, so as to point the way to different towns you and me. You know the way to the city, I believe, and you have been there yourself, so you tell me, for you have stood there twenty years, and I don't see that you are a bit the wiser for your visit to the town. You don't profess to understand any thing about it."

"Impudent fellow!" said the Post. "I could tell you many things about the city, but it is beneath my dignity to converse with a Willow-stump. Be silent, sir!"

"Then you must acknowledge how superior I am to you. Why, I am a Willow

THE SONG OF THE BEGGAR.

I SIT all day in the crowded street,
Mid the sound of wheels and hurrying feet,
In the warm sunlight and the cruel sleet;
And very hard is this marble seat:

Hard and cold to the hearts of those,
Robed in laces and satin clothes,
Who pass me by as though I were stone.
A wonder it is that I have not grown
On the pavement here to a statue of bone,
For the wind to wail at and shriek and moan.

Cold and hunger, hunger and cold,
Poverty makes the young look old!

From morning to noon, from noon to night;
And the broad bright day, and the wan gaslight;
Like a species of the children Herod
As they pass me by, till my aching sight
Grows dim with tears at the very thought
Of my own child—alas! how unlike I brought
Into this world of hunger and sin,
Dying at home! Oh the dreadful din
Of these busy streets! Will it never begin
To grow warmer? for my blood is thin.

Cold and hunger, hunger and cold,
Poverty makes the young look old!

Oh mother! for so I judge you to be—
Pray turn not in silent scorn from me,
For I am a woman like unto thee;
But the poor are slaves, while the rich are free.
Sad it is to be so shut out

From human creatures round about.
Sweet lady! I know you young and fair;
But it seems an age since my trusty hair
Grew gray and thin from mute despair—
The still-born offspring of Want and Care.

Cold and hunger, hunger and cold,
Poverty makes the young look old!

The dark night comes, and the city's hum
Fades by gentle turns on the heartless town;
On my hopeless woe they seem to frown
In their jewel-splendor, so like a crown.

Pity! Is such in vain I beg?
For a penny or a crust to chew;
The streets grow quiet, and colder the air;
And my heart grows faint as I mount the stair
To the dreary chamber, blank and bare,
And the starving child I bore with me there.

Cold and hunger, hunger and cold,
Poverty makes the young look old!

A RUSSIAN ROMANCE.

I HAD my hand on Dr. Tillmann's door, and yet I hesitated to knock. I was house-surgeon of the great Petro-Paulovsky Hospital at St. Petersburg, of which that testy and punctilious old German was principal physician, and I carried with me my daily report of the cholera patients who had died during the night.

A moment ago I had been talking briskly enough to a group of students, and now I was standing like a timid boy at a schoolmaster's door. The fact was, I knew that old autocrat was jealous of me, and disliked me, and I detested him, and I tried as much as possible to avoid coming into contact with him. I had determined to resist and resent any indignity offered me, and yet I wished to avoid a quarrel, because I loved his dear pretty little daughter Olga. I was, moreover, on the morning of which I speak tired out both in mind and body; for I had been up the greater part of the night attending patients in a state of suffering from the terrible epidemic which was devastating the Russian capital. On my way to my own rooms to snatch an hour or two of sleep, I had stopped at Dr. Tillmann's door to deliver my official report. At that moment I would rather have been sleeping curses, tired as I was, than have confronted that intolerable old martinet, whom nothing could propitiate, and from whom no exertion of mine could extort a word of praise.

At last I knocked in a quick business-like way. There was a muttering, but no one answered. I knocked again. "Come in!" roared out the Doctor, in his dry mechanical voice. I entered. There he sat, at his bad set every morning for seven-and-twenty years at the same hour, the cheerless tower of a samovar boiling before him, and the tea-pot mounted above the burning charcoal on the little brazier stand. Before him lay the Journal de St. Petersburg, which he, a little nankeen-colored man in the blue official coat and blue bottoms, was perusing with a contemptuous air. Opposite sat Olga at the open window, for it was April time, tearing and feeding a pet green and crimson parrot. It was a scene just such as De Hooge loved to paint. The sunshine fell in blanched light on one side of the room and table, and in short golden squares upon the marqueterie of the floor. I bowed to her and to the implacable Doctor.

"Well, sir," said he, "your report."

I was about to hand it, when he said: "Read it."

I read it. "April 14, 1832. Number of patients received since yesterday: In the Peter ward, eighty-three; in the Catherine ward, seventy-four; in the Romanoff ward, ninety-two. Died during the night, forty-three."

"Oh, father, father, how terrible!" cried the Doctor's daughter; "Heaven has, indeed, sent the destroying angel among us. Do the poor people suffer much, Mr. Cambell? Oh, can I not help them?"

Do you think if I went to the wards I could encourage the nurses?"

Even I had never before seen Olga look so beautiful as she did then, when a high and generous impulse was stirring her heart to good.

"Miss Tillmann," I replied, "you must not expose yourself to danger. The nurses are zealous. They understand the people, and can bear those scenes of horror better than you could."

"Olga, attend to your parrot," said the old pedant, hardly able to practice your music; your master comes at eleven."

"I am afraid, Sir," I said, "the opium and calomel treatment does not save more than a third of our patients. Those who have been brought in this morning have been nearly all in a state of collapse, from which it has been, in most cases, impossible to recover them."

"A mere phase of the disease," said Dr. Tillmann; "that will soon pass away. Continue the opium and the calomel. We must have no absurd innovations in the Petro-Paulovsky Hospital. By-the-by," said he, a mischievous malice twinkling in his little beady eyes), "here is a letter in the Journal to-day puffing up some new Persian anti-cholera drug—the Sumbul, or jumble, or some such absurd name: a musk-root, that brings the dead to life, according to an Englishman's account. I really think these foreign quacks are getting more impudent than ever." (Here he suddenly twisted round in his chair, and fixed his weasel eyes on me.) "Mr. Campbell, did you ever hear of Sumbul?"

The blood rose to my face, and my cheek was turning red, as I replied, indign antly:

"No, Sir, I never did, and I hope never: nor will I endure, even from you, the name of foreign quack."

I am sure the angry tone in which I replied must have given Dr. Tillmann, for she bent down to the parrot, and I could see the color rise to her cheek.

Nothing could move the Doctor. "Oh, I only asked," he said. "No offense; but I know young men have a fine sense of the dignities. The third house-surgeon before you was mad about mesmerism, and was angry with me for ridiculing it. We had high words about it, down to the government, and his name was struck off the staff. Take a seat while I go into the next room and put on my other coat. I will then go with you to the wards."

All this time the insolent old disciplinarian had kept me standing, as if I had been a servant.

I bowed, and took a seat. I was too proud to plead fatigue, and so escape the odious duty imposed upon me by this narrow-minded fool of a Tyrtarchegrine. I had not dared to tell him that the letter he had questioned me about, though not inserted by me, was duly authenticated, and that a packet had been sent to the Journal by some imprudent and officious friend. It recorded some convincing proofs of the efficacy of the Persian remedy mentioned.

As the inner door closed on the Doctor, Olga's pale anxious face turned round toward me with a half-sorrowful reproachful look. I had offended her, and to accord me. I advanced toward her and raised her hand to my lips.

"Dear Dr. Campbell," she said, "I thank you from my heart for bearing with my father's harsh caprices. I know how hard it is for your high spirit to endure these rebukes. I fear there is danger; do tell me if it is true. I know you would not tell my father."

"Dear Olga," "this pestilence is not the worst danger we have to encounter. We hear this morning from the police that a report is in full circulation, a belief spreading among the peasants that we are poisoning the patients, and that they threaten to attack the hospital. On my way home yesterday I have written to the citadel to ask for a guard of soldiers. Olga, if danger comes—"

"I shall share it," cried she, "here is my father!" And she turned to talk to the parrot.

In the evening of the same day, entering the room occupied by the third year I was billed with a duty, as I arrived, and the porter of the hospital, Alexis, a good-natured thick-set fellow with an enormous head and cropped hair, ran to place me a seat in the centre of the assembly. The students gathered round me. The scape-grace of the hospital, Ivan Petrovitch Kalthofer, was the most ready. I was sure, who had been rash enough to send that letter about the new drug to the Journal de St. Petersburg.

Ivan, on hearing me laughingly ask him, put my arm. "Why, you rascal," said I, "it was you, then, who sent that letter to the Journal? It'll be the ruin of you."

Ivan, not the least disturbed, went on with a blustering speech about me and the new remedy. He was a little bright-eyed man, with pearl-buttoned gaiters and a white paletot.

At the end of the harangue, the drug, resembling a greenish root bruised together, was passed round among the students. Every one pinched a bit of and tasted it.

The noise of the door opening startled us. We looked round; it was Dr. Tillmann.

"So this is how my students spend their time," said the stern old man, "plotting mutiny, and proposing schemes that subvert all discipline! Away with this hypocrite to the wards!" Ivan, after his your denial of this morning, I am surprised at your want of ingenuousness. There, no outbreak! I am accustomed to the violent and fluctuations of youth."

The Doctor swept out of the room and slammed the door.

Next day the symptoms of subvenescence among the serfs became alarming. Many patients, who were stopped on their way to the hospital, the patients were taken out, the vehicles were bro' n up and the occupants left to perish where the ones turned loose. In the great hay-market only the hospital immense crowds assembled, shouting at the great entrance: "Let all those murderers the doctors!" The hay and wood sellers transacted no business, the quass and beer shops were unfrequented; even the tea and milk had, I observed, but few customers. None of the richer classes were seen; the people seemed determined to mischief. Such was the state of the public mind.

Once, and once only, as we passed one of the large windows in the first ward, I could not help detecting Dr. Tillmann's attention to those onlooking symptoms; but all the answer the Doctor would deign to give was:

"Our peasants are stupid pigs, but they will not dare to lift a finger against the Petro-Paulovsky Hospital. No! They would as soon set fire to the Cathedral. What could possibly be their motive? This fire will soon burn itself out." He would not discuss the matter with me, and we went round the beds with the students.

Having an hour or so to myself before the night-patients arrived, and there being now no signs of any more dangerous concourse in the hay-market, I stole to my own quiet room at the left wing of the hospital, near the anatomical museum, to complete my chemical experiments on the musk-root, before communicating my discovery to the chief physicians in London and Paris.

It was a beautiful April evening; the full moon shining through my window upon my retort, and my glass vials and scales gave the room the look of an alchemist's chamber, for its beams fell in squares, and lines, and wavering glimmers, on my open books, and my sancers of tests and acids. The white wall of the hospital garden below glanced as if it were solid silver. I was absorbed in the order of investigation, and had just put a few drops brane of the root with sulphuric acid, and it turned an intense purple. I was more and more certain now that new discovery was one of importance to the scientific world—one that would bring me fame and fortune. But how was I, an unknown man, kept in obscurity by a person superior, to make the discovery public? My proofs would have no weight in the eyes of prejudiced men disliking a novelty which superseded the remedies of their youth. I was not enthusiast enough to believe I had found a panacea, but I was sure that I had found a reliable aid to the cholera-fiend.

Pellican burst into the room with something in a tea-cup.

"Hurrah, Campbell!" he cried; "I've distilled the stuff as you wished me, and here it is. Rexnich and I have been at it ever since the last case of collapse was put into his bath."

In rushed Rexnich (an enthusiastic Saxon-haired Germon); two others, too. He had treated his solution with lime and muriate of soda, and the result had been a sediment consisting of gum, starch, and sugar. Another test I proposed we were seated, our three heads together, examining the precipitate with the true ardor of philanthropic discoverers.

We all laughed at Pellican. He was one of those quiet amiable dreamers, too negative in quality for any one to dislike. But Pellican was my great crony. He was a native of Russia, an impulsive, warm-hearted fellow, as eager at study as at pleasure, our best surgeon, our best billiard-player. One moment you saw him immersed in the laboratory, and next moment you would find him shouting and singing among a set of mad-players, and looming out of clouds of circling smoke.

We were well into our work, when, to my infinite chagrin, the door burst open, and in burst eight or ten medical students. There were Hungarians, Danes, Prussians, Americans — noisy, reckless, good-natured fellows, many varieties of costume. One of them, who had, perhaps, taken a little too much wine (in his laudable anxiety to escape the cholera), was acting on a concertina a fanciful selection of airs from the répertoire of the solitary Russian composer, Glinka.

"Here hospital. On my honor as usual!" cried Kalthofer, a Livonian.

"They'll kill themselves!" cried a young Prussian; "I know them well. Come, Pellican, make a second table at whist, here's Maslovitch and Holt man been cleaning us all out."

Pellican, always, had his good resolutions forgotten in a moment. He drew a pack of cards from his pocket, flapped them with a practiced hand, and made an arch over his head, and caught them as cleverly as a clever juggler.

"Not quite so much noise, old fellows!" said I "remember this is a terrible time, and we have our hands full. Besides, I have an hour's writing to do before I go round the wards. Come, troop! Or, if you must stay with the gestures of a dwarf or collecting his flock.

I was left alone with the students, who, though fresh students arrived, leading Alexis between them; he was pale, his coat was torn, he had a black eye, and his nose was bleeding.

"Hallo, young Hydrocephalus," said Pellican, "what's this? Look at him!"

"It's all your fault, you Alexis," said his conductors, thumping him on the back.

"They call me a spy," groaned Alexis.

"Who did it?" said I.

"Who? why the black people in the market-place. They took away the letters cart from me, and they broke my arm, and would have thrown me into the canal if one of them, a coachman, hadn't said he would be beat me to death. They had head to the poisoning doctors years ago, and they'll only thank us for killing him."

"Ah, you rascal!" cried Pellican, laughing unfeelingly till he grew quite red. "Come along, Alexis, and have a schnapps, and tell us the whole story. Come, Alexis, you're busy. Come along, mes garçons; I say you must. I've got some news for you. Look at Campbell!"

The students in the passage huddled back into the doorway, their faces looming through blue rings of smoke.

"Campbell in love!"

"In love?" they all broke out, like the Greek chorus.

"Yes, in love—in love with old Tillmann's daughter—but he has no chance. She smiles at me when never looks at him."

I rushed at my tormentor in a pretended rage; there was a shout of laughter, and the door closed on the noisy crew in the darkening flourish.

An hour afterward I entered Dr. Tillmann's room. Olga was not there, but there was her book and the new air in it to mark the place. The Doctor was at his desk, the paper on which was strongly illuminated by the yellow light thrown upon it by the glow of an Argand lamp, over the glass of which was placed a circular green shade. Half in light and half in shadow, just beyond the lamp, stood three glass jars containing specimens of enormous tarantulas and centipedes.

The Doctor looked as if I entered, and in the coldest manner possible acknowledged my presence.

I mentioned the report of Alexis, and the possibility of the hospital being attacked during the night. I requested to be allowed to send to the citadel for a company of the Preobrajensky regiment.

"How long, Sir, am I to be troubled with these absurd fears?" demanded the Doctor, suddenly. "Is it not enough that you deceive me, mock me, encourage your fellow-students to mutiny and insubordination? No, Sir, I will have no soldiers to guard the Petro-Paulovsky Hospital. I have seen too much of our peasantry to fear them."

"You do me a great injustice, Dr. Tillmann," I replied, "and but for one reason that I have I would not remain another day under your direction."

The Doctor's eyes turned with a look over one of the glass jars and shook it before me. "There is no reptile here," he said, "so full of poison as them art. But I don't think I have ever known that you have dared to administer to the patients of the Emperor's hospital your infamous drug?" No wonder the ignorant peasantry accuse us of poisoning the sick. I understand, Sir, also, your insolent allusion to my daughter: but be sure, Sir, she shall never become the wife of a beggarly adventurer. You see this letter" (here he pointed to a letter on the table); "it contains an order for your instant dismissal from the staff of the hospital. No words, Sir. Good-night! We shall see tomorrow who is master in this place."

I bowed and retired. I was paralyzed by Dr. Tillmann's threats. A cruel baud seemed snatching me from Olga, and hurling me into an abyss of obscurity, penury, and despair. When I was on the verge, too, of fame, happiness, and a great discovery!

Still I was young and persevering. I might still set myself right with the minister, obtain some fresh appointment, become still more near and win Olga. One thing I determined. I would send (on my own responsibility) for soldiers, so imminent seemed to me the danger in which I stood at the hospital. I wrote a hasty note to General Mouravieff, then in command of the citadel, seat it by Alexis, and remained in for the night.

My room was at so great a distance from the entrance, and was approached by so many long hurtrances, and no groans of the populace could reach me there, no shuffling sound of feet at the heavens the bodies to the dead-house distributed me. I ordered the main entrance of the building to be strictly barred before I went to my room. It was now on o'clock. I sat down at the candle, and, without undressing, threw myself on my bed and fell fast asleep.

I suppose I had been three hours when a roaring noise from the market-place awoke me. I sat up and listened. It was a deep surging sound, such as you may hear afar from the sea when a storm is growing. It was interrupted every now and then by a burst of shouts and an occasional scream.

Pellican rushed in to my room, followed by Maslovitch and a young English student.

"Quick! quick!" cried Campbell, "the peasants are attacking the doors, and threatening to kill every poisoning doctor they find."

"Pellican, go out the back way and try and bring some soldiers. Go to the main guard at the Winter Palace. I am afraid Alexis has turned traitor."

"No, Campbell," replied Pellican. "I don't go while there is danger. I stop with you. Dut comes, we must keep the door against them. Maslovitch, run through the wards and rouse all the fellows!"

Pellican and I hurried to the great entrance, against which some forty axes could be now heard ringing. We had not got down more than the lower corridor of the enormous building when a tremendous splintering crash, and a howl as of so many wolves, told us that the door was down. Every moment the roar of voices grew louder. We had reached the last passage leading to the great hall, when the door which ran to the left-hand side of the hall was burst in.

Save my father, save my father, Mr. Campbell!" cried Olga, wringing her hands. He tore himself from me and has gone among them."

I kissed her forehead, and, placing her in the arms of one of the nurses, ran with Pellican down the long flight of steps that led into the hall.

These were forty or fifty great bearded peasants standing in a group in the hall-broken down the door axes and shouting, as they faced an old porter and Dr. Tillmann with drawn swords.

"Dogs! murderers! pigs!" cried the infuriated old donkey; "advance one step further to defile the hospital the Emperor founded and you die. Back, you hogs!"

As he spoke he advanced and struck at the leading insurgents. The leaders fell back before the flashing ingorants. The leaders fell back before the flashing of the sword, and a rough butcher's man behind, his hands still red from the slaughter-house, struck him a blow with a cleaver on the arm, which sent it down from a pole-axe. By this time I and Pellican were surrounded by some twenty or thirty students, porters, and attendants, armed with bludgeons and sword-sticks. We bore down to the rescue, and driving the poor wretches back into the corridor, filled the hall in a minute. We instantly carried off the body of the wounded Doctor into the museum, which opened to the left of the hall, and as the chief entrance to the main wards and to the Doctor's apartments by though that room we agreed to make our first place of retreat, barricaded the door with chairs, forms, stools, and desks.

Fortunately our assailants, being chiefly bent on our murder, contented themselves for the present with attacking this entrance, and did not proceed, as they might have done, to seek the hospital and carry off the patients. Every minute's respite we obtained gave us hope of the arrival of the soldiers. It was a dark night, but by the light of the torches that some of the peasants carried we could see the seething mass of greasy black-bearded faces rolling and billowing under the window.

Our scheme of defense was soon carried out. The Doctor, who had received a superficial wound, was placed on a bed in a side-room under the care of Maslovitch, who was not of a combative nature.

When I went to see him and prescribe remedies I found Olga already at his side. She gave me a look of unspeakable gratitude, and held her hand out for me to kiss.

"Are we in danger?" she asked, in a low voice.

"We are in some danger, Olga, but Heaven will protect us. Pray for us!"

When I returned I found that Pellican had arranged his forces with great strategic skill up in the two iron galleries on either side of the barricaded door of the museum. We resolved to defend the door by moving bars of spirits and the heavy bones of skeletons upon every assailant that dared show his face over the threshold.

"Not a man must throw a bottle till I give the signal," cried Pellican from the second balcony, waving a large glass jar. "When I cry Academe! Harnisch throws; then the rest in turns. We must be cool, or we shall be dead men before the morning. All I wish is, that every glass was full of vitriol: then we'd mark the rascals. Never mind what wounds you inflict, for if we can only keep a whole side till the soldiers come the fellows will return to us to be cured."

There came a rush against the barricade, a crash of axes, and with shouts of "Give us up our children!" "Give us up our brothers!" "Tear the prisoners to pieces!" the crowd heaved down the door and rushed in, clambering over the shattered defenses.

Four or five of the more daring broke in pell-mell, and astonished to see no enemy drawn up to receive them, they paused for an instant to wait for their companions.

Pellican gave the word, and down came a shower of glass jars, thigh-bones, pestles and mortars, and other extremely missiles. Two of the assailants fell stunned; the others, bleeding and frightened, scrambled back into the hall.

Three times the assault was resumed, and three times our splintering rain of horrible pickles drove the serfs back, staggering, amazed, and wounded.

"Never mind," they cried from the hall; "wait till the morning; then we will kill every doctor in the hospital, and throw you all into the river."

The fourth assault was more furious than the three previous attacks. Reinforced by hundreds of maddened greasy-beards, the peasants rushed in in a solid phalanx, and, braving all our missiles, threatened to storm the staircase leading to the gallery by spite of all we could do. But at the moment a discharge of mouldery wax heard, and a mere handful of soldiers, pouring in a volley at the mob, divided through the hall with fixed bayonets, and were soon masters of the field. In five minutes more there was not an insurgent in the building, and we had again barricaded the main entrance and placed a guard there. It was Alexis who had brought the soldiers by a back-garden entrance of which the mob was ignorant.

"So far so good, Campbell," said Pellican, patting Alexis on the back. "Well done, old Cephalus! But it will still go hard with us at daybreak if we do not get further help. This time I will go."

I remonstrated with the brave fellow, but all in vain. In a few minutes Pellican had put on the greasy leather collars of Alexis, his heavy fishing-boots, and his lamb's-wool cap, and given him his dress. He pressed my hand as I went with him to the garden door.

"Good-by, Campbell!" he said. "If I don't come back be sure the dogs have got me; don't waste regrets on me; I am of no use to any one; only let my father know that I perished in trying to do some good. Adieu!" And he was lost in the darkness.

What a night that was! Spent partly with Olga watching the broken sleep of her father, who kept tossing in a fever of pain; partly in supplying the soldiers and students with refreshments; partly in reassuring the sick men in the ward, who expressed perfect reliance in our good faith, and who, as they died, died blessing us.

There was no further attack that night, but every now and then a threatening roar broke forth from our cruel besiegers. To-morrow, if no aid came, must bring death to us all. Oh! to think that inconceivable agony I watched the hands of the clock, from hour to hour, and still there came no tidings of Pellican, no sign of troops!

As the first curdling gray streaked the sky I left the roof where I had been watching, and went to Olga. She was not asleep, but she was on her knees. I kneeled beside her. "Dearest," I said, "our last on earth may be very short. Soon the madmen will soon advance to the attack. Tell me that you love me?"

She made no answer, but she placed her hand in mine, and we kneeled hand in hand in that solemn betrothal.

Already the axes were ringing at our barricade, when a distant shout spread and widened till it ran through the vast multitude. The axes ceased their blows, the great mob rolled and heaved and divided, leaving a road through the centre of the murderous place. There was a shatter of red and yellow rags, a glitter of spear-heads in the first sunlight, and an open carriage drawn by four gray horses dashed to the door. It was a single figure alone: the lancers, at his order, had retired into the outer street. He was in a plain military cloak, and wore no arms behind, but no star or order. The barricades of hay wagons fell away as he approached. He prayed and crossed himself before the sacred picture of the door, then stood up in the carriage and addressed the people. He was so near that we could hear his words.

"My children," he said, in his imperial manner, "you are misled. These good men, these good doctors, venture their lives for your good. Not a finger shall be laid upon them. This pestilence is sent from Heaven to punish some of our national sins. Kneel down and pray to God to remove the scourge, and to forgive you!"

I shall never again behold such a sight. In a moment the multitude, lately so fierce and so terrifying for blood, fell upon their knees, and every head was bowed. When they rose they slunk away like so many criminals, and some fifty of them surrendered themselves without a murmur to the lancers, who came riding slowly among them. As I was still watching the extraordinary scene Alexis pulled me by the arm, and up the steps rushed Pellican, and seized me by the hand.

"Hurrah, Campbell! Did not I manage it pretty well? I drove to the citadel when I left you last night, and, finding the old brute of a general would not believe my story, or send me any more troops, I took a carriage and three horses and rattled off to Sarskoi Selso, where, by the luck as in the world, one of the chamberlains whom I knew had arrived with a courier, to whom the riot had already been telegraphed, and now he's coming to see the hospital. Get along and meet him. Hurrah, Campbell, and all's well in our fortunes!"

I went to receive the Emperor, who was most gracious. He thanked us for our conduct during the night, and went through the wards. The only thing that puzzled him was Alexis, whom, in Pellican's dress, he took at first for one of the medical staff. Next day the minister wrote to me, by command of Nicholas, constituting me a codjutor of Dr. Tillmann, who, however, sank from his injuries within the week, and died soon after; but not before he had joined mine and Olga's hands, and begged my forgiveness.

Pellican married Miss Olga; nor was I long chief physician to the Petro-Paulovsky Hospital, you may be sure, before I made Ivan Pellican the house surgeon.

THE WORDS OF SCHNEIDER.*

ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, JUNE, 1864.

WE had crossed the Rappahannock,
A hundred thousand strong,
We had fought and flanked the foe, boys,
And sent him to his den;
And of all who marched or skirmish'd,
Of all who worked or fought,
Not one of the living or the dead
That I left behind was forgot.

Than he now sleeping yonder,
Who challenged the foe at bay,
And stormed the rebel trench and the hill,
And failed to win the day.

He was nothing but a stripling,
And, boys, I knew him well:
And they told his friends who enlisted them,
I was near him when he fell.
As the men were getting ready,
With earnest voice he said,
"I am first the works to enter,
I lead, and am not led."
The line moved swift onward,
And SCHNEIDER led the way:
He did not seem the roaring gunn—
He talked with them by day!

His father lives over the ocean;
He'd one son dead before,
And th' shipping wrote the good old man
That this one was no more.
And the boy, I watched beside him,
With gibberish in his head,
But the words that passed his closing lips
Ring out for you and me:
I tried to do my duty
To my country and my God."
Oh men at home, he, but a boy,
For you this made he die.

More than this, my friends, he uttered;
It sounded like a psalm
And th' angel watching in the tent
Made every thing be calm.
"Now, dear chaplain," said the hero,
My friends will want to know
How I died; so tell 'em I have gone,
And was content to go;
And, chaplain, tell my comrades,
If the war should soon be drag,
I said to you, I say to them,

SEAND BY THE DEAD OLD FLAG!"

Will you hear me further, comrades,
Or have you heard enough?
No matter, Tom, the tears have come
From some of sterner stuff.
He'd a brother in the navy,
As brave, as true as he,
On the ocean fighting rebel crews
To make the ocean free.
"Now, chaplain, tell my brother,
Though the ocean roll between,
To closely cling to the dear old flag,
To JESUS AND HIS CROSS!"

Hearken to me still, my comrades:
Sometimes there comes to me
A dream of the happy future years,
And what is then to be:
Though it seems to mock me slowly,
God's day is drawing near,
When the rebel chiefs before th' world
Shall stand the judgment here.
This boy who died for freedom,
Though a private—nothing more—
Shall live in contrast with the men
That mankind will abhor!

Oh, ye nun who ne'er have spoken
A word for such as he,
Who are pledged to pray we in the battle
Die that you may be free—
And ye whom Lord has been taken,
And laid you know not where,
Let the words of this hero wake you
To watching and to prayer:
I have tried to do my duty
To my country and my God!—
O men, O Christians, rise and tread
The way this hero trod!

* Young Schneider, son of an American missionary in Syria, who fell in an assault on the enemy's works, June 15, 1864, and died a few days afterward. His words are quoted almost verbatim.

OUR ECONOMICAL SOIREE.

ECONOMY in household expenses has come to be the leading idea of terrestrial existence in the minds of Mrs. Dobb and myself. We calculate closely. We never did before since we were married that I can remember. But when butter costs at the rate of five cents a dab, and every thing else in proportion, housekeeping expenses become a serious matter.

I was thinking upon the announcement that there was a rise of three cents the pound on veal since the day before—musing and eating veal, at the breakfast-table, when Mrs. Dobb spoke:

"James, did you know to-day was Sallie's birthday?"

"Is it?" said I. "How old is she now?"

"She is six years old, and I have promised to hold a little party for her in the evening."

"Susan, will it cost any thing?"

"Why, but a trifle, James. Besides, Sallie has never had a birthday party, you know."

Sallie should not have her birthdays come so often, wife, in such times as these. How long is it since I bought her a self-operating locomotive for a birthday present?"

"That was Susie, my dear. It's perfectly distressing to me the way you do mix those children up."

"But what will this soirée cost us, Susan? You are forever promising economy at me, and I'd like you to practice it a little, and let me preach. It's more fun to preach. I like to preach, first-rate."

"Oh! there will have to be some nuts and apples bought."

"And some candy of course?"

"No—"

"What! A baby party, and no candy?"

"If you won't interrupt me at every word, James, I'll tell you. I have bought two quarts of molasses, and I am going to make the candy myself. Now there's one of my economical shifts. I never get candy at the store."

"But what a dashby job, Susan! Stretching candy sticks is a back-breaking up to."

"You didn't mind it when you were a young man, Mr. Dobb. Have you forgotten the candy parties we used to have at our house when I was a girl, James? Such glorious times as we used to have in that old kitchen? Why, it was at one of those candy parties that you paid me the first compliment I ever received from you."

"Ah! what was that?"

"You said I had the sweetest girl in the room."

"That was because you were daubed all over with molasses, my dear—as you'll be to-night again."

"I should think, James, that it would be a pleasure to you to revive, here in the city, the recollections of those days in the farm-house. Don't you remember those big hooks in the ceiling of the kitchen that you threw a great coil of candy over to stretch it by, and how Mary Howard helped you?"

"Ah, those were happy days!" I said, musingly, sipping my coffee.

"You enjoyed candy-making then, James."

"Yes, I was thinking of the present and economy. "I enjoyed a great many foolish things when I was young and innocent—courting, for instance."

"Well, I haven't lost my zest for simple pleasures," said Mrs. D., with enthusiasm. "I think it will be a real pleasure to make the candy. I had a thousand times rather make it than buy it."

"Which accounts for one of your economical shifts this time, my dear," my credit for. Eh, my dear?"

Mrs. Dobb looked daggers at me.

"Well, Susan, let's see what it will cost. What's molasses the pound now?"

"I paid sixty cents for two quarts."

"And apples?"

"A peck will supply the party; that will be sixty cents more."

"And say a dollar and a half for nuts. That makes three dollars and seventy cents. It will be a very economical party."

"I should say it would, Mr. Dobb."

"Can I, papa?" said Sallie, looking up at me, with her great blue eyes full of fun.

"Can you what, darling? Have the parlor? Why, of course you can, you little blessing!" And I helped her to another spoonful of gravy, out of the full fondness of a father's heart.

"Won't it be bully, Sis?" cried Fred from his side of the table.

How that boy does pick up the slang of this vicious age is astonishing! It's no use reproving him for it. "Fred will be boys," as a friend of mine once remarked when he sat down on a bent pin that his darling son had placed in his chair in a frolicsome moment.

"What a good papa he is!" whispered Sallie to her sister, across the table.

"Oh, he's gay!" slanged Fred.

I gave Sallie some more gravy.

"Do you like your papa?" put in Nellie.

"I like every thing good, dear. Why do you ask?"

"Because we're going to have all the girls kiss you to-night."

"They won't be big enough, Nell—not half. I prefer big girls to little ones."

"James!" said Mrs. Dobb, reprovingly.

"Oh, Mary Ann Smith is a great big girl!" said Nell, "and Miss Lord has been taken to the ground."

"Do they? That's encouraging. Is Mary Ann coming?"

"Yes; and two other big girls. They write compositions."

"Compositions! They must be getting very old."

Compositions are such a proof of maturity among these little bodies! Did you ever notice it?

"Bring up the nuts when you come to dinner, James," was my wife's parting injunction.

"All right, my dear."

I was detained down-town that afternoon later than usual, and when I came home in the evening I found the four little Dobbs sitting in solemn state in the parlor, awaiting the coming of the guests.

Shortly after the door-bell rang, and the children were in a high state of commotion. Sallie jumped down from the sofa and made a dash for the door, but suddenly recollecting herself, returned to her perch and smoothed her hands over her apron.

Dodger ushered into the parlor a string of seven boys of assorted sizes, who ranged themselves against the wall without saying a word. But there was any amount of subdued giggling among them.

The next arrival was a cluster of little girls, looking as sweet as June roses.

I went out to tea, and when I looked in again the room was filled with the neighbors' progeny, including Mary Ann Smith and the other big girls.

Such a staid conclave I never saw before in my life. There they all sat, as bashful as mice, never uttering a loud word, and scarcely daring to look each other in the face. It was vastly amusing to me to observe the conventional awe under which those boys, especially, labored; the very boys that had been saluting each other roughly in the street an hour before, perhaps pulling each other's hair. As sedate as deacons now.

The ice was broken in this way:

One of the big girls, by way of opening the ball, said to a youngster of some eight summers, named Joey Perry,

"It's a pleasant evening, Mr. Perry."

"Oh, how are you, Mister Perry?" burst forth our Fred, derisively, at the top of his voice.

And then such a broadside of laughter! In less time than it takes me to write it the youngsters were in a hubbub as noisy as the meeting had before been astute.

They played "Post-office," and "Cedar Swamp," and "Forfeits," and all that sort of games, whose principal feature is an abundance of kissing. I went into my study and began writing. The merry bursts of laughter came echoing to my ears, but they did not disturb me. I am a fond father.

One of the big girls came into my sugget presently, and approaching me on my feet, which she kneeled, pouting up at me a pair of ripe red lips.

"Who's this?" said I, laying down my pen.

"Can't you guess?" said Fred from the doorway, which was thronged with giggling little spectators. "She wants you to kiss her."

"Ah! that's it. My memory suddenly recalled the old-time game. "How many can I have?"

"Twenty!" "Thirty!" "A hundred!" cried a dozen voices.

"Well, I'll take three," said I, "and you may have the rest, Fred."

"Can't do it," slanged that hopeful, backing off.

The young lady struggled after the orthodox manner, handed kisses from quantities of boys to her sage ladies, and the children screamed with delight.

"Hold her, Mr. Dobb!"

"Kiss her, Mr. Dobb!"

"Rub her nose with your whiskers, papa."

That last was from Fred, who had numerous. We left them alone at last. I don't believe in old folks intruding too much on the enjoyment of the young people. They get along a great deal nicer by themselves. So Mrs. Dobb shut the parlor-door and left them alone, while I shut myself up in my study.

About half past nine I went out and found the little guests had gone.

Sallie was missing, but we presently found her on the stairs in the hall crying bitterly.

"Why, what's the matter with my bird?" said I, taking her in my arms.

She was loth to tell, but at last she sobbed out that Mary Ann Smith had snatched, and had in her six years pounded on her little back, in honor of birthday usage, till she was sore all over. Added to which she had had her best pantalette full of her dress and torn it in a shocking manner.

She was soothed and put to bed, and then I went to the parlor.

Oh, spectacle for an economical parent! My statuette of Senator Douglas—only a cast, but a gift from the sculptor—had been dragged out and stood in a corner, and its head broken short off. There was a hole scratch a foot long on the piano, and the music was one hideous daub of molasses candy from first to last. A lamp had been tipped over on the Brussels carpet and left a horrible grease-spot in the middle of the room. And, worst of all, some ambitious youngster had been at my painting, and had made a hole through the canvas and cut a choice landscape—an original Sontag, which I valued highly.

"Susan! Susan!" I cried, "behold the havoc of this economical soirée!"

Mrs. Dobb stood aghast at the spectacle.

"Can you estimate this damage calmly?" I asked. But Mrs. Dobb had no answer for me.

I got out a pencil and a piece of paper, and made a reckoning:

Bebeaded Douglas	$25
Mutilated Sontag	50
Molasses candy and other damages to piano and music	10
Ruined carpet	100

"A total, my dear, of $185."

"I think you are extravagant, James," said my wife. "A little Spalding's glue will put the statue's head in place."

"And you could tie a red ribbon around his neck to hide the crack, couldn't you, dear?" I said, in a tone of intense irony.

"As for the painting, seems to me you might mend it in some way, James, since you make those things yourself."

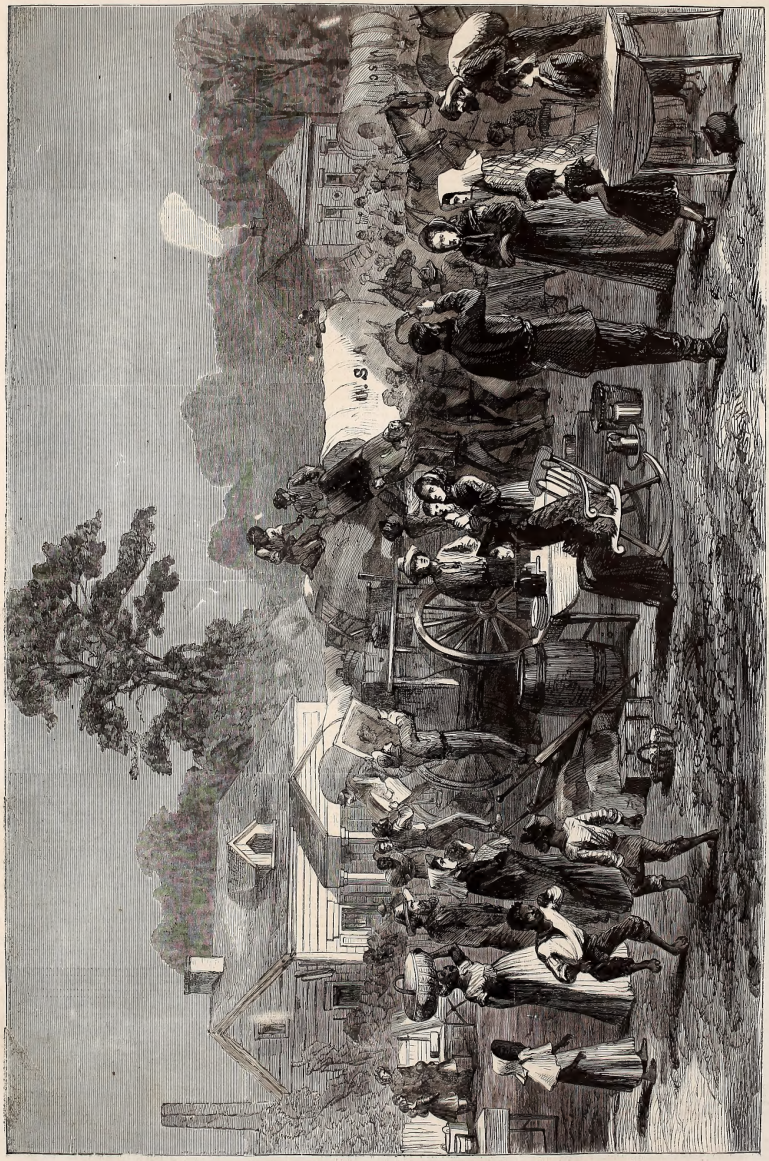
"Those things! That's a wife for an artist!"

"The piano and music I will see what I can do with; and as for the carpet, we can get a rug for the centre of the room, and the spot will never show."

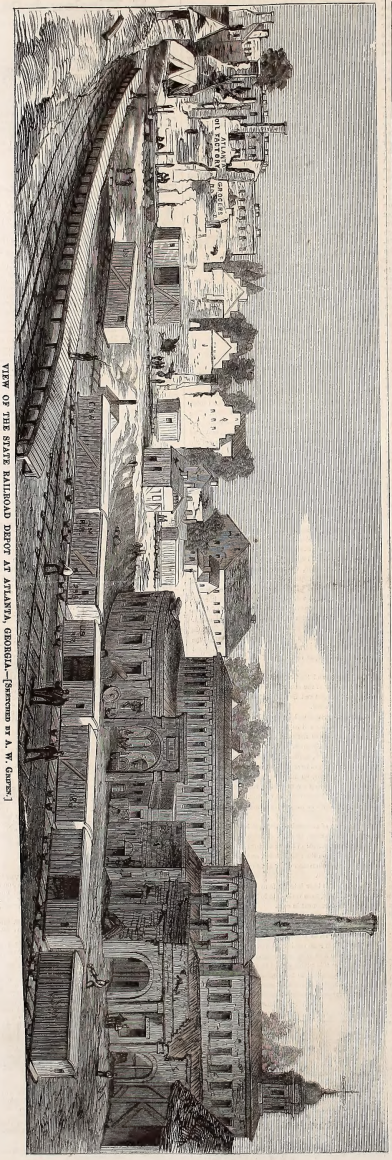
"Another expense, my dear."

"James, I have wanted a rug for that room this long time. For my part, I don't know as I'm very sorry. At least, it can't be helped now; and there are no more birthdays in the family this year."

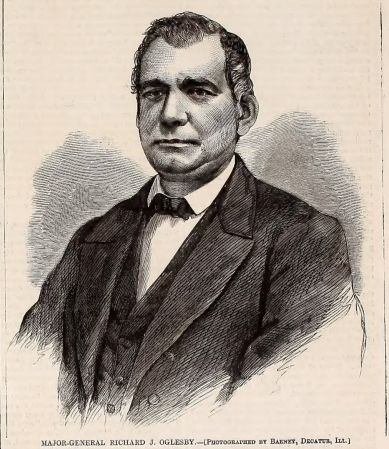
"Let us be thankful for that, then," said I.



REBELS MOVING SOUTH FROM ATLANTA.—Sketched by D. R. Brown.—[See next Page.]



VIEW OF THE STATE RAILROAD DEPOT AT ATLANTA, GEORGIA.—[SKETCHED BY A. W. CAMPBELL.]



MAJOR-GENERAL RICHARD J. OGLESBY.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BARNES, DECATUR, ILL.]

VIEWS IN ATLANTA.

On this page and on page 668 we give two views in ATLANTA. The view on this page represents the State Railroad Dépôt and the surrounding district, showing the effect of SHERMAN'S bombardment previous to the evacuation of the city. The sketch given on page 668 represents the rebels in the act of moving south. When SHERMAN took possession he ordered all the citizens, loyal and disloyal, to leave the city, it being his intention to make Atlanta a strong military post. A truce of ten days was established between the two armies for carrying out the order.

GENERAL R. J. OGLESBY.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL RICHARD J. OGLESBY was a lawyer of distinction in Decatur, Illinois, and a member of the State Senate when the war broke out. At the first signal he raised a regiment (the Eighth Illinois) for the three months' service, and with it was ordered to Cairo, where it formed part of the small force under General PRENTISS. He took an active part in the various minor operations inaugurated against the rebels on the Missouri and Kentucky shores; but it was not until General GRANT began his operations against the great rebel strong-holds on the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers that Colonel Oglesby was enabled to display those native military qualities which made him one of the most admirable, distinguished, and beloved heroes and leaders of our Western army of volunteers. In February, 1862, he marched with his men from Cairo to the Tennessee River; and at the great initial victory of the war—the battle of Fort Donelson—where he commanded a brigade consisting of five regiments of Illinois infantry, two batteries, and a body of cavalry, he stood out prominently as one of the ablest, bravest, and coolest officers of the day, and as one of the most daring and dashing of officers among a body of men that never in the history of the world were surpassed for these qualities. His brigade was in M'Clernand's division, which was posted on our extreme right; and the accounts of the fierce and desperate conflict published at the time showed the splendid and effective work performed by Oglesby's brigade on Thursday, when he first met the rebels and forced them from two positions, until Saturday, when the whole rebel garrison surrendered. Of the second day before Donelson one of the correspondents writes: "I must admit that, riding along our lines on Friday, and witnessing the formidable field-works of the enemy (between five and six miles in extent) which reared themselves every where to the front of us, I feared that the task of reducing them would be, at the best, a matter of considerable time. But cold and hungry, and with garments stiff with frost, the soldiers were still hopeful and firm. The universal sentiment was, as bluff Colonel Oglesby expressed it, 'We can't have to take that fort, and we will take it.' Not that day, but the next, brought forth the glorious fruit of this resolute purpose." For his gallantry on this occasion Colonel Oglesby was commissioned Brigadier-General of Volunteers.

[SKETCHED BY LIEUTENANT GEORGE SLATER.]

On the subsequent advance of Grant's army up the Tennessee River, and as far as Pittsburg Landing, General Oglesby accompanied it with his brigade; and at the great battle of Shiloh, in April, he bore a distinguished part.

But we do not propose to recount all the services of our hero in the eventful summer of 1862.

At the battle and victory of Corinth, in October, General Oglesby was present in command of a division. It was at this memorable action that his military and manly qualities received their highest illustration; and it was here also that his services in the field ended. While in very truth "thick and fury of the battle, "glorious old Dick," as his soldiers called him, was shot through the chest, and was borne from the field in a condition that led to a report of his death—which mistake Mr. Russell has incorporated in his book on the American war. He was carried to his home in Illinois, where he was for nearly a year confined by his wound, which also permanently unfitted him for service.

General Oglesby now the Union candidate for Governor of Illinois, and on the second Tuesday of October will doubtless be elevated to the Chief Magistracy of that gallant and patriotic State.

Mr. "Bull Run" Russell, in the "North and South," gives a lively picture of Colonel Oglesby, "a man of fine manly goodness, simple-hearted, and real. He told me that he had begun life in the utmost obscurity; but that somehow or other he got into a lawsuit often, and then, by hard work every, by mother-wit and industry, notwithstanding a defective education, he had raised himself not only to independence, but to such a position that one thousand men had gathered at his call, and selected one who had never led a company in his life to be their Colonel. In fact, he is an excellent illustrator of the Western school, and made good, homely, telling speeches to his men. "I'm not as good as your Governors in the schools of Paris, nor am I equal to the Russian colonels I met at St. Petersburg,' said he; 'but I know I can do good straight fighting with my boys when I get a chance.'" We may add, that General Oglesby's subsequent career showed that this was no mere empty boast. He did indeed do "good straight fighting" with his boys when he got a chance, which was very soon.

The same writer subsequently describes a gathering of soldiers at Cairo to listen to patriotic speeches: "Oglesby was next summoned, and the tall, gaunt, good-humored old man stepped to the front, and with excellent tact and good sense, dished up in the Buncombe style, told them the time for mere speechifying had passed, joked it had lasted too long; and although it was said there was very little fighting when there was much talking, he believed that much talking was likely to lead to a great deal more fighting than any one desired to see between citizens of the United States of America, except their enemies, who, no doubt, were much better pleased to see Americans fighting each other than to see them engaged in any other employment."

These, though striking and sensible, are certainly hardly fair illustrations of General Oglesby's oratorical style; for the popular speeches he has delivered in Illinois during the present Gubernatorial campaign are not of the excitements of oratory and patriotic eloquence as the times have produced.

THE WINDOWS OF THE SOUL.

Lavater, in his work on Physiognomy, which created so great a sensation throughout Europe toward the end of the last century, makes a remark regarding the hereditary brilliancy of eyes in certain families, which is partly true and partly false. "When any extraordinary vivacity appears in the eyes of the mother," says the Swiss mystic, "there is almost a certainty that these eyes will become hereditary: for the imagination of the mother is delighted with nothing so much as the beauty of her own eyes."

The "extraordinary vivacity" of which Lavater speaks must proceed either from the hereditary qualities of the soul or from the special culture it has received: first in the ordinary world of sense and show, and then in the higher sphere of emotions and ideas. The mother who possesses true nobility of soul can not fail to give her children a portion of the rich inheritance she has derived from her ancestors; and this, no doubt, determines that strong individuality of features and expression by which certain families are characterized. As a general rule, however, far more depends upon the culture which the soul receives from parents and teachers than upon the frame in which it is lodged.

Emerson makes some notable remarks, in his "Conduct of Life," on the marvelous phenomena of the animal being, as it shows itself in the "window of the soul," which are well worthy of study.

"Eyes are bold in their wishes; cunning, longing here and there, far and near. They speak all languages. They wait for no introduction; they are no Englishmen to keep a corner of a room; they respect neither poverty nor riches, neither learning nor power, nor virtue, nor sex, but intrude, and come home, and go through all things, and yet in a moment of time.....The communication by the eye is, in the greater part, not subject to the control of the will. It is the least muscular of activity of nature. We look into the eyes to know if this other form is another self; and the eyes will not lie, but make a faithful answer to the inhabitant in there. The revelations are sometimes terrific. The confession of a low, usurping devil is there made; and the observer shall have to feel the stirring of owls and bats, and horned souls, where he looked for innocence and simplicity."

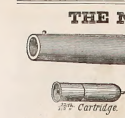
"It is a point of cunning," says Lord Bacon, "to wait upon him with whom you speak with your eye, as the Jesuits do often; for there be many wise men that have secret hearts and transparent countenances; yet this would be done with a demure regard, not with a full countenance, as the Jesuits also do use." As the Jesuits are exceedingly cunning they naturally adopt this demure aspect for the purpose of concealing their own thoughts as closely as possible, while they are all the while trying to read the inmost soul of the person to whom they are talking. This is quite as bad as the reckless, roving expression of the eye which marks the American. The right course is to look the person with whom you are conversing full in the face, showing neither unmanly timidity nor undue boldness. The eye should have a steady look which Lord Bacon calls "a point of cunning" is the usual mark of a Jesuit, but it is not confined to the Jesuits. Indeed, the best book we can encounter a face of this description, where the cunning expression has been produced by other causes.

"The greatest hypocrite I ever met," says Hazlitt, "was a little demure, pretty, modest-looking girl, with eyes timidly cast upon the ground, and an air and an exclamation of the most circumstance that could lead to a suspicion of her true character was a cold, sullen, watery, glazed look about the eyes, which she bent on me as soon as I began to avoid all explanation with yours. I might have spied in their glittering, motionless surface the rocks and quicksands that awaited me. This, however, is only a one-sided view of the affair. What would Mr. Hazlitt have thought of a looking girl" have said about the expression of Hazlitt's own eyes? Had she been able to express her feelings in as free a manner as she might have had as repulsive a picture of him as he has drawn of her. Fatmore tells us that Hazlitt's eyes were dull and heavy, generally with a look of depression, "there was a furtive and, at times, a sinister look about them, as they glanced suspiciously from under their half-closed lids." This was certainly a very unpleasant impression to those that did not know him. And they were seldom directed frankly and fairly upon those of the man with whom you might read in them what was passing in his mind concerning you."

Perhaps we should have remembered the fundamental law which reigns through all physiognomical relations, that like begets like. If your eyes wear habitually suspicious or sinister expression, you may be sure that they will call forth a corresponding look in the eyes of the people with whom you come in contact. On the other hand, if your eyes have an open, frank, and cheerful expression, as if in good-natured sort they were ready to look you down, you will find most people responding to your hearty greeting in the same pleasant cordial dialect. Mirrored back from the eyes of others, the kind exercises over another through the eyes, in imparting whatever passion or feeling predominates at the moment. This is one of the most subtle and mysterious of our dual nature, but it is one to which we shall obtain the key when we have acquired that light given in unfailing measure to those who "really and truly, to "see ourselv as others see us."

Solomon warns us against familiarity with "him than hath an evil eye," for "as he thinketh in his heart, so is he." The double-minded man can not help showing his real nature in the language of his eye. "Eat and drink, saith he to thee, but his heart is not with thee." Singleness of heart is the secret of hospitality if there is no hollowness in the eye. "My eye no sooner fixed upon his," says John Donne, "but through that perspective I could see the inward virtue of his heart." Sympathy would produce a reversion in my breast, and I soon found our hearts beat time to one another." How much of our enjoyment in social intercourse arises from such sympathy is well expressed by Emerson: "Vain and forgotten are all the fine offers and offices of hospitality if there be no holiday in the eye. How many furtive inclinations are betrayed by the eye though dissembled by the lips! A man comes to see if hospitality if there be no holiday

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER



In the latest improvement in Fire-Arms, combining great power and effectiveness, with compactness, durability, and convenience, both for operating and carrying. Is the most effective POCKET REVOLVER in the world.

Is loaded, without removing the cylinder, with CENTRAL FIRE WATER-PROOF METALLIC CARTRIDGE. The Cartridge is cure fire, and will easily ejected after firing. The cylinder never fools. Is but 7 inches extreme length. 33-100th ball, six shot, and weighs but 14 ounces. For sale by the trade.

GEO. A. HICKCOX, 54 Cliff Street, New York.

CERTIFICATE.

I have thoroughly tested the new "National Revolver," and find it an effective weapon, of sure fire and convenient size. At fifty yards I think I could with this pistol kill an enemy six-in. If take pleasure in recommending it as a weapon in every way desirable. In company with Capt. Scott, Provost-Marshal, and other officers, I fired this pistol a large number of times, and not one cartridge failed to explode.

(Signed,) JOHN CHARLESON, Chief of Police, Cairo, Ill.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

The Secretary of the Treasury gives notice that subscriptions will be received for Coupon Treasury Notes, payable three years from Aug. 15th, 1864, with semi-annual interest at the rate of seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum—principal and interest both to be paid in lawful money.

These Notes will be convertible at the option of the holder at maturity, into six per cent. gold-bearing bonds, payable not less than five nor more than twenty years from their date, as the Government may elect. They will be issued in denominations of $50, $100, $500, $1000, and $5000, and all subscriptions must be for fifty dollars or some multiple of fifty dollars.

As the Notes draw interest from August 15, persons making deposits subsequent to that date must pay the interest accrued on the same from date of deposit.

Special Advantages of this Loan.

IT IS A NATIONAL SAVINGS BANK, offering a higher rate of interest than any other, and the best security. Any savings bank which pays its depositors in U. S. Notes considers that it is paying in the best circulating medium of the country, and it can not pay in any thing better, for its own assets are either in Government securities or in notes or bonds payable in Government paper.

Convertible into a Six per cent. 5-20 Gold Bond.

In addition to the very liberal interest on the notes for three years, this privilege of conversion is now worth about three per cent. per annum, for the current rate for 5-20 Bonds is not less than nine per cent. per annum, and before the war the premium on six per cent. U. S. stock was over twenty per cent. It will be seen that the actual profit on this loan, at the present market rate, is not less than ten per cent. per annum.

Its Exemption from State or Municipal Taxation.

But aside from all the advantages we have enumerated, a special Act of Congress exempts all Bonds and Treasury Notes from local taxation. On the average, this exemption is worth about two per cent. per annum, according to the rate of taxation in various parts of the country.

It is believed that no securities offer so great inducements to lenders as those issued by the Government. In all other forms of indebtedness, the faith or ability of private parties, or stock companies, or separate communities, only, is pledged for payment, while the whole property of the country is held to secure the discharge of all the obligations of the United States.

Up to the 15th of September, the subscriptions to this loan amounted to over $40,000,000.

SUBSCRIPTIONS WILL BE RECEIVED by the Treasurer of the United States, at Washington, the several Assistant Treasurers and designated Depositaries, and by all National Banks which are depositaries of public money, and

ALL RESPECTABLE BANKS AND BANKERS throughout the country will give further information and AFFORD EVERY FACILITY TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical
PINEAPPLE CIDER,
IS A PREVENTIVE OF SICKNESS.—The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years convinces him that it is time the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes, old and young. It is not a cure for the Doctor, but a remedy never to the public. One quart bottle will last a well person one week, unless a case of doctoring; but nevertheless it will save millions from being sick. It is not better to pay two or three dollars to keep from sick than to pay from two to twenty dollars to doctor him and as much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? To prevent sickness we so believe. Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a number of cups of tea and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning; and the same before you retire at night. It will keep the stomach straight and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has made a study of the Medical Profession, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds of flesh in one month, at the time he was taking those pills as above directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved a successful preventive remedy in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Medicated Cider constantly for two years, and has not been sick one day during that time.
Price $2 per bottle, or $1 per pint. For sale every where. All orders should be addressed to "Four years of misrule by a corrupt party have brought our country to the very verge of ruin. . . . The inevitable result of Mr. LINCOLN'S re-election must be the utter disintegration of our whole political and social system."—Speech of Attorney BELMONT, Chairman of the Democratic National Committee, at the Chicago Convention, August 29, 1864.

"The equipage at Newport which throws all others into the shade is that of Mr. BELMONT, Chairman of the Democratic National Committee. It consists of a low barouche driven by four elegant, fiery thoroughbreds, with postillions mounted on the left or near [illegible] of each pair. Two footmen in extreme livery are suspended from a high seat on the back of the carriage. The men are peculiarly well formed, having been selected and trained in Europe with especial reference to their build and the size of their calves; their livery is imported at a cost of $1000 a suit. The horses are valued at $25,000, the carriage at $5000, and the harness and other trappings at $3000. The stables of the Democratic Chairman are said to contain some forty horses, valued at from $1000 to $5000 each."—Letter from Newport, in the New York Evening Post, August 24, 1864.

American Watches.
The high premium on gold, and the increased rate of duty on watches, have greatly enhanced the cost of those of foreign manufacture, and it is now impossible to purchase a good watch, of English or Swiss make, except at a very extravagant price. For the same reason, the foreign watch-makers, many of the best workmen assess and Lepines which flood the country, have nearly risen to the price at which the American Watch Company furnish their well-known "Wm. Ellery" watch—a watch of the most substantial manufacture, and an accurate and durable time-keeper.
The higher-priced watches are relatively still cheaper. We have advanced the prices of our finer movements but about 25 per cent. since the war began, while foreign watches of the same grade cost three times their ante-war prices.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1864.

"PEACE."

THAT the "peace" section of the Democratic party, the men whose friends are in arms against the government, intend to help their friends with arms, if they can, is a secret to nobody. That "peace" means riot, massacre, and war, just as "Conservatism" means anarchy, the experience of the last year has fully proved. The existence of associations the purpose of which is to resist the result of the election if opportunity offers, is beyond question. The Society of Knights of the Golden Circle, and all the other forms of conspiracy, are matters of public knowledge. All these associations are manned and managed by members of the Chicago party. All the threats of resisting the election now prevent, as they did four years ago, from members of the Chicago party. The Convention of that party resolves that "the direct interference of the military authority of the United States, in the approaching election has been unprecedented, and resisted with all the means and power under our control." All the speakers at the MACPEDNELTON Ratification Meeting in New York repeated this threat; and the Democratic Union Association resolved the other evening, "that a Presidential election effected through Maryland by a suppression of the press, and, by consequence, of the ballot-box, would be an act of revolutionary violence, not binding upon the people of the United States, under the Constitution, or in morals, or in conscience."

The Chicago party is the one under whose domination free speech and a free press and ballot have always been suppressed in half the country, and constantly threatened in the other. Its whole policy has been the maintenance of slavery, with which free speech and all other Republican and Democratic institutions are incompatible. Therefore nobody imagines that the Chicago party, as such, is any more solicitous for free speech now than ever before. But it is desperate. Even the men of the late Democratic party have left it just in the degree that it deserted its own principles. Its remainder is without a solitary leader of real power. It is in the hands of desperate demagogues and low neophytes. It is reduced to a minority, who still clutch the organization and call themselves by the old name. But the followers of CLEMENTIO VALLANDIGHAM, ROBERT C. WINTHROP, and FERNANDO WOOD, are not the great triumphant Democratic party of JEFFERSON, MADISON, and JACKSON.

The resolutions of which we are speaking are the formal announcement that, if the Democratic managers of the party can Mexicanize this country, they certainly will. For what is the military interference against which they protest, and which they declare to be just occasion of armed resistance? It is simply the care taken by the United States authorities that rebels shall not vote. It is the care taken that the Government shall not be put into the hands of JEFFERSON DAVIS and his coadjutors. Is it an arbitrary assumption of power to prevent traitors from voting? Is it a crime for which the Government may be justly overthrown that it forbids the bitterest enemies of the Government from controlling it? The Chicago party platform that "HARRY GILMORE" shall vote in Maryland. He is an open armed enemy of the United States; but he is a voter, says the Chicago doctrine, by the law of Maryland. The intention is plain. The military power of the rebellion being now on the way to destruction, the Chicago party hopes to restore the vigor of treason by giving to it civil ascendency.

Meanwhile GOVERNOR ANDREW JOHNSON, of Tennessee, has issued his proclamation, by which all free white men, citizens and soldiers, twenty-one years of age, citizens of the United States, and for six months before the election citizens of the State of Tennessee, duly registered, and who take the most stringent oath of fidelity to the United States Government, are admitted to vote, and all others are prohibited to vote or hold office.

Is this tyranny? We ask every citizen and soldier in the land, Is it a destruction of our liberties that neither JEFFERSON DAVIS nor ALEXANDER STEPHENS, nor BENJAMIN, nor WIGFALL, nor ROBERT LEE, nor HOOD, are to be allowed to vote for President until they shall have taken an oath of fidelity to the Union and Government? The Chicago party declares that it is. The Chicago party denounce such conduct as the destruction of liberty; and the Chicago party proclaims that such conduct justifies revolution.

And these are "Conservatives!" They went to Charleston four years ago, and said that if they could not rule they would ruin. They have been trying to do it ever since. By arms in the South and by arts in the North they have endeavored to destroy the Government. Pleading a sensitive regard for the Constitution, they have been in open sympathy with those who are warring upon it, and now declare that, in the midst of a fierce war, to require an oath of fidelity to it before voting is reason enough for rebellion. A people that have so patiently and heroically maintained a war during four years to defend their Government are not very likely to betray themselves upon the eve of victory by surrendering it to the friends of their enemies. If those friends decide to take up arms they will find the people ready. Four years have taught the American people that they must defend their Government from domestic enemies. They have had tolerable success thus far, and they will probably not yield to threats and traditions what they have refused to shot and shell.

PENNSYLVANIA.

WHEN the news of SHERIDAN'S victories in the Valley began to arrive, a month ago, a man standing in front of a newspaper bulletin, and reading the good tidings, looked very gloomy, and remarked to his melancholy neighbor, "If this sort of thing goes on, ABE LINCOLN will be re-elected." How did that gentleman look, we wonder, on Wednesday morning, when the news from Pennsylvania began to arrive? It was a continuation of "this sort of thing." It was the news of the glorious victory of those soldiers are doing in the field—defending the Union, the Government, and the Country. It was saying to BENJAMIN and JEFFERSON and SHERMAN and FARRAGUT, "You shall not fight for a nation that is unworthy your heroism." It was shouting to the brave boys in the field, with three cheers three, "Strike home, and you shall be supported!"

The contest in Pennsylvania was most earnest and intense. The Democratic managers had deserted all other points to concentrate upon the keystone of the arch. If they could only start that from its fidelity they hoped that the whole fabric would crumble. If they could persuade Pennsylvania to speak doubtfully for the Union in October, they were confident they could secure for the party a triumphant election in November. Beaten there they foresaw defeat every where. Consequently, no effort has been spared. Money in profusion, and the most reckless and desperate political trickery have been lavished upon the State. They have strained every nerve to draw Pennsylvania from the support of the American Idea and Government, and, by the blessing of God and her faithful people, the combined forces of TREASON, FRAUD, and Unconscious Slavery have signally and disastrously failed.

It is a State triumph, a national triumph, and a triumph of universal liberty and good government. It proclaims to the world that the inflexible resolution of the American people to maintain their Union and Government without compromise with rebellion and treason, asking the permission of traitors and foreign foes. All hail, Pennsylvania! As you are the keystone of the Union, so you have struck the key-note of the chorus of final victory. "We do not think the war a failure. We do not ask for an immediate cessation of hostilities. We do not believe the Government of the United States powerless, and surrender to armed treason the only hope of national safety," says Pennsylvania; and already the amen in gathering hosts will burst triumphantly from the popular heart on the eighth day of November.

OHIO.

THE State of VALLANDIGHAM, who advocates a division of the Union into four parts—the State of GEORGE H. PENDLETON, the Chicago State of GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN, who thinks that the United States Government has no right to defend itself against treason and rebellion, because, legislating on the widest grants for Union, liberty, and law. She has declared against her recreant sons, and for the undivided country. She sustains ABRAHAM LINCOLN, and that Union-loving Chief Magistrate sustains FARRAGUT, the army and the navy of the United States.

Every true lover of his country and his kind has the right to rejoice over the noble result in Ohio, for it is another vindication of the American principle of popular government. It is another proof that in the very hour and crisis of a civil war the people can still calmly see their highest duty and faithfully perform it. The issues of the West has spoken, and the great and glorious family will echo her words in November.

INDIANA.

WE had not dared to hope for victory in Indiana; but our confidence lay in the strong sentiment of patriotism that the most doubtful of States disdains the imputation of uncertain fidelity, and stands by her gallant and noble MORTON.

As we survey the field of Tuesday's work, what is the natural feeling? After that of devout gratitude that the people have been so true to their highest interests, is it not a resolution that the whole country shall do what Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana have done? After Indiana, need we despair of little New Jersey, where our friends are so steadily and cheerily working? To the States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana, all Union-loving Americans owe a debt that they will not forget, and that they will discharge most satisfactorily to the brave men of those States by going in November and doing likewise.

THE GEORGIA PEACE PLATFORM.

THE Macon Confederate Union newspaper has an official account of the reply of Governor BROWN to the letter of the ex inquiry concerning the peace negotiations between him and General SHERMAN. Governor BROWN'S reply is long, but its substance is small. It is merely State sovereignty. If the United States want peace, says the Governor, let them confess that they are not the United States, and they can have it. Let them confess that their Government is destroyed, and that the Union is a foolish chimera—let them agree that every State may do exactly as it chooses—that the Constitution is a compact which any one of the parties may break at will—that the Union is a partnership at the pleasure of the partners; in a word, that WASHINGTON, HAMILTON, and MADISON knew nothing of the Constitution, but that MR. JOHN C. CALHOUN was its only true expounder—let the United States merely do this, let MR. LINCOLN proclaim an armistice, and then let every sovereign State decide for herself whether she will join the old or the new League, and we can have peace at once.

Governor BROWN adheres to the Chicago platform, and to the views of MR. PENDLETON, the Chicago candidate. These are precisely the political opinions of CALHOUN, of JEFFERSON DAVIS, and of GEORGE H. PENDLETON. "Just put it all on State Sovereignty, and upon that we intend to ask the country to vote for our Chicago candidates, who are to be the agents of our policy. The general issue, therefore, fairly stated by the President of the Chicago Convention, is LINCOLN, Liberty, and Union, or MACPENDLETON, Disunion, and Slavery. For that issue the American people are quite ready.

DAVIS'S LAST SPEECH AND CONFESSION.

THE late speech of JEFFERSON DAVIS is very significant. At first it seemed so evidently a cry of frantic desperation that it was doubtful whether President Lincoln's Chicago friends, or not, it is equally significant. If he really made it, it is the most pitiful veil of baffled treason. If it were forged by the Macon paper in which it appears, the object of the forgery could only have been to dispirit the rebels by the apparent despair of their chief, with the further purpose of lessening the submission by revealing the hopelessness of the rebellion.

But there seems no reason to doubt its authenticity. If JEFFERSON DAVIS did patiently make the speech; or something of which this is a general report. He doubtless called General BUTLER a beast, because MR. DAVIS is not choice in his epithets, and has been forced to feed at his loyal fellow-citizens as hyenas. Doubtless he spoke of General BUTLER as seeking, in his efforts to suppress the rebellion, "to enrich himself by intercourse with gentlemen;" although in what particular a Southern planter who sells bales and lives by the unpaid labor of men and babies and lives by the whips at pleasure, is more gentlemanly than a Northern lawyer or mechanic who lives by his own honest labor, MR. JEFFERSON DAVIS alone can show. Doubtless he said that "the end must be the defeat of our enemy," for JOHNSTON and HOOD had drawn SHERMAN into his lair at the way to Atlanta, and had because the rebellion holds hardly a quarter of the area with which it began; and because as DAVIS himself says immediately afterward, "You have not a million of men, you have eighteen and forty-five left." Doubtless he said, "The city of MACON is filled with stores, sick, and wounded." Doubtless he said that "thousands of our people are absent, most without leave." Doubtless, too, he added, "In Virginia the disparity in numbers is just as great as it is in Georgia." And doubtless the logical conclusion, he said, "Let no one despond. Let no one distrust; and remember if genius is the beau-ideal, hope is the reality."

There are those who have tried hard to form some heroic conception of JEFFERSON DAVIS, to represent him as a fine historical figure. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer, GLADSTONE, spoke of his "creating a nation." The rebel penny-a-liners for the British newspapers and for our own Copperhead journals have been very fond of comparing his "dignity" with MR. LINCOLN'S want of it. But where was ever seen the dignity of any chief who is the leader of a great and wicked enterprise? Where was ever heard such a shameful whine as this Macon speech? The Roman Catiline, DAVIS'S great exemplar, but less guilty than he, died sullen and gloomy upon the field. But this renegade American, this wretched traitor who has brought all the woes of war upon his country because he was defeated at an election, whimpers, "If one half the men now absent without leave will return to duty we can defeat the enemy. With that hope I am going to the f ont. I may not realize this hope, but I know ' ere are men there shall have brought upon our people its ruin, and upon our nation its shame, to what ground shall we be brought at last? To that we should have accepted at the outset." What is that? Compromise. MR. JAMES S. THAYER, MR. SEYMOUR'S companion upon the Tweddle platform, said that the Southern States had a right to secede, and if the Government tried to prevent them it ought to be resisted by arms. MR. VALLANDIGHAM and all Dayton that he always knew it would come to compromise. MR. FERNANDO WOOD, two years ago, declared that the war could have no other result.

The issue, then, according to MR. SEYMOUR, supported by his friends of the Chicago Convention and MR. WOOD, is this: that the constitutional majority of the people have a right to govern, and ought to yield to threats and arms; that when a part of the citizens are dissatisfied with the result of an election, and resist it by force, they are to be allowed to have their way, and the majority and Government, not they, are to yield.

But again, on the 28th October, 1861, MR. HORATIO SEYMOUR made another speech, and once more stated the issue: "If it is true that slavery must be abolished to save this Union, then the people of the South should be allowed to withdraw themselves from that Government which can not give them the protection guaranteed by its terms." That is to say, if some citizens to save slavery, abhorred of God and man, take up arms to resist the result of a constitutional election, and to destroy the Government and the nation, we must allow them both to be destroyed rather than touch slavery! The Union must be saved by force, but human slavery must and shall be preserved!

This is what lawyers call "the general issue," says MR. HORATIO SEYMOUR, and upon this we intend to ask the country to vote for our Chicago candidates, who are to be the agents of our policy. The general issue, therefore, fairly stated by the President of the Chicago Convention, is LINCOLN, Liberty, and Union, or MACPENDLETON, Disunion, and Slavery. For that issue the American people are quite ready.

THE GENERAL ISSUE.

MR. HORATIO SEYMOUR, the Governor of NEW YORK and the President of the Chicago Convention, made a speech after the nomination of his friend JEFFERSON DAVIS, he said:

"We think he [MACPENDLETON] is an able man too. But no matter—we intend to carry this election upon what lawyers call the general issue."

What, then, according to GOVERNOR SEYMOUR, is "the general issue?"

GENERAL LOGAN says that it is whether we shall prosecute the war until the rebels lay down their arms, or make immediate efforts for a cessation of hostilities and a compromise.

General LOGAN says that there are but two parties—those who support and encourage the rebels, and those who oppose them.

General BUTLER says that the Chicago candidates were nominated by a convention that sympathized with rebels, and whose platform was dictated by Southern traitors.

General BUTLER says that it is for the loyal men of the North to see to it that the rebellion does not end in the separation of the States, as desired by the Southern leaders, aided by the election of General MACPENDLETON and the Chicago platform.

These are authorities upon the real issue as weighty, perhaps, as MR. HORATIO SEYMOUR. But what says he? What, in his view, is the issue between us and the American people?

On the 31st of January, 1861, he made a speech in Albany—the Tweddle-Hall speech. It was enthusiastically applauded, and was published as a campaign document by the present Chicago party. A constitutional election had just ended. The party to which MR. SEYMOUR belonged, although it controlled the Legislature, spent for many years, had been removed from power by a constitutional majority of the people. A section of his party at the South had already seized the national property, and openly threatened the existence of the Union and of the Government. The simple question was, shall the authority of the Government be maintained, or surrendered to menace? "The condition of our affairs," said GOVERNOR SEYMOUR, "presents the most alarming crisis of compromise or civil war." He considers these alternatives, and then concludes: "When unnatural war who have looked death in the face too often to despond now." Even the foot-pads of Houndsditch would be ready to ride gayly to the gallows with a nosegay in their button-holes. But they had merely eased travelers of their purses. This man who speaks at Macon has headed an insurrection which has saturated the land with innocent blood.

This is the man and this is the cause to which the Chicago Convention invites the American people to surrender, by voting for General MACPENDLETON. Let us stop fighting him, says the Convention. Let us abandon the resources of statesmanship, says General MACP.

Let us put down the rebellion! the American people will thunder on the 8th of November.

GENERAL DIX AND THE CHICAGO CONVENTION.

GENERAL DIX has written a letter to a Union meeting in Philadelphia. It speaks very plainly of men and things, and shows in the clearest light his own patriotic fidelity. He says that there is but one question before the country—the steady prosecution of the war, or an immediate cessation of hostilities. The letter course General DIX believes, in common with all thoughtful men, would lead to a direct recognition of the independence of the insurgent States. The General does not say, what, however, he doubtless knows, that this is the instruction of the movement for an armistice. He adds, with inexorable logic:

"General MCCLELLAN, the candidate of the Chicago Convention, by force of his position, must be deemed to approve all the declarations with which he was presented by the majority of the Democratic Convention. Unfortunately, he is silent on the only question in regard to which the public desires to be informed. He does not say whether he is in favor of a cessation of hostilities—the measure assumed by those who nominated him as the basis for action in case of his election—or whether he is opposed to it. He does not mention the conditions, really fractions, in I am confident he would have done if he had taken counsel of his own hatbands instead of yielding to the suggestions of politicians. The Chicago Convention presented a distinct issue to the people. As the majority of the Convention have not accepted or repudiate it. He has done neither; and whatever influence may be drawn from his silence must be by War Democrats or the Peace Democrats must be deceived."

General DIX says in the plainest words that the Chicago nomination was a juggle. For he knows, as we all do, that the nomination of MCPENDLETON, and the fact that MCCLELLAN stands with it and by it, implies a platform of dissent from his known views and position, determines perfectly the character of the ticket and the leaders of those who support it. With the natural regret of a Democrat who remembers other days in which, as it seems to him, the party was true and not false to the national honor, he says of its Chicago platform and nominations: "In this injustice to the country, and to a great party identified with all that is honorable in our history, I can have no part. I can only mourn over the reproach which has been brought upon it, by its leaders."

There are thousands and thousands of Conservative men like General DIX who did not vote for MR. LINCOLN in 1860, and who, like him, can not vote for MR. LINCOLN'S opponent in 1864. We believe with him, and mark his concluding words:

"The only hope left us is in the patriotism and discretion of the people. The great body of the people of all parties who are facing the enemies of their country on the battle-field, with a heroism unsurpassed in any age, or who at home, amidst the prevailing tumult and disorder, are working out, in the quiet pursuits of their varied occupations, the material resources of the public defence and safety. When they shall send out fresh from their ourselves new men to represent them together for the same work that is most precious in government and society, there will be renewed hope and faith in our triumphant and impending exile and danger; bearing, in the mean time, as well as we can, the heavy burdens which have been cast upon us by the torrent of a century of political mismanagement and public misrule."

GENERAL JOHN A. LOGAN.

JOHN A. LOGAN, the intimate personal friend of SENATOR DOUGLAS, was a Democratic member of Congress in the secession winter of 1860-'61. When his political friends from the South began to talk of dividing the Union, LOGAN began to talk of assembling it. When they said that should set up for themselves, he answered, "If you resist the Government of the United States the people of the Northwest will hew their way through the Mississippi Valley to the Gulf." The Southern leaders began the war, and JOHN A. LOGAN, like Judge DOUGLAS, DANIEL S. DICK and BENJAMIN F. BUTLER, promptly, immediately into the service, and in the army, he, like them, has made a most enviable name. In all Senator's operations in Georgia there has been no more gallant and victorious soldier than JOHN A. LOGAN.

Lately a MACPENDLETON committee asked him to approve the Chicago platform. He wrote upon the back of his last order congratulating his troops upon the Union victories the words "Excuse me," and sent it by mail. General LOGAN says that at Atlanta he heard but one officer declare for MACPENDLETON; and that the great soldiers do not look for the election of a man who, according to the London Times, first discovered that his countrymen were whipped. To General LOGAN is now stumping Illinois for MR. LINCOLN. He makes the most eloquent and generous appeals to his old political friends. He says to them, and to all Americans who love the honor of their country:

"There are now only two parties—those who support and encourage the rebels, and those who oppose them. Honest men may be deluded with the Opposition, but the tendency of supporting the Chicago nominations is to strengthen the rebellion."

And again this patriot, who shows his faith by his works, says:

"I would as soon vote for JEFF DAVIS as PENDLETON; and I could not hesitate a moment as between candidates pledged to the Union, the Constitution, the laws and the vigorous prosecution of rebellion confronts the Government, and candidates who demand an immediate cessation of hostilities and peace on any terms."

Is General MACPENDLETON a better Democrat than General JOHN A. LOGAN?

A PEACE MAN.

IF there has been a more faithful servant of the rebellion any where than MR. LAZARUS M. POWELL, formerly from Kentucky—we know not, not in Richmond—we have not known him. This is the gentleman who accused the Administration of arbitrarily suppressing free speech; who grew patriotic over the Habeas Corpus, and then had gagged American citizens, and, in fact, fiercely vituperated the Government which had exercised unusual, but entirely constitutional, powers in the midst of civil war. When he sat down MR. HARLAN read from the journal of the Senate of last year a record of votes by MR. POWELL, which it appeared that this gentleman, so very sensitive to the suppression of free speech in the midst of civil war intended to aid the enemy, deliberately voted against the resolution to expel a free speech, in time of profound peace, to citizens of the United States!

This gentleman is, of course, shudders at the enormous crimes of the Administration, and supports the Chicago principles and candidates. MR. POWELL says, with the same frankness with which MR. PENDLETON declares that he is a shiftnationist, and has never voted a man or dollar for this abolition war:

"As a peace man who has opposed this war from the beginning, never having voted a man or a dollar to carry it on, I never will accept the position of one opposing of the war or of the unjust and cruel manner in which it is here that General MCCLELLAN," as the nominee of this Convention, should immediately, and he will have it—say warm, hearty, cadaous support!

INTERESTING ITEMS.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS has been noted for a total forsaking fearing to make his readers weep. Sometimes the sobbing house in one of his novels ran so closely on an actual calamity of death as to excite the sympathetic critics declared he owed his inspiration to the "accident" column of the papers. He drew on real events for the pathetic. The publication strange in the minds of the readers of the September number of "The Mutual Friend." The very words which he puts into the mouth of the old woman who dreads the workhouse so strongly, so fervently, had a living presentment to the unhappily reported case of the unfortunate Mrs. Jeffreys, who, rather than lose her belle-en, stood in a pond to the hearts of its readers. Fact is not stranger or stronger than fiction: they are often so much alike, so fears with each other, and point to the present poor-law as the turn the knife in the wound of the heart.

In the Norwegian mines a singular and striking custom is observed in paying the weekly wages of the men there employed. On the Saturday evening, after the work of the evening to the inspector, who hears from each man the number of hours he has worked, and the number of days of the week past, computes the total given with his own hand in the book, and hands it to the man, who receives it on the miner, bids him term round, and writes in white chalk on his back the amount of his wages. The man, thus accounted, the mine has to go to the cashier, who further writes what he is owing a vet.

A SINGULAR trial lately took place at Madrid. A robber was cited before the Police Court for having stolen a small cup of consecrated wine from the altar of a church and a votive offering on one of the numerous altars dedicated to that city by the Virgin. The robber at once explained that he and his family being in great distress, he had upon the altar of the Virgin of Atocha, and that while engaged in prayer and contemplation of the four millions' worth of jewels with which the Virgin is surrounded, he stopped, and, with a charming smile, handed him the golden cup. This explanation was received in the Court in profound silence, and the case handed over to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who, it is to be hoped, will take however inconvenient the submission of the miracle might be, it would be a fine thing for the poor of the parish. They therefore gave the cup to the soldier, at the same time ordering the restoration of the future spread silver favors from images of any kind, and impressing him with the conviction that he was very lucky to escape without from him as a proof of his gratitude.

A NEW and powerful gun is added to the London Crystal Palace in the form of a "Pneumatic Railway." The application of atmospheric pressure to the propulsion of trains has long been a problem which speculative men of science have regarded as likely to be solved, and many years have been tried which have been more or less successful. The line at Crystal Palace, which is completed has been constructed six hundred yards in length, and along this a train of carriages is driven by the mere force of atmospheric pressure. A description of the mechanical details would be quite unintelligible to the non-professional, and not be satisfactory. Suffice it to say, that in this tunnel or tube, six hundred yards in length, a heavy train of cars is drawn along at a good speed, and sucked back at a similar speed by the force of atmospheric pressure, produced, it may be very valuable. Whether the result will be the supersession of steam by atmospheric pressure is a problem which time alone will show.

ROMAN MARRIAGES continue to multiply; the following is the latest. A Roman lady, the Countess of Francheschini, near Florence, having openly declared that the cure of his arm was long-standing disease was attributable to the miraculous influence of the Madonna, who, he asserted, had appeared to him in a dream, and ordered him to make a pilgrim, the rumor of this "miracle" attracted crowds of devout worshipers to the house of the Countess. The splendid dwelling, with forebands bared to the sun, the prostrate pilgrims and the fervent adoration of the Madonna's image, angels, saints, and even the Almighty himself. The author thought that the pilgrimage proposed by the Pope from the windows and substituted into a couple of deal boxes. The Countess and her son-in-law rights and duties, and the rents the pensioners even after the palace had been put up.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE CAMPAIGN AGAINST RICHMOND.

The positions gained by Butler's and Meade's armies on the right and left flanks have been constantly maintained. The enemy has been compelled to assume the offensive, but in none of his attacks has he succeeded in gaining any advantage, while his loss has been greater than ours. The critics since Grant began to move may be summed up as follows:

Thursday, September 29, the Tenth and Eighteenth Corps crossed the James and advanced upon the outer defenses of Richmond, near Chaplin's Farm and at New Market Heights. Both positions were attacked the engagements especially in the unsuccessful attempt to carry Fort Gilmer and Laurel Hill.

On the same day Kautz, moving around to the right and up the Darbytown or Central Road, made an important reconnoissance, which disclosed the remarkable fact that the enemy had on that road no formidable defense until within four miles of Richmond. Indeed, Kautz, in his reconnoissance, passed even this line without resistance, and reached the tall-gate only two or three miles southeast of Richmond. Terry's (First) division of the Tenth Corps was sent, while the fight at Laurel Hill was going on, to the support of Kautz. At sunset this advanced column fell back again, the cavalry maintaining its position near the Central Road, on the extreme right. The various lines were strengthened, so that their gun-boats on the James commanded the advanced position in that direction. That line fortifications were erected and strengthened.

On Friday, the 30th, the enemy, strongly reinforced, attacked the position and attempted to break the Federal lines where the Tenth and Eighteenth Corps lay. Two assaults were made and repulsed. Here the rebel loss was large—about 1,500 men. Two stand of colors, 16 officers, were captured.

On Saturday it rained, and the state of the roads prevented any operations with infantry. But Terry and Kautz, on the right, pushed out to the left of the Central Road on another reconnoissance—a movement which was necessary to avoid spoken in their movement of the enemy.

It was evident that Lee would next attack on our extreme right, and so it proved. Two divisions confronting Butler's line at Chaplin's Farm were transferred to the Darbytown Road. On Friday, October 7, an attack was made upon Kautz's position early in the morning, and Kautz, in a force of four to five thousand men, and having less than two thousand, was compelled to fall back. In retiring he passed through swampy ground, and left behind him eight rebel pieces of artillery. Two were 20-pounder Parrotts, one Armstrong, and three Confederate guns. The rebels captured, and attacked Birney's line. On the right of this line was Terry's division, to which Kautz's troops were advanced a short distance to the right of their brestwork. Kautz was ordered to take up a defensive position behind Hoke and Field's lines in confusion, but their re-formed in spite and made a fierce attack, and were again repulsed. Throwing up some intrenchments the rebels passed further to the right of Fort Burnham's line. At this juncture Terry advanced upon their rear, and drawing them out of their position drove them from the field. The rebel loss, according to Butler's estimate, was 2,000. The Federal loss was about 1,000 men. Two rebel flags which had been yielded was more strongly held after the fight. Among the prisoners taken were Brigadier-General Gregg, of Texas, killed; and Brigadier-General Bratton severely wounded.

Monday advanced, September 30, and carried a fortified position on the Darbytown road, some distance to the left of Laurel Hill. The enemy then fell back on his intrenchments covering the Darbytown road. Butler's right was then advanced to the line followed the enemy up to the works. An attack was made, which was unsuccessful, and the rebels, making a counter-charge, penetrated between the Fifth and Tenth Corps, but were driven back with great slaughter.

On Saturday, October 1, an attack was made by the enemy on a portion of the Eighteenth Corps. The rebels were severely repulsed. On the same day Sheridan's great victory.

THE SHENANDOAH VALLEY.

Not driven back, as he say reverse, but in obedience to General Grant's plans against Richmond, Sheridan is retreating down the Valley. On the 7th his column had reached Woodstock. Before retiring he had destroyed the mills and forts at Mount Jackson, and on the night of the moving back to this point (Woodstock) the whole country was fired by the rebels to the North Branch, and was made entirely untenable for a rebel army." We make the following extract from Sheridan's report:

"I have destroyed over two thousand barns filled with hay and forage, in addition to burning implements of every mills filled with flour and wheat; have driven in front of my column over four thousand head of stock, and have killed and issued to the troops not less than three thousand sheep.

"This destruction embraces the Luray Valley and Little Fort Valley, as well as the main Valley.

"A large number of horses have been obtained, a proportion of which are fit for cavalry service.

"Lieutenant John R. Meigs, my engineer officer, was murdered beyond Harrisonburg, on October 3. For this atrocious act all the houses within an area of five miles were burned.

"Since I came into the Valley from Harper's Ferry every train, every mail party, and every ambulance, has been bushwhacked by the people, many of whom have themselves given paroles, which commanded my admiration in that Valley.

"The people here are getting sick of the war. Heretofore they have had no reason to complain, because they have been living in the greatest abundance.

A later dispatch, dated October 9, at Strasburg, gives information of the movement of Early's army, principally over on the Sth. Says Sheridan:

"On the 6th inst. Early's army was not followed up until his yesterday, when a large force of cavalry appeared on the Back Road, and, every available man was sent both by attacking the enemy. I became satisfied that it was only all the infantry of the Valley, as reported by Rosser, and directed Torbett to attack at daylight this morning, and he drove them out of the Valley. The attack was handsomely made. Custar, commanding the Third Cavalry Division, struck the back road, and Merritt, commanding the First Cavalry Division, on the Strasburg pike. The enemy's cavalry was driven in confusion, Custar captured six pieces of artillery with caisons, belonging to the Lomax division—artillery, forty-seven wagons, ambulances, etc. Among the wagons captured are the battle-flags and colors of the Valley, Rosser's division, and Colonel Pollard. The number of prisoners will be 1,500.

"The enemy after being charged by our gallant cavalry fled in confusion. They left Strasburg by our guns on the pump 25 miles through Mount Jackson, and across the north fork of the Shenandoah.

GENERAL SHERMAN.

General Hood having dispatched a large force to make a descent across the Tennessee somewhere on Sherman's rear, the latter sent General Thomas to attend to Forrest, taking upon himself the task of pursuing General Hood's flank movements. Forrest has been compelled to retreat from Decatur to Corinth, and Sherman's army marched by Sherman over the rebels in his rear at Allatoona. The battle which followed is described thus:

"I reached the Kenesaw Mountain October 6, but in order to bring my supplies by railroad the army halted. I had anticipated the attack, and had ordered from Rome General Corse with about 2,000 men. These arrived and reinforced the enemy losing some 200 dead, and more than 1,000 wounded and prisoners. Corse had about 600 in the aggregate. The enemy captured the small garrison of the block-house, and commanded the railroad seven miles of our railroad; but we have at Allatoona and Kenesaw an abundance of supplies. The enemy made our approach, has moved rapidly back to Dallas and Van Wert, and I have ordered Corse to return to the main Kingston or Rome. Atlanta is perfectly secure to us, and the enemy is destroying all that is worth."

THE INVASION OF MISSOURI.

Brigadier-General Blunt encountered at Bulla. We are able to give a detailed account of his defeat of Price Rock. He reached Cassville on September 28, and with a portion of his command undertook to intercept Shelby. Prices for supplies and ammunition. Blunt's force, which consisted of but 3,000 men, was surrounded on all sides by columns which consisted of 12,000. General Price attempted to advance on his rear, and was terribly beaten, but gaining the mountain sides, he compelled Blunt to evacuate. On the 29th to fight Ewing was surrounded, and same near being captured. He escaped, however, by the aid of forces sent to his assistance. On the 7th he rebels made a demonstration against Rolla, but this proved to be merely a feint to occupy our forces while they crossed the Osage River. On the 8th Price's army began to concentrate. Price's army is estimated at 30,000 strong, with from 16 to 18 pieces of artillery. On the 9th General Rosecrans arrived, and scouring command followed the rebels with about 5000 cavalry.

THE SONG OF AUTUMN.

I HAVE painted the woods, I have kindled the sky,
I have brightened the hills with a glance of mine eye;
I have scattered the fruits, I have gathered the corn,
And now from the earth must her verdure be torn.

Ye lingering flowers, ye leaves of the spray,
I summon ye all—away! away!

No more from the depth of the grove may be heard
The joy-hastened song of its fluttering bird;
I have passed o'er the branches that shelter him there,
And their quivering drapery is shaken by air.

Ye lingering flowers, ye leaves of the spray,
I summon ye all—away! away!

Fixed not the deer on yet sunny and long,
That your forms are still bright'ning, your fibres still strong?
To vigor and beauty, relentless am I—
There is nothing to young or too lovely to die.

Ye lingering flowers, ye leaves of the spray,
I summon ye all—away! away!

And I call on the winds that repose in the north,
To rend their wild voices in unison forth;
Let the harp of the tempest be dolefully strung—
There's a wail to be made, there's a dirge to be sung;
For the lingering flowers, the leaves of the spray,
They are doomed—they are dying away! away!

LITTLE BEN.

AMONG a year ago, more or less, a little old gentleman was walking in Fifth Avenue in the city of New York. He had a hooked nose with a pair of gold spectacles perched on the top of it, and a gray wig with a fine curl in the very middle of his forehead. His shirt was quite clean, but very much tumbled up at the wristbands. He walked with a cane, after a queer fashion which I will try to describe. He put the cane to the ground with a smart rap, then looked at it, with his bushy black eyebrows puckered together into what seemed a terrible frown, and took two short, quick steps. At the next two steps he would flourish the cane vigorously, making a figure 8 in the air, at the same time glancing upward, with all the fierceness absorbed out of his brows; and so on, up and down, rap and flourish, until he got to the end of his journey.

In passing he was crossing Eighteenth Street and making a tremendous 8 in the air with his cane, that his eye fell upon a little bit of a boy playing ball and with a small stone against the blank side-wall of one of the houses.

As for the little fellow had but two garments—ragged shirt with no buttons and only half a sleeve, and a pair of trowsers which were so large that the whole of the waist of a body could have been hidden in one leg of them. As it was, they were tied round his waist with a piece of twine, and rolled up in the legs. His poor little bare feet and ankles looked red and cold, as well as dirty; and it was very fortunate that he had such a shock of thick, tangled hair as his head, for that was all the hat or cap he owned.

But, spite of his rags and nakedness, he was happy as a lark. He was here and there like lightning, and counting out triumphantly every time he caught the stone, until, at the very moment the little old gentleman was passing, he made a miss, and away flew the stone over his head, and hit the old gentleman on the end of his hooked nose.

"Mercy on us!" he exclaimed, in a sharp, cracked voice, which sounded like a poppun.

"Where did that ball go to? hang it!" said the boy.

"What do you mean by knocking people's noses off in broad daylight?" cried the little old gentleman. "You'll come to the gallows if you go on in this way. Mercy on us!"

He rubbed his long hooked nose; while the boy pushing away the tangled yellow hair from his brow, looked up frightened; but when he saw a pair of gray, twinkling eyes bent down on him, and a kind smile on the old man's countenance, another smile broke out in his beautiful little face—a smile through all the dirt and neglect—and he said,

"I'm sorry I hit you. I didn't mean to. Let me clean your nose. Sir; there is no end dirty."

Then the little old gentleman saw that he had a small wooden box, with brushes and blacking; and looking close at it, the old-fashioned gentleman also said "Mercy on us!" again, like another poppun.

"Why, so they are dirty? To—be—sure! Then, what does he do but put up one of his feet on the box, and the next moment the boy was spitting on his brush and rubbing away for dear life.

"What's your name?" asked the little old gentleman presently.

"Ben," answered the child, looking up. "What's made you cry? I should come to the gallows? I ain't cheating."

"Well, to—be—sure. That was wrong in me. I shall buy you a ball. You mustn't be pounding people's houses with stones. It's wicked. Where do you live?"

"Down in Centre Street."

"Why do you come 'way up here It is ten miles at least."

"Cause the big boys beat me away from down town, and I must go where I can get some money for mother, you see, 'cause Bill is in prison."

"In prison? What for?"

"For likes you, for prigging."

"Mercy on us!" cried the little old gentleman. "What does that mean?"

"Stealing," said the child, in a low voice, looking down, and working very hard at the other shoe.

"Mercy on us!" came out this time more like a poppun than ever; and the little old gentleman was so shocked; then, after a moment, he drew a long breath, and said "to—be—sure;" and then he added, in a solemn tone, with all the twinkle gone out of his eyes—"But you're not a thief, are you?"

"O Lor, no! I don't never know enough for that."

"Poor little man!" said the old gentleman. "God grant you never may know enough. Are there any more of you?"

"Yes; my sister Fighting Bet. I hate her. She punches my head again the wall every chance she can get. She would burn a house down for ten-pence."

"Oh, oh! what do I hear?" said the little old gentleman. "It is dreadful!" Then seeing that his shoes were finished, and shining like jet, he put his hand in his pocket and took out first a ten-cent stamp. "That's to buy a ball," he said. Then bringing out a well-worn black pocket-book, he took from thence a dollar bill with a portrait of Mr. Chase on it, which some funny fellow had ornamented with an immense pair of mustaches, and handing that also to the ragged, barefooted child, told him to buy himself with it a pair of shoes.

"Why, you're crazy, ain't you?" exclaimed the boy, as soon as he could recover from the utter disgape of astonishment this munificent gift had caused.

"Really though, do you mean it?

"Mean it, my poor boy? To—be—sure; and—and—good-by."

He walked off, his under lip trembling, and the great frown coming deeper than ever as he brought his cane with a rap to the ground, while it did not clear away as well as usual with the next two steps, and the flourish of the figure of 8 in the air.

Before he had taken six steps little Ben sat down on his box. He drew in his breath with a long sigh; then another still longer, and then he broke into a furious passion of crying, smearing the great tears all over his face with his dirty brown hands, and sobbing as though his heart would break.

No one noticed him. Presently a cross-looking servant girl came out of a low area door in the side of the house with a pan of cool ashes. She saw little Ben sobbing, and she said to him in a shrill, yet little wretch; go 'long with you!" shaking her fist at him. Then, seeing that he did not move at once, she rushed at him, and cuffed his ears so hard that she knocked him quite over.

"You've killed him," cried a woman, who, catching up his box by the long strap, and swinging it round till it came with a sounding whack against her shoulder, gave chase to the fat cook of his speed, he did not stop until he was completely out of breath.

But what was the matter with the little old gentleman's eyes as he walked away? He twitched off his spectacles, and taking a large red silk pocket-handkerchief out of his pocket, wiped them, then, as if they were to blame, holding his cane straight out before him. Then he rubbed them again and again now, as if he was vexed about the state of his eyes, which were shining with a watery brightness that was very unusual and surprising; and then he exclaimed,

"Mercy on us! mercy on us! mercy on us!" three times to himself, as he had never known that the words did not sound this tune in the least like poppuns; and after he had blown his nose, and put on his spectacles, he turned his cane with a rap to the ground and a "To—be—sure."

Before little Ben went home he bought a nice India-rubber ball, for he had dropped the last bought in the air as he walked, singing, "My name it is Joe Rowers," at the top of his voice, for he had forgotten his tears in a very few minutes.

This boy was born in a cellar in the Five Points, amidst scenes of squalid poverty and all manner of wickedness.

Ben's parents were miserable people, who starved when they had no money, and who drank and sometimes with poisonous gin when they had chanced to earn or beg a few shillings.

Haggard, brutal-looking men and women live all around, and swarms of wretched children, screaming and fighting continually, fill the crooked, dirty streets of this dreadful locality. The houses, some of them quite large, are rotten and mouldering with age and decay. All manner of filth lies putrifying in the gutters, and the very air, which don't go and fro from one crazy den to another, are gaunt and hideous with famine.

No wonder that little Ben at eight years of age was a lean and shrunken child, between hard blows and slow starvation. What he earned was taken away from him every night by his father, or even by the bundle of straw that served him for a bed.

He rarely chanced one other pair of boots that does for which he was paid the same two cents. With it he went into a low eating-house and bought a slice of bread and meat, or a sausage. This he carefully stowed away in the pocket of the old pantaloons along with the precious dollar. Ben did not even know what a pocket-handkerchief was, because he meant to give it to his mother, whom the poor little fellow loved because once in a great while she kissed him.

On his way home he met half a dozen other bootblacks, who immediately set upon him in a body; pinching his ears, pulling his hair, calling him a sneak, regretting that he had no cap on his head so that they might snatch it off and toss it sky-high; ordering him to be informed what he was to be hung, as they wished to be present at the ceremony.

The tormented boy became crimsoned with fury, but fearing for his dollar, he shook his arms to defend his head and answered back not a word, till passing his chance he broke from them and ran for his life.

Presently he turned into one of the wretched streets of the Five Points. Stopping before one of the houses, he stepped cautiously down the slimy, muddy steps, but being breathless and unsteady with running he fell against the door, the lock of which sent him staggering against the opposite wall.

"Why don't you let the boy alone?" growled his mother, who was covering over a battered and empty stove. "I never see such a brute as you are."

The walls and ceiling were perfectly black with age. In one corner was a heap of mouldy straw, with some ragged trowsers over it for a pillow-case. By the side of the stove were two wooden boxes which answered for chairs, and near one of them was a black bottle smelling of whisky. An old frying-pan, rusty for want of use, and a tin mug, stood just within the chimney—and that was all.

The miserable boy stood crying where his cruel parent had thrown him, not daring to approach him.

He soon went softly up to his mother, and showed her the dollar.

"A dollar?" she screamed, clutching it—"a dollar! Where did you steal it?"

"I didn't steal it," cried Ben, indignantly. "An old cove gave it to me himself; he told me to buy shoes with it; but I'll give it all to you, mother, if you want it."

"Want it? want it? Oh, won't we have a jolly time! Here, Jim," she continued, holding it out to the man, "you've been good, and half a peck of coal, and get this filled"—handing him the bottle —"and get some bacon, too, d'ye hear? I'm hungry." And she rolled her eyes and rubbed her hands in joyful anticipation of the coming warmth and feast; then suddenly she drew Ben to her and kissed him.

The child's poor little thin arms went curling round her neck, and he piteously murmured, "Oh, mother, why don't you be kind to me all the time like this?"

"Because I'm such a wicked woman," she groaned, shuddering. "But, Ben, you mustn't mind if I hit you when I'm tipsy. I don't mean it, boy. Don't you cry now, Ben."

Luckily the refreshments coming in at this moment diverted the child from his tears; and very soon a fire was burning in the rickety old stove, and the battered tin cup was doing duty on it, heating water, but not for tea. Jim, however, hoping that the cellar would soon be pitch dark, as the sun was now setting, had added a tallow-candle to the rest of his purchases. This was stuck in a hole in the floor, for candlesticks there was none; and soon the three were eating bread and smoked herring, tearing at both like famished tigers with avidity. Jim had borrowed a cracked tumbler from an upstairs neighbor, and in this he mixed some hot whisky-and-water for his wife. Ben drinking of the like the rest until his eyes grew heavy, and then closed.

Jim and his wretched wife finished the whisky between them—not yet without quarreling—and by midnight were going off in a series of short naps, sitting on the wooden boxes, tumbling forward and raising themselves up with sudden jerks and moans, till at last they fell upon the floor.

If the little old gentleman could have foreseen what would be done with his dollar, I really think he would have popped out his "Mercy on us!" like a jack-in-the-box, and snatched it away from the poppun; and I am sure Mr. Chase, who looks like an excellent good man, if one may judge by his portrait on the bill, would have been highly pleased to up his money, or made a real "shinplaster" of it, than have had it put to such a miserable use.

Ben was the most wretched looking stupid and sick; but he got quietly up while his parents were still sleeping, and taking his box and brushes, went softly out, down the stairs, and bread which he had bought the day before. He went immediately up to the same place on Fifth Avenue, hoping to see his friend; for the old gentleman came there along flourishing his cane on that day, or on many other days, though Ben watched for him eagerly.

But on the 8th day, rap, cane, and all, just the same as before; and Ben, running up, his dirty, but beautiful face in a glow of delight, cried out,

"See, Sir, here's my ball: I gave the ten-pence for it."

The poor child was as ragged as ever, and barefooted of course.

"But where are the shoes I gave you the money to buy?"

"I give the dollar to my mother."

"And what did she do with it?"

She looked down, and said, in a low voice. "Got tipsy."

"Mercy on us!" cried the little old gentleman, "what are we to do with such wicked people?"

"Bet is in the hospital," said the boy.

"Who's Bet?" asked the little old gentleman, for he had forgotten her name.

"Bet's my sister."

"Oh! How did she come there?"

"Well, she was fighting, and she got her head broke with a brick-bat; and the plessman came to stop it, and he got locked, and then they took Bet to the hospital."

"Mercy on us!" said the little old gentleman; then speaking suddenly to hide how nearly he was crying, "Here you, boy," he said, "come along with me!"

He hastened down the side street to Sixth Ave nue and got into a car, telling Ben to follow. And so Ben took his first ride!

They got out at the cars went, then walked a little way to a hotel, where, by paying for it, the old gentleman soon had ready a nice bath of piping hot water, and clean clothes.

"Come, Ben," he said, "take off your clothes, jump in here and scrub yourself well; and I'll order some dinner in your room."

No sooner said than done; for Ben, in a state of delight that never at such fine things, soon slipped out of the ragged shirt with one sleeve and the big trowsers, and had a warm bath for the first time in his life. A ride and a bath! would wonders ever cease?

You never saw such a bright, handsome face as came out of that same bath-room half an hour afterward! To be sure the ragged clothes looked doleful and dirty, and Ben hated to put them on his clean white body. But he never shirked. Just wait a bit.

"Mercy on us!" exclaimed the queer little old gentleman when Ben came up to him; "what a difference, and how clean you are! You perfectly smell of soap and water. Poor little fellow! to be sure—to be sure."

They hurried out and went up Broadway to Mr. Brooks's great ready-made clothing-store, Ben walking on the outside edge of the walk to keep his feet clean.

"Have you ready-made boys' clothes?"

"Thousands of them," answered the clerk, with a very polite bow.

"Well, take this boy's measure for a strong, dark suit. Put them on him, and tie up his old clothes in a bundle, if you please."

"Yes, Sir, certainly," said the clerk, with another polite bow. Then he took Ben into a small room, and bringing out his long piece of yellow tape proceeded to measure the boy in every direction. Presently he darted out and said to the old gentleman, "Did you mean shirt, stockings, pocket-handkerchiefs, cap, and all, Sir?"

"Mercy on us! do you keep all these things too?"

Every article in the line, Sir, cheap for cash. They all come into the clothing department, you know, Sir."

"To—be—sure. Certainly. How about shoes?"

"We can send for a pair, and have them here in five minutes."

"Poor little boy," said the old gentleman; "he shall have them all. Get the shoes, too, if you please."

The clerk said to himself it was all "jolly queer," but none of his business if funny old chaps chose to pick up beggars and fag them out from one end to so be grinned and bowed, and went back to Ben, tickled his feet by measuring them too, and sent a boy to the nearest shoe store with an order and the measure.

Then he got out of a great pile a nice little white shirt, and told Ben to put it on.

"Is it to be mine, Sir?" asked Ben, his whole face in a glow of wonder and joy.

"I rather think it is," said the clerk. "That old chap, your grandfather, told me to give it to you."

"He's not my grandfather—he's my friend," said Ben. "I'm only a poor boy."

"Oh!" said the clerk, who knew perfectly well that the old gentleman was not his grandfather, "then you're a lucky chap, for you are to have a complete suit like a dandy, all except a mountain for your hair, and colours for your pocket-handkerchief. we don't sell those, I'm sorry to say."

Ben never understood that the clerk was laughing at him. He was in a bewildered maze of ecstasy and delight as each fresh article was handed to him, starting with the shoes which the boy had brought in, and which exactly fitted.

And now, his mind completely dressed, his face finished, his eyes wildly bright, his hands trembling—

When he came out the funny little old gentleman did not know him; and when he was quite dressed up and said, "Please, Sir, thank you, Sir, here I am."

"Mercy on us!" cried the old gentleman; "to—be—sure."

He said for the clothes with some bills which but Chase's portrait on them.

Ben thought it must have been a hundred dollars at least that he had to give, and he said, timidly, "I'll bring the clothes as long as I live, Sir. I love you. You are kind and good."

Upon this the little old gentleman winked very hard, for his eyes had become suddenly dim, and said, "To—be—sure," in a whisper, to himself.

They went out, Ben with his old rags of clothes and his blacking-box and brushes, all tied up together in brown paper, and the old gentleman, who seemed perfectly crazy about Ben, took him next to a barber.

"Cut this boy's hair, if you please," he said; very soon the barber was thoroughly rewarded.

The barber lifted Ben upon a high chair, and pinned a great towel around his neck; then, taking a comb and scissors, began to cut away, and snipping, until the long tangled hair covered his shoulders. Then he rubbed something that smelled delicately on his head, and, taking the scissors, with one flourish he made a beautiful parting at the side; then he brushed, and brushed, till the short wavy locks shone bright and golden.

He was a beautiful child. Thin and pale certainly, but with a sweet, gentle expression.

And the little old gentleman loved the child. He was such a simple old fellow that he quite wondered that Ben should love him; and as they trudged away from the barber's he kept glancing at the boy's happy face, and thinking to himself, "It's a great thing to have a child to love you. To—be—sure."

"Where do you live, Ben?" he asked, presently.

"Down in the Five Points, Sir."

"Will you take me there? I want to speak to your mother."

So they walked a little farther down Broadway, and Ben knew many more boys there at the steps which led to the cellar. Men, women, and children, fierce and ragged, watched them all the way, but one of the more amiable children stole the old gentleman's red silk pocket-handkerchief.

"May I call you my friend?" asked Ben, timidly, of the old gentleman.

"To—be—sure," said the old gentleman.

They opened the battered door, and went into the dismal place.

"What do you want?" asked a gruff voice.

"It's me, mother! It's me, mother!" exclaimed Ben; "and this is my friend who gave me all these nice clothes, and the dollar, and the India-rubber ball!"

The man cause forward, caught Ben roughly by the arm, twisted and twisted him round, and then ungraciously said,

"You'd better have given him money. What's the use of fine duds to the likes of him?"

"Mercy on us!" muttered a voice in the corner, and Ben's mother lifted her head from the straw on which she was lying. "Who's that? What do those people want here?"

"It's me, mother; your Ben!" said the child, going down to her.

"My boy! my Ben! Why, who's been doing this to you?" touching his clothes and clean face.

"My friend."

"What! that old man? God bless you, Sir!" said the woman; "though it's queer how you came by it, to be sure. I'll wash his face and his feet clean to brush boots."

"Mercy on us! I don't want him to take them off!" cried the old gentleman. "I want him to go to school, and I will help you and your husband to get a work, and to live in comfort, if you will promise me to keep sober and be honest."

"That I will!" cried the woman, bursting into tears.

The old gentleman tore a page out of his memorandum-book, wrote on it where he lived, and placed it in the woman's hands; then telling Ben to come to him before nine o'clock the next day, he hurried out of the place with many extra flourishes of his cane, and got safely back to Broadway.

"Mercy on us!" he ejaculated, "what a home! Ben shall come here. I'll have him educated; and with God's blessing he will grow up a good man. Too—be—sure!"

He felt for the pocket-handkerchief to polish his spectacles, which somehow had gotten very dim.

"Mercy on us! these eyes shine!"

That night, when little Ben was asleep, his father took his new clothes and pawned them for drink. His mother begged him to leave them alone, but in vain. The brown paper was torn off, and the old rags placed by his side; and when poor little Ben awoke the next morning the shirt without a sleeve and the big trowsers were all he saw.

He rose, his heart beating wildly, and hunted in every corner of the wretched room, but they were gone. He stood one moment perfectly still, as if turned to stone. Then he began to draw his breath in long sobs—more and longer yet—and then broke into frantic screams and cries.

His father awoke, furious at having his sleep disturbed.

"You'd better be quiet," he cried, in a savage voice, shaking his fist at him.

"Give me my clothes!" screamed the child. "Give them to me!"

"You'll never see them again. Go long out and black boots."

All at once the boy became silent. He put on the ragged clothes, but did not take his box of brushes, and went up the steps, saying to himself, "I'll go right to my friend and tell him."

His father heard him, and coming up to his feet he rushed after him, shouting, "No, you won't go to your friend!"

Furious with passion and drink, he seized his little son Ben by the arms, and, swinging him high above his head, hurled him down the stone steps.

One piercing shriek, one quiver of the little wasted frame, and the child lay quite still.

"Why, what's the matter with the fire?" asked his mother, seeing him lying so still and white on the straw.

He fell down the steps," said the father.

Something in the tone of his voice excited her suspicion, and looking keenly at him she cried,

"You have killed him. You have—you did."

He went up the steps and soon brought back a Dispensary doctor.

The miserable child was examined with gentleness and care by the doctor, who found that his collar-bone and one of his legs were broken.

"He must be taken to the hospital," he said. "I will send men and a litter."

And so poor little Ben, almost murdered by his father, was carried off to the hospital; while his parents, afraid of the little old gentleman, moved immediately—not to another cellar, as another street, telling no one where they were going.

And when Ben's "friend," wondering why the boy did not come to him, ventured once more into the Five Points, he could not find the child or his parents, or any one who knew any thing about them. And he walked softly away, saying, "Mercy on us! what a world it is! Where is the pretty little boy? I meant to be so kind to him. To—be—sure."

Weeks passed, but poor little Ben still lay in his bed at the hospital. His constitution had received such a shock that he could not rally, and the nurse thought of his father's awful cruelty ate into his heart like a canker.

Every body was kind to him. The nurse seemed to feel more tender and compassionate every day. The oldest and poorest among the patients in the ward where he lay would ask him how he felt in the morning.

One day, when his mother was with him, he threw his arms passionately round her neck and burst into tears, crying, "If I could only see him —oh, if I could! I love him! I am dying, and I don't want to die without seeing my friend."

The woman sobbed. "Oh, don't say you're dying," she cried, "my darling, my own little Ben. I will never be cross to you again. And I'll go for the old gentleman; he will make you better."

She kissed him, and went out. But though she ran all the way to the old gentleman's house she did not find him at home. She could only leave a message, repeating it over and over to the servant, entreating the old gentleman not to lose a moment when he knew who wanted him.

It was night before he came home, for he had dined with friends.

"What!" he said to the servant, "my little Ben! Dying? Get me a coach, quick! Mercy on us! Oh dear! oh dear!"

It was against the rules to admit visitors at night, but the little old gentleman got in, and was soon at the bedside of the dying boy.

He was already too far gone to speak; but he threw his wasted arms around the neck of his dear old friend, and with what he withered cheek; then feeling under his pillow, he took out a small Index-rubber ball, and holding it up, smiled in his face.

It was too much. The little old gentleman pushing away his spectacles, cried and sobbed like a child; while Ben stroked his kind face with his small, trembling hand, trying to comfort him; then drawing the old man's cheek close to his, with great difficulty he murmured,

"Good-by, my friend."

The arm dropped powerless, and the child turned his face away. Closing his eyes, he fell asleep; and when the old gentleman took the small hand

"in his it was already cold. For little Ben

THE ANGEL AND CHILD.

I saw an angel, in my sleep,
Pass out of the celestial town;
By golden stair and starry keep
This angel of the Lord came down.

He kindled into purple flame
His pathway through the cloven sky,
This angel of the Lord, by name
To where a little child did lie.

I saw their faces, near and clear,
His was the child's, the child's was his;
O babe, the mother-lips are dear—
Now you shall take an angel's kiss!

I look'd again, and in my dream
I saw the angel and the child
Pass, hand in hand, athwart the gleam
Of innermost Paradise undefiled,

On to the Throne. They shall behold
The Father's lighted glowing face;
Mother, the little limbs are cold:
Your angel-baby died to-day!

MAD ANNETTE.

Most persons have paused for an hour or two on the road between Paris and London to lounge round the quaint old-fashioned town of Boulogne. We, at least, did give so much time to the port as was necessary to note these its peculiarities before vending our onward way to Paris: and we did even more than this. Securing the guidance of a gray-haired hanger-on of the church, we mounted up many flint-scooped steps, and through numberless corridors gaining as much dust as oxygen to the topmost platform of the steeple. The view was worth the trouble. Right below the tower nestled and clustered women, in their blue and red clothes, were hurrying hither and thither around the fish-market, while the great fresh morning air with their chaffering cries. From a thicket of black masts and cordage rose the chimneys of the packet ships and steamers all over the kindly sea: which sea spread blue and placid till it was lost in the curve of the earth. The tall cones of the castle towers, the belongs to another age, and made me think for a moment whether I were the colors of the Bearnais or of Mayenne—so light natter to when he wrote upon his own death. But the cicerone recalled me from the past by calling attention to a spick-and-span new house, in a quarter where bright red walls and green shutters were more frequent than the older yellow plaster, and less fashionable, style exultation, "See there the house of the Prefect!"

"And look there, Martin," cried one of my companions, "that's the house of fresh and unfeigned grief —a state resemble by lapse of time and new associations. "Tell me right!" said the neighbors; and Annette received their pity very kindly and very impassibly, only saying, "I know he will come to fetch me; and when he has him I shall go to him." And of course Carter never came: he was never seen or heard of at Dieppe again. And now more than four months have gone by. Annette's wanderings became longer and more dreamy. Nothing done by her father or her friends availed to break the unvarying habit. Backward and forward on the shore of the much-sounding sea she walked, waiting for the vainly-expected summons of her lover.

Up to this time she could not be said to be mad; she was only very sorrowful and very fond of solitude. But now came the remarkable part of the story.

"Messieurs probably know the environs of Dieppe?" said the narrator.

"Never in the place till last night."

"Ah, then, I will describe them to yourselves in the appearances of the coast which I am about to describe. Along to the west, down there, the beach runs flat, with the exception of wastes of chalk under the cliffs. At low-tide long tracks of rock are discovered stretching out to sea, divided in all directions by wide channels of water. Very green and very slippery are those tracks of rock. One day I had occasion to go a little journey in that direction. That is, as the crow flies, for I determined to go along the beach. It was a bleak day in December; the sky was very black, and I had to walk steadily to keep myself from the cold. What did I see as I turned round one of the headlands of the cliff? What but Annette herself, wandering on like a woman in a dream! Quite slowly, as if she cared nothing for the cold wind."

"I Good-day, Mademoiselle Annette. It is very cold down here by the sea, is it not?"

"I am not cold, Monsieur Godin."

"Ah, you are warm, Mademoiselle?"

"What does mademoiselle seek this morning on the cold beach?"

"Monsieur, I have a rendezvous with a friend."

"Poor girl! I thought; your friend will never come: and you will be very cold and wet stretched.

"When my affairs were finished, now, I said, I will return along the road on the top of the cliff; that beach is too damp and slippery; so I set off briskly again. Ah, messieurs! I could walk then as I can not walk now. But, as I have had the misfortune to tell you, for twenty years past.

I was going along the road, with the rising ground that could soon be left edge on my left hand, when I thought on a sudden of Annette. Is she there still? I said to myself. She will be terribly frozen. She should be kept at home: she should not be allowed to go out. I must speak to old Pochon. Now I will mount the edge of the cliff, and see if she is still on the shore. It was just about here that she was when I passed below two hours ago. I turned quickly from the road, messieurs, and in a moment I was on the edge of the cliff, with the green chalk cliff at my feet. The tide had now quite gone down, and the surf seemed a long way from me. Green rocks, and sand, and pools stretched away for many, many yards. Was Annette there? Yes, sitting on a white fragment of cliff below me. So I stood watching the fair prospect and the sea stretching out as we see it now; not, however, smooth and blue; then it was dark and troubled, and white waves broke on the furthest ledges of rock. As I gaze down at Annette, suddenly she rises: she springs forward with a loud cry of delight, runs rapidly across the highest bank of shingle and sand, and wafts an instant where the rocks begin. What does she see? My thoughts jump directly to the object of her desire. Is there any sign of the approach of Ben? Is it true that last night that the girl recognizes? Nothing. Two or three fishing-boats close inshore—boats that I know well by sight—but none have come from England. Nobody on the shore, and nothing at sea. If Annette sees any thing it is imagination. My eyes are fixed on her. She advances, with walking her way toward a tall rock on her right hand. She is right and more looked. She steps over the channel between the rocks. She stands poised for a moment on a weedy ledge; she is half hidden in a pool. She has fallen. No; she is reaching on again. She has reached the tall rock. With hands and knees she clambers to the summit, throws her arms to the open, gives a loud shriek, and—disappears —nothing but air. She starts again—starts off to the left messieurs, looking no bigger than the men and—comes you now in the plain where I see her. I see her, now up, now down; sometimes splashing in the water from some more lofty rock—taking her way from rock to rock; sometimes falling; on again in a moment. Soon she stands still again, once more throws her arms open wide—a cry of disappointment, and hurries off, this time direct to the sea. Should I have tried to get down? By the bye before me, messieurs, I was not thinking—I could not take my eyes off. Before Annette now a ridge of rock rises out of the shore, and the sea seems to wash round the end of it. Yes, so that where the last rock meets the advancing tide there is a fall of some height. She runs—runs—she is at the edge. She is in the sea; she will—No! She falls: I see her no more. She will be hurt by the fall. No! She will swim, must, and she can not move: she will be drowned!

"Before I had thought half this, messieurs, I was far down on the shore to the nearest rock I knew from the cliff to the shore. I ran as fast as Annette. In five minutes I was down and on the rock, and saw poor girl had failed in her leap. It was sad to see. Annette was lying in the moist sand, quite still, as one who is dead, the height of a man from me. And now her long black hair—it started round her beautiful face; and on one of her little brown feet a shell had made a cruel cut, from which the red blood trickled out into the sand: and twice or thrice the harsh waves had crawled over her, and she was all wet and cold. Annette, Annette!" I said, and "What could I do? Was she drowned? I did not know. I lifted her up: I carried her to the nearest house. Should she be tended upon my speed? Under the remedies known to the good woman of the house the patient gradually recovered. Was her mind life came back together. Then I was very thankful, for I yearned over that poor motherless, miserable child. She was to herself: but then I can not say that she has never since come to herself. But she lived, and she began to mutter in a low, plaintive voice, as I have described it. I see them. Then art come now to fetch me, and I go to thee without a moment's delay. Where for me, my darling? I am close to thee. What! thou art farther off? Only wait and I will reach thee. Thou beckonest: I am coming—I am coming." So went on, and messieurs: and never since has she said any thing else.

"I went back to Dieppe; I informed the old Pochon. I found that Annette lay in a fever at old mother Collet's; for nearly raving (always on the same subject), for weeks more too week to walk. Since that she has been quite well. She never seems to know any one, or to care for any thing, except once. Yes, once she did seem to have some sense of my presence; that was when her behavior was taken away from her. Then she wept for a little time, for a little time, messieurs."

And two large round tears rolled down the old man's wrinkled cheeks as he spoke.

"What a thereby!" cried Martin, though I don't believe he had understood half of it.

"And you never heard any more of the man Carter?"

"Never have I seen him since, Sir. He was not likely to come to Dieppe. If I do see him, I will—but no! No! The God of the sea will punish him. And perhaps Annette may yet be healed."

"Now, Martin, come along down; we've been up here more than half an hour. What shall we give the old man?"

We descended and groped on the narrow stair again, and were soon on the lower earth once more.

Annette was at the porch again.

Look you, she was the merry world with a mechanical, meaningless smile, she was seated on a rude stool under the shadow of the church wall. The old guide touched her hand and said, "Good-day, Annette!" No greeting came in reply. The smile remained, but not changed. As we looked, a wavy little lad of some half-dozen years, evidently full of importance at "minding" the poor lunatic, came running up, and cried, "Come, we must go: it is necessary that thou return: my mother awaits you."

The little hand was offered to close round the long thin fingers, and to lead away an unresisting and impassible charge.

We settled our hotel bill, drove to the station, and sank easily on the comfortable cushions of the railroad running southward.

About three miles out of Dieppe Jack broke a long and meditative silence with a remark: "Do you know, you fellows, I believe that sort of thing generally ends in something or other—in something —in something of that sort, you know."

SUCCOTASH.

BY LEWIS GAYLORD CLARK.

I FIND that in these desultory gossipings of mine It is almost impossible not to forget that I began and intended (and intend) to write only in the "first person singular;" but thirty years' use of the editorial "We" makes it a very difficult practice to overcome. The inevitable "we" slips from the nib of our (there 'tis again!)—from the nib of my steel pen every now and then, and I can't help it.

I remember well "old Mathews," of whom Mr. Stetson of the Astor House tells some amusing anecdotes, while the great mimic was a guest at the Tremont House in Boston (then the "crack hotel of the United States), on his last appearance in America.

I remember him well in his wonderfully grotesque appearance—himself alone—on the boards of the old Park Theatre, now rolling modestly from the prompter's box in the middle of the stage, in front of the foot-lights, and the leader of the orchestra giving his "Old Bachelor," his "Hunter of Barbary Flat," and the like.

But we are especially reminded of "old Mathews" in his connection by some remarks which he once made—and reiterated at a supper in Boston—concerning the editorial "We."

When he was in the height of his fame in London as a comedian he took it into his head to appear in tragedy. He "did essay Hamlet," and failed, of course; as all his friends expected, and had forewarned him; and of their prophecy did not fail, in his mortification, to remind him. And what was still more outrageous, the London Times had an severe critique upon the performance, closing with these words:

"We sincerely trust that our excellent and admired comedian, unequaled in his line, may never again be tempted to depart from his peculiar role. His performance in tragedy we have only to say is simply ridiculous."

At this old Mathews "boiled up," and he gave expression to his resentment in the words following, to wit:

"Who the devil is 'WE?' Who is this one man in the Times newspaper who goes about as if he had a pig in his belly, squaling or grunting out 'We, we, we?' Who is 'WE?' If you knew him you could cane him; but who can thrash 'WE?' Confound 'em! there may be a baker's dozen of 'em!"

The very obgurgation of the old favorite proved the notoriety of the editorial plural. We all, in these end times, in days gone by, I have wished, in merely friendly gossip and familiar chat with readers and correspondents, like the present, it might be intermitted, or entirely pretermitted.

So, brother compositors and proof-readers of the Weekly, when we say "I," and when we say "I," and we shall be very much obliged to you.

"JOHN PHOENIX"—A GREAT RAILROAD PROJECT.

"I REGARD 'John Phœnix,'" said a distinguished officer of the United States army to me today, "to one of the wittiest writers which this country has produced within the last forty years. In quiet burlesque, especially, alike with pen and pencil, I have always seen him surpassed."

I agreed with him entirely; and as an instance of Phœnix's burlesque I give to the readers of the Weekly the subjoined, which has never before been published. It is in Captain Derby's own handwriting:

"GREAT RAILROAD PROJECT!
"THE BELVIDERE AND BEHRING'S STRAITS UNION RAILROAD!

"The foregoing is the title of a road which has become a fixed fact in the minds of the projectors.

"The general road commences at Belvidere, in the State of Illinois, and runs thence in a northwesterly direction to Behring's Straits, via Roscoe. It is also projected to diverge several branches from the main line, the first of which is to be known as 'The Nort Pole Branch Railroad,' and by which it is proposed to secure the ice-trade.

"The main line crosses the before-mentioned straits by a tunnel or bridge, thence south, by easy grades, and tunneling the Chinese Wall, to Pekin.

"At or near Behring's Straits it is proposed to diverge with a branch to a southerly direction to Cape Kamschatka, the said branch to be called the 'Kamschatka Valley Union Railroad.' The object of this branch is to secure the seal-trade for the Calcutta market.

"It is also proposed to start another branch at or near the same point of divergence, running in a westerly direction to Tobolsk, in Siberia, connecting at that point with the Underground Railroad-stopping Railroad' to the Dead Sea. The said underground road to be built under the immediate supervision of eminent civil engineers, they having had much experience in works of that character. The services of Captain Ingraham have been secured as conductor on this road.

"From Pekin there will be a branch to Jaffa, crossing the straits near the island of Nipbor by an immense Ice Bridge. The object of this branch is to convey troops and munitions of war from the United States to 'Jerusalem' and annex the Japanese, and also to secure the Japan-ware trade.

"From Pekin will diverge three branches, viz Corbin Clinton to secure the fur-trade, Fejee Islands, Borneo, and Sumatra, to the Gold Mines in Australia. It is proposed to cross the arms of the sea separating these islands by immense stone culverts of the latest pattern.

"The main line then extends to Calcutta, tunneling the Himalaya Mountains, connecting at this point with the 'London and Calcutta Union Railroad,' and with the plank-road to Bonlocohtan.

"The main line then extends from Calcutta, via Bagdad, crossing the Red Sea at Moses's Ford, and the great Sahara Desert to Timbuctoo, connecting with the 'Niger River Valley Union Railroad' to the coast of Guinea.

"The main line then extends through Ethiopia and the Caffre settlements to the Cape of Good Hope, there connecting with the 'Union Railroad Company,' plying between Cape Town and Patagonia.

"Thence the main line extends up the west coast of America, via Valparaiso and Panama, to San Francisco, with a branch to the Lobos Islands (for the guano trade), touching at Sitka, Oregon. From San Francisco the line extends on a direct course to the place of beginning, with a plank-road to New York city.

"It would be useless to descant at any length upon the advantages which this road will possess over all others. A glance at the map will be sufficient to impress upon the mind of the most 'groundsman' the utility and the magnificence of the scheme, and the mines of wealth which will be necessary in order to build it. To the man of business, the extreme facility with which the most distant portions of the globe can be reached should especially commend this project; and to the pleasure-seeker, the man who wishes to take a trip regardless of the Maelstrom (which undoubtedly is the greatest watering-place in the world) should make this to appear the project of the age; the work which will cause this generation to shine in the very extreme of glory on to the farthest limits of time.

"We have pleasure to announce the successful opening of this great work."

The "Atlantic and Pacific Railroad" had not at this time become a "fixed fact," or "Phœnix" would not have spoken of a "plank-road to New York city."

DO TWO WRONGS MAKE A RIGHT?

THIS proposition has been generally denied; the converse being assumed, that two Wrongs do not make a Right; but a friend mentioned to us the other night a bit of logic which he heard cited recently, and which would almost seem to upset the old maxim.

"Two Wrongs never make a Right," said one disputant to another.

"Yes they do—sometimes," said his antagonist.

"Never!" replied the other colloquist.

"They do, I tell you, and can prove it. The other day somebody passed me on a five-dollar counterfeit bill. That was wrong, wasn't it?"

"Yes, of course."

"Wal, I wasn't goin' to be cheated out of five dollars; so I passed it off, among some good bills, on another man. Wasn't that wrong?"

"To be sure—as much so as the first."

"Wal, that makes two wrongs, don't it?"

"Yes."

"Jes' so; but it made set all right!"

Passing the morality of the argument it would, at first blush, appear that the "last speaker" had "the best of it."

The two following notes will not be uninteresting to many readers of the Weekly:

September 5, 1864.

L. Gaylord Clark, Esq.:

DEAR SIR,—You ask in "Succotash," in Harper's Weekly, "Can any one tell me who is the author of the following pregnant sentences: 'Death is continually making the round of a great city, and none or few stops at every man's door. But, after all, the shortest life is long enough if it lead to a better; and the longest life is too short if it do not.'"

The Rev. C. C. Colton, an eccentric and gifted Englishman, wrote the latter sentence, omitting the words, "But, after all," and possibly the first one; but it does not stand in connection in this in his book Remarkable, in "Death," which you may find in a work of his called "Lacon." You will see on a moment's study that the last is as "pregnant" in every thing narrowy as the one you quote. Excuse my haste.—Sincerely, etc.,

REV. H. L. POWERS,
President of Grove-hill Coll., Davenport, Iowa.

I thank my correspondent for his note, but have some doubt about the passage quoted by Colton; for the most impressive sentence of all, the first, is not in "Lacon;" and as it is well known that the author of that collection died a year right and left, my impression is that he stole the last Byron said of "Lacon; or, Many Things in a Few Words," that it should have been entitled "A Few Things in Many Words!"

Cotton was in this country in 1831, and I have conversed with those who conversed with him at that time. What a sad career was his! A graduate of Cambridge University, and then in the Anglican Church, with a splendid "living," he became a desperate gambler and debauchee; and finally, in poverty and exile, afflicted with that incurable disease, he died in Paris by his own hand.

Since writing the foregoing a friend informs me that it is to be found upon his "text" that he once saw the whole passage, as it stood in the first quotation, in an English translation of some of the ornate illuminations of Peter Abraham à Sancta Clara. But enough.

THE subjoined, from a second correspondent, enlightens us upon another point. Having been "out of the regional" Editorial Sanctum and well up-ward, I have received but few of the issues of the public press. I have never seen the work which our loyal, patriotic, Union-loving friend praises so highly:

ROCHESTER, Sept. 26, 1864.

Lewis Gaylord Clark, Esq.:

DEAR SIR,—In just but by no means unpalatable dish of "Succotash" served up in Harper's Weekly for October 1, you quote a few verses about

"Two Irishmen out of employ, . . .
One of whom was called Paddy O'Toole,
The other was Mister M'Finnegan," and, speaking quite highly of them, you express a desire to know the author. You will find the entire poem, which is entitled "Pro-Patria," in the "Orpheus C. Kerr Papers," by R. H. Newell; and although mostly in verse, and sometimes very, they contain many beautiful touches of sentiment in the shape of poetry and prose (more especially the latter), the former, war-pieces, and others, that I have ever seen.

There is a rumor filling the air as I write of the fall of Mobile—one step more up the ladder of triumph!

"To our banner we are clinging,
And a song we are singing
Whose chorus is ringing
From each mouth:
'Tis, 'The old Constitution,
And a stern retribution
To the South!'"

Thank God it's coming at last! The end is appointed as the sun is appointed to set; and even our dead soldiers, sleeping under green grass the loving, sweet sleep of the saints and of the hero (dear martyrs to Holy Truth!) are awaiting the way there still. Very truly yours,

WM. S. LEA.

A CITY friend says: "Speaking of feet, do you remember an old notary of one of our Wall Street banks, who used to talk about in his antique dress and 'white choker?' And do you remember his feet? Such feet as marked, I venture to say, as Grant Thoreau's or Receiver's. They must have been covered and heaped up with corns and Bunyons, which prevented the old pilgrim's progress, save at a slow pace. His shoes, tied with leather strings, looked like a couple of leather bags of uncracked shell-barks or walnuts. Take them for all in all, I never saw the like before—nor since."

I guess I do remember the old gentleman; and while he was long remarked his extraordinary "pedal mairs" many and many a time. He was as polite as a "gentleman of the old school;" and once, as I heard, in presenting a notice of protest, said, blandly,

"I've brought you a notice of protest for your note of ten thousand dollars, due to-day at our bank. I suppose it is a mistake."

"Oh no," said the delinquent (for the falling merchant's previous agony was now over), "no mistake: a regular bu'st—a regular bu'st!"

AN UNPUBLISHED POEM BY THE LATE CAPTAIN FITZ-JAMES O'BRIEN.

HERE is another unpublished poem of Fitz-James O'Brien's which is placed in type, as before, from his own manuscript. It is very characteristic of the lamented author; and is nearly as lively and felicitous as C. J. Hoffman's "Sparkling and Bright," on the same theme. Perhaps some of the numerous friends of the poet in the Seventh Regiment may be heard the writer execute it, for he "sang a good stave." It celebrates a wine which, moderately imbibed, "cheers, but not inebriates," as did Longfellow's beautiful lines to Longworth's Sparkling Catawba.

AN ODE TO THE DRIVENEST OF LIQUORS.

Come, archorites, listen; reform your drinking,
And keep your wine-vats to sprinkle your flowers;
I'll teach you a lesson to keep hearts from sinking,
And make ye forget e'en the flight of the hours.
The present is your faint heart will subdoion,
And let it upon your dry lips always reign:
Whatever you can find is of no sweet mind is,
Oh! never quaff any but foaming Champagne!

Though Martial may prate of Falernian mellow,
All nursed in the breath of the fragrant south wind,
And in these days we may find us to follow
A juice far more glowing, more bright and refined.
Not dark Moravians, sprung from the Ægean,
Which Mark Antony sipping Homer exalts in his strain
Nor Spanian welling, of violets smelling,
Could match for one moment our creaming
Champagne!

How brightly it sparkles, with amber light splendid,
And bubbles like diamonds careering along!
And oh! when the first foaming bottle is ended,
How exultant the spirits that roll from the tongue!
Our eyes ligtit are shedding; we seem on air trending;
The vapors of study fly out of the brain;
And eloquence glowing keeps from our lips flowing,
Evoked by the magic of glorious Champagne!

Dariut the Persian gave Semiche fable—
Ambitioned no epitaph better than this
"Here lies great Darius, who always was able To drink off his wine and his foes foil amine."
But if for one hour his soul had the power
To visit this earth upon Marne's fair plain,
I think he would feel a soul more than Asian
The thought that he died without tasting Champagne!

Oh, magical liquor! the alchemist teachers
Must surely have had thy bright juice in their mind
When Celsus and other such mystical preachers
Discovered of their "elixir vitæ" refined:
Even the gods and the goddesses, in tunics and bodices,
That is also celestial hold fabulous reign—
If they got one draught of it, I'd swear by the Prophet
They'd quit their weak nectar and take to Champagne!

Then here's to the flask so enticing and slender!
And here's to the bright wine that sparkles within!
The ancient "old Bachelor" ever shone with such splendor
As a row of them long-necks with helmets of tin.
If I had Localites, and warbling Catullus,
With all the wine-thought of God wine, in my train,
And old Columella,[1] that jolly good fellow,
Oh! I'd pledge them forever in floods of Champagne!

THE PRIVATE BURYING-PLACE.

THE chestnut opens out its fans
The beech unfolds its pleached leaves;
The goldfinch in the hawthorn bush
Its nest with soft moss weaves;
Hard by, the brook (where cresses throng)
Runs, babbling merrily, along.

This is the spot I've singled out
For my long and tranquil sleep.
I'll lie with folded hands in trance,
Through which low tones will creep,
Dim memories of yesterday,
And voices sweet, but far away.

The wind is surging in the firs
(Those red-barked giants of the wood);
The rooks are wheeling round the elms,
That now the blossoms bead;
No other sound, but where the brook
Gurgles around some stony nook.

Here, when my long day's work is done,
I shall lie underneath the grass,
And still, like one in a half-trance,
Shall yet distinguish men that pass;
For sorrows, even such as mine,
Death brings a certain anodyne.

The little airy globes of down
Shall poise above me; and the bees
Drag at the purple clover flowers;
And all day long, high in the trees,
The blackbird, with his golden pipe,
Shall sing of summer ere 'tis ripe.

After a toilsome sordid life,
What majesty there is in Death!
What riches that no king can touch!
What mystery in the ceasing breath!
Sorrows that time hath brought to me
Shans not my immortality.

The trefoil shall grow thick and soft,
And daisies star my emerald pall;
And soft shall fall the summer dew,
And soft the summer shadows fall;
The sunbeams shall point to my grave,
And the plumed grasses o'er me wave.

When I lie deep down in the hold
Of this great planet-ship of ours,
And it shall roll and swim on,
Through its predestined days and hours,
Come storm or tempest, fair or foul,
Warm in my little sheltered nest,

Sprinkle upon me drifting rain,
Or swathe of cold effacing snow,
Or let the sunshine burn and parch,
I shall be still and calm below;
I shall fear neither rain nor sun,
When I and Mother-earth are one.

The generations pass away
Like the winged thistle-down, why then
Fear Death more than the clover does?
We can not change the doom of men.
Then welcome Death, the vows of mine,
They need thy certain anodyne.

"WORTH A LEG."

OUT OF THE DIARY OF A HOSPITAL.

As I stood meditating a quick step came up along the ward—the surgeon who operated some days since on a man's leg, coming to see his case. A keen though kindly face he has, a clear and rapid mode of speech, a quick but not hurried manner, a certain promptness, decision, and self-possession even in his trivial actions.

His patient on this occasion was a square-built, good-looking young fellow of some six or seven and twenty years of age. A thoroughly sound and healthy subject for a capital operation; and he had seemed at first to bear it as well as possible. I am speaking of constitutional bearing: as for courage, doubtless he had the courage of it; but with chloroform at the time, and morphia afterward, it had not been severely tested. But now some days had passed and he was in the first convalescence, to the degree that the state of the limb would lead one to expect. He was depressed; yet restless, fretful, gloomy, and irritable. Much of this might be accounted for by the fact of a young man, in the prime of his health and strength, suddenly made a helpless cripple. But several little incidents led me to guess at some deeper cause of trouble, although I had not yet been able to penetrate his gloomy reserve. I noticed that at night when he grew confused and wandering, as operation cases often do even when progressing favorably, he was more communicative and rambling on about "Jersie," and also about a certain "Dick Hall, whom he mentioned in connection with imagining more remarkable for vigor than for propriety of boisterous.

Moreover, I remarked that every evening when I had thus breathed and heart-softening confession —with which I always commenced our short evening prayer in the ward—the conversation in which we are taught to say to our "merciful Father" that "we have erred and strayed from his ways like lost sheep," and "followed too much the devices and desires of our own hearts," George Dilworth drew the blue-checked coverlet of his bed closely over his face; and more than once during the bookstand and kneeling-stool happening to be placed near to his bed I heard a stifled sob come from him. Still I failed to win his confidence. I never touched he might be during evening prayer, by the time it was concluded and I came round with the sleeping-draughts he was hard, gloomy, abrupt, and barely civil—poor fellow!—as before.

But when I failed Mr. P——, found the way to succeed. How I know not. For, having finished his surgical work with the leg, and scrawled a number of formidable-looking hieroglyphics on the patient's board for the guidance of the dispenser, he sat down on the bedside and began to chat to Dilworth; whereupon I, feeling that the young man was more likely to be open with one than with two, made a pretense of having something to do at a little distance while they conversed. Presently the surgeon recalled me. "Dilworth has a long story to tell you, if you'll be good enough to listen to it," he said to me; "and, listening to the patient he added, "You make a friend of this lady, Dilworth. She'll manage 'Jessie' better than either you or I. I'll be home by 7." Good-by."

And so George Dilworth told me his story. Not all at once—he got excited over it, and had to be stopped, and bid to rest and keep quiet at times —but bit by bit. I tell it partly in my own words, since it belongs to the sick man in part, and the usual fashion as his weakness and my opportunities allowed.

He was the only son of his mother, and she was a widow—a relationship about which there always dwells a certain simple pathos. And she was in many respects, as I afterward found on closer acquaintance, a grand and pathetic old woman. But withal she had been somewhat unmatched in the relationships of her life. She had been too strong and stern for her weak, never-do-well husband; she had been too strict and exacting for her soft-hearted and frolicsome boy. Her loves were intense and genuine, but they were ponderous, and crushed where their should have sustained; and her own heart the while getting sterner and sadder from the want of sympathy and the absence of demonstrative affection, which was in the first instance caused by that very sternness. She was living in what logicians sometimes call a "vicious circle." Doubtless there was some failure on her part in the fundamental virtues of humanity and charity, yet she was in the main a pure and noble woman. With her dwelt Jessie Freeman, a young orphan cousin some six or seven degrees removed; indeed the relationship was so very remote as to make its great remoteness that I twice essayed to unravel it without success. Being pretty, young—about four years younger than George—and consequently thrown into his society, of course they fell in love. It was necessarily a long courtship, since they performed the above little feat at the respective ages of fifteen and nineteen. But at length, after years of true-hearted waiting, the wedding-day was fixed —and the very one which had been chosen was that on which Dilworth had had his leg shattered.

"So then," said I, "the accident spoiled the wedding? Well, that was enough to make you down-hearted."

"Oh, no, ma'am. Twasn't the accident stopped it. That 'ud be little enough to bear. It were stopped long afore that, and all along of my own fault. We'd chosen it two months and more afore, because you see as how it was mother's birthday. We'll be married come mother's next birthday, we'd been sayin all the year; for Jessie and me had her 'mother' as I do. And she'd need, for she's been a good mother to her—ay, and to me, too, I'll own that—though now that I'll call never see her more. But as for Jessie and me, we'd had no thought o' marriage atween us for this last three months," he added gloomily.

"What! did Jessie break it off after all those years?"

"No, 'twern't Jessie," he burst forth. "She wern't never such a —— fool."

"Gently, Dilworth, please. Those strong words don't do any good."

"Beg pardon, ma'am," said the poor fellow, subdued and quiet again in a moment, "but it's true it's wrong—specially before a lady. But I'm that mad with myself I don't know what I say."

"I know you do. Never mind. Go on, and tell me how it all fell out wrongly about this business of yours that looked so smooth."

"Well, m'am, I wouldn't like to seem to complain of my mother, for she's been a good mother to me, and as I was sayin' just now, and to Jessie too. And as I was sayin' just now, and to Jessie too. And as I was sayin' just now, and to Jessie too. And

GRANT'S CAMPAIGN AGAINST RICHMOND.

We give this week a number of sketches illustrating General GRANT's recent movements against the rebel capital. These movements are but a repetition on a more extended scale of the strategy hitherto employed by the Lieutenant-General. General GRANT is confident of final success. Yet he appears to expect success as the certain consequence of any individual movement. When he pushed out both of his flanks a few weeks ago he intended either to get an important position on the north bank of the James, or to obtain possession of the Weldon Road. He succeeded then in the latter of these two objects, while he failed in the former. When SHERIDAN had beaten EARLY in the Valley, and it became certain that LEE would strengthen the latter, then it was GRANT's opportunity to advance again. As before, he sent one portion of his army to attack the rebel left, and at the same time pushed out westwardly against the rebel right.

General BUTLER's army was dispatched to the north side of the James. The position first attacked by this army was the rebel line of works at Chapin's Farm, forming the outermost or third line of the defenses of Richmond. The first work of any considerable importance encountered on this line was Fort Harrison. On page 676 we illustrate the capture of this fort by the Eighteenth Corps. General ORD, crossing at Aiken's Landing, advanced through a wooded country on the Varina Road, and having driven in the rebel pickets from their outposts attacked the fort. The position attacked was one of considerable strength, and mounted with heavy artillery. It was situated just below Fort Darling and was built on elevated ground, but was not very strongly supported. During the attack reinforcements were arriving from Richmond, but they came too late to be of any assistance at this point, though they aided in resisting ORD's further advance, thus preventing the capture of Fort Gilmer. Two or three hundred prisoners and sixteen guns were taken at Fort Harrison. General ORD was slightly wounded in the attack, and General BURNHAM was killed.

The sketch on page 677 illustrates the battle of the 30th, in which General LEE attempted the recapture of Fort Harrison. Both the Eighteenth and Tenth Corps were engaged. The rebels attempted to break through between the two corps, but were repulsed with heavy loss. Two assaults were made: the first was made awkwardly; the second without promptness; and both were disastrous to the assailants.

The illustration on our first page represents General BUTLER bivouacking at the junction of the Varina and New Market Road, after the important victory of the 29th. As a suggestion of his triumph, his tent is decorated with battle-flags captured from the enemy in battle.

On this page we give a portrait of General GODFREY WEITZEL, who succeeded General ORD in the command of the Eighteenth Corps. This officer distinguished himself above all others in the campaign on the Lower Mississippi under Generals BUTLER and BANKS. He received a military education at West Point, where he graduated in 1855 with the rank of Second Lieutenant of Engineers. He is a native of Ohio. He was Chief Engineer in the Department of the Gulf in 1862. After the battle at Baton Rouge, Louisiana, in August of that year, he was appointed Brigadier-General. General WEITZEL is distinguished for the same kind of talent which characterized M'PHERSON.

The illustrations given below and on page 680 relate to the operations of General WARREN's Corps against the rebel right. This movement was one day later than that north of the James. LEE had ordered a good portion of his army to the left, to retake the positions occupied by General BUTLER. Thus his right was weakened; and taking advantage of this, portions of the Fifth and Ninth Corps were advanced toward the Poplar Grove. Poplar Grove is on the South Side Railroad, fifteen miles from the Weldon Road. The first attack, which is the one illustrated on page 680, was made about noon, on a rebel redoubt three miles from the Weldon Road, at Peebles's Farm. This work was carried, and four guns captured. The rebels were driven back to their inner lines. We illustrate below two incidents which occurred in connection with the battle on the 30th. While it was being fought a large number of new recruits arrived on the field from the North. This, as our artist remarks, gave great encouragement to the soldiers, assuring them that they were not left alone to fight their country's battles. The other incident to which we allude is one which excites much admiration and comment in the army. When the First Division of the Fifth Corps charged the rebel battery, Colonel WELCH, commanding the Sixteenth Michigan Volunteers, led his men up to the work, leaped into the fort, sword in hand, and charged the rebels at their guns. He was killed shortly afterward, but his men will never forget that leap.

FORT MORGAN.

WE give on page 685 two illustrations relating to the late operations against Mobile. One of these represents General GRANGER'S army in the rear of Fort Morgan. We have already, in a previous number, illustrated the attack on Fort Morgan from the fleet. The attack from the land side was not less important in the reduction of that work. Besides cutting off the garrison from retreat, the investment by land had this advantage, viz., that a bombardment from stationary batteries is always more successful than one from ships. This was proved in the bombardment of Fort Macon, North Carolina, in 1862. There, indeed, the fleet was compelled to retire, leaving the battle to those attacking from the shore batteries. Fort Morgan is on the entrance of Mobile Point, and was the strongest of the defensive works in the bay.

The other cut represents the attack on the ram Tennessee made by the fleet. Admiral FARRAGUT'S squadron had already battered the ram for the second time when the Lackawanna, the pride of the fleet, came up. She struck the Tennessee a fair blow amidships, causing her to careen over so that the rebels feared she would take in water through her ports. "At this moment," says our correspondent, "a lee gun was fired from the ram (whether by accident or otherwise I do not know), and the steam rushed in volumes from her smoke-stack. The cry went up that the trifters were sinking and had surrendered, but the words had hardly been spoken when her guns belched forth their fierce broadside, rolling the Lackawanna most unmercifully, causing all who saw it to wonder. In a few seconds the noble vessel swings broadside to broadside with the traitors. Captain MARCHAND, full of hope, delivers every gun into his antagonist; their effect is most unacceptable against the iron sides. BUCHANAN can not reply gun for gun. The Lackawanna's men are to eager in their duty to wait for command, and load with superhuman energy. A minute more, and they are separated, the Lackawanna as buoyant and determined as before, though dead and dying lay upon her decks. The rebel still comes boldly on her way, making direct for the Admiral or one of the larger ships. The Admiral, as we all know, meets him only too gladly. Where was CRAVEN then? Could he have had himself stood alongside this craft she would have hauled down her colors in less than five minutes. By this time young Captain PERKINS has worked his way close to the ram, steering by his propellers alone, as his steering gear had become disabled in the beginning of the fight. He fought his vessel nobly: but the Tennessee's heavy plating made strong resistance against his 11-inch shot. He disabled the rebel's steering apparatus, and by continuous gunnery made the unfortunate Virginians the rebels to their confusion. One of his shots, striking the after-port, killed one man, utterly demolishing the gun, and wounded BUCHANAN. With a square of 10 feet he planted a dozen solid shot. The Manhattan fired six shots at the ram, one of which seems to struck. The Lackawanna delivered the fullest ramming blow at the Tennessee. The fight was over. Tournament, the best losing spectators. The Monongahela rushed upon the Tennessee twice; after her came the Lackawanna, Hartford, and Metacomet; no doubt every vessel in the fleet would have punched her had not the noble PERKINS made them cry enough."

SHERIDAN IN PURSUIT—EARLY.

On page 684 we give an illustration of General SHERIDAN leading his gallant army in pursuit of an already routed and dispirited enemy. The General as he rides along the line is greeted with hearty cheers. General SHERIDAN'S present head-quarters is at Harrisonburg, from which he has been sending cavalry in pursuit in every direction. We give one of these expeditions which captured Staunton.

QUITE ALONE.

The continuation of this Story is postponed until next week.

GROWING OLD.

THEY sit together at the door,
Through which, long years ago,
They passed, a newly-wedded pair,
In youth's first rosy glow.
Then her round cheek was red and warm,
Her hair was rippling gold;
His form was stately as the oak—
But now both are old.

The blooming cheek is wrinkled now,
The sweet blue eyes are dim;
But, full of love and holy trust,
They turn to him,
With the calm faith and hope she felt
Upon her bridal day,
When the long future, flower-clad,
Stretched out before her lay.

Now, in the eventide of life,
They watch the purple haze
Grow on the hills, and hang above
Its lofty-reared chain of days;
They see the sun sink slowly down
To gladden other lands;
They feel night coming, and they sit
Serene, with close-clasped hands.

They know that though the dusk is here
There is a place of light,
Invaded not by gloom or shade,
Or the drear, weeping night.
They wait with patience for the call,
To tread the darksome vale,
Unto the heights before whose glow
The morning sun would pale.

BROTHER PAUL

How well I remember the morning my brother Paul left Grassville for his lot of land in "the Heavy Timbers." Every body would call our home Grassville, though we struggled long and hard for Gracefield. However, when the postmaster got into the Gazetteer, we gave it up. Paul was a strong, strong fellow, five feet eight inches high, with a ruddy complexion, and life in his eyes. His brown hair curled, his lips were loving like a girl's, and he was what is called "a mother's boy." There is no better recommendation for a young man. His dress was striped home-made cloth, indigo blue and white, made in the form of a blouse, with wide pantaloons, the which were drawn into leather boots. The blouse had a square collar, which was turned back, and revealed a fine, white, and very neatly-made shirt. I thought I looked like a man when I used say it." The blouse was confined at the waist by a black leather belt. A very full knapsack, with a blanket strapped outside, a very bright rifle and it completed the accoutrement of the recruit. His wathood of his nerves were perfectly tempered steel springs, and as though all means of locomotion were contemptible save those included in himself. He was going for miles, and he would not ride on a "lot of land," which was to become a farm when it was cleared and brought under cultivation. When he had walked twenty miles home to View Hill, His place lay beyond, in the nameless region known as "the Heavy Timbers." The hard wood and heavy growth of timber on his land he laughed at as "live brother," as we used to call him. As he walked on his way, he came to a house in the outskirts of a hamlet, consisting of a saw and grist mill, a clothing mill, and five or six dwellings. Paul was hungry—for appetite remains here, but forces get hungry like ordinary mortals. At the edge of the town a little before he came to the house, was a spring, and a "a deep trough hewn out of the log" to hold the spring—were spining; one was spinning woolen yarn, the other cotton roping. In each case the material was reduced by manipulation to the thickness as thick as the little finger of the spinner. The wheels occupied a room by themselves, on another a man was making shoes, and at a front window a worn, faded, but lady-like woman with failing sight was knitting stockings for sale. Over the door of the boys of this family were something of the nature of a nuisance. The neighbors said the father did not like the noise, and that was why he put it above it himself. Certain it is, they were not trained to useful work, but were sometimes made to "drive" oxen, and "drive" the cows home in the winter, and they "raised Cain" the year round. They were their pantaloons bird-nesting, they made "drive" noises in the streets, they were in all sorts of mischief, and were swimming in dark deep pools in Black River, and always were any thing but "a real blessing to mothers."

In the country where openings alternate with forests, and a village has six dwellings, a traveler is a sort of irregular newspaper. Every body is glad to see some body when some body comes along. There's life in the dog, a quickness and hand in the most sorry of fires. Paul would fain to feel at home at once. The family of Mr. Jo. pph Jones were pleased to welcome a fine-looking youth, he was the son of his father, who was a man of mark among the settlers, and that he was going to "the Heavy Timbers" to take up a home, a handsome lace lot. The girls were not frightened that he was going alone. They even promised to come and see him in due time, as they were only seven miles from his opening that was to be, and there were blazed trees to mark the way, so one of the boys could pilot them.

"But I will come for you," Paul said, gallantly. Mrs. Jones looked a little more worn and weary as the young people talked of a visit to a place of "good fun it would be." Poor lady! she had made just such a beginning with her husband twenty years since. She had helped him open a couple of acres, but he was not persevering. They had sold out years ago, and he had "cleared up" several kinds of business. For the last years he had been a log shoemaking. This he had also "taken up," which means that he had worn out every thing else. He was clever, this Joseph Jones; but there was sorrow in that home, and he caused it. The gentler neighbors said, "Why! he has such a clever way and should be unsteady!" The bolder and less kind said, "What a shame that such a man should drink it!" He was not a habitual, daily drunkard, but at all raisings, log-rollings, at Christmas, and in all times of illness and trouble, Mr. Jones was sure to be "in liquor," to be useless. This terrible infirmity of inability had broken his wife's spirit, and almost broken her heart and all they she was wrinkled, gray, and prematurely old. Some thought books and a superior education had spoiled Mr. Jones; others said more wealth, a larger farm, more agricultural annals, and competing for prizes, would have saved Joseph Jones. But he was not saved, and his family were not blessed by it. Paul should have been in a man of his education and ability.

An hour's talk, a nice dinner, and the miles of these pretty girls, and Paul "jumped his log fence." Did he steal any thing in that home? He took something away with him which he never returned, and which he hid as carefully as if it were a theft. Why is it that the first consciousness of affection lends us to conceal? There is one name that we never can utter freely and cheerfully, though the sound of it thrills the heart with delight, even though it be Smith, Brown, or Jones. Paul took away a great deal from that wayside home, with its large square working-room, and its various workers. Carefully as he concealed what he took, I have an inventory of all. First, a pair of bright blue eyes; next, a great lot of golden curls; then red cheeks, rosy lips, and a form full of springing grace. Emily had a wreath of trailing arbutus in her hair, though it was June, and the blossom is always called the May flower. In this northern region this most beautiful and fragrant bloom is seldom seen till June. Paul carried away the wreath with the sunny curls, and to this day he has a special tenderness for trailing arbutus. Cheerily and lightly he went his way with his hidden treasure to his lot in the heart of "the Heavy Timbers," and he did not sleep that night till he had explored a good deal. Laying his pack down on a knoll of the coming-knoll, he took his rifle and threw it up in the air, and caught it as it came down—many times in merry play that night, because his heart was full of companionship. He found a hill-side against which to build his camp, and the early morning chose on him with axe and shovel, hard at work clearing a space for his shanty. His shovel had a sheet-iron blade, and he had carried it in his pack with some screws, which helped him to fit a wooden handle—holes having been drilled for the screws. Before noon the hill was partially dug away, and posts set with crotched tops to hold poles, on which a thatched roof of birch-bark and hemlock-boughs was to be laid. When this was done, Paul shot a couple of birds. When it was dressed he broiled it. Perhaps he smoked it a little, but, with cold water from the pack, it made an excellent dinner. He then peeled birch and gathered hemlock-boughs, and before he slept he had a comfortable camp. He was not much haggled alone, with the angel in his heart, the owner of the sunny curls, than he could have been in a log-house at the next opening. He had a lonely adventures in his first solitude. He cleared his land, leaving a knoll for his house, and he left some grand old forest trees in the valley for the plain which have set them bud and nature forestalled his labor of love. Trees to most of the settlers were only enemies, to be got rid of. They spared them but the maples, for sugar. Paul left groves of young trees, though it cost him much more in burning. Others turned the growth of ages, and which none can replace, into the stable land, into ashes, and then into salts, and then into money. Paul had his own ideas of building, cuts, a time of treasure and profitable interest, but in his beautiful home at this day is embellished with a glory of trees.

One Sunday morning Paul was getting ready to go to church at Woodville—notwithstanding the common property in the cards and other treasures, he felt sure as if he had them when he saw them in church—this morning he made a kettle of mean meal mush for his breakfast, and set it out of doors to cool, while he dressed. For no one was human in those days who was within hailing distance of civilization. Presently he heard a series of horrid yells, and looking out, he saw a big black bear with his head into the kettle of mush without leave, and who was caught by the bail falling over the back of his neck. No bear can be accidentally killed upright. As Brain was trapped Paul split his head with an axe, and had enough to do that day to dress the carcass. No doubt Emily was disappointed in not seeing him at church, and Paul was disappointed in the absence of beauty of bear's grease, a barrel of salted meat for winter, and a grand bear-skin for his bed.

Day after day our hero went on felling trees, burning them to ashes, and then, with a leach tub made of a hollow log, he leached his ashes, and he boiled away the lye in large cast-iron cullers to lye tie, and made salts. Salts are always silver to the settler. To land is clearer of trees when this money is earned, and gold comes of the rich cleared lands.

He built a house of hewn logs, and the neighbors helped him to roll it up when the time came, and then he got a neat paling around a goodly space for his farm, with a "log-house" in the centre. His fence, the first of the kind in that region, was made by driving sharpened poles into the ground. Next year he built a "worm-rail" fence, and his fence became highly ornamental when it was festooned all over with vines in bloom.

He planted currant-bushes and strawberries, plum-trees, and even rose-bushes, among the great black stumps. He went on for a year improving his farm, and living all on Emily for his fare, all that time, without saying a word to the young lady. He had seen her at church, and he had called at her father's house, but never found opportunity to speak of his love or his hope. At last, with his cabe built, he determined to try to catch his bird, and he accordingly shaved himself in Woodville, and not alone, for the people were all smartly dressed, and out on the street. Paul asked a lad where the people were going, and he said, "To the wedding, be sure."

"Where?"

"At Mr. Joe Jones's."

Paul gasped out, "Which of the girls is going to be married?"

"Why, the prettiest one, be sure." The boy starting to run lest he should miss the show.

Paul went home to his log-house by the way-side. What cared he now for his pretty hewn log-house, with real glass windows, twelve seven-by-nine panes of glass? What cared he for open fire-place, with runners, rose-bushes, and fruit, and great trees, and groves of trees, and sugar orchard? His Eve was gone. What cared he for cooking stove he ordered of the hasty pudding, if it pleased their appetite to do so.

He sat still in his misery, till the thought struck him that he ought to go on and wish the happy couple joy. Like a good, generous youth he rose, and with a sad heart began making steps for entered the house of feasting. The clergyman had just married the couple, and was making a long prayer for their happiness, when Paul found himself at the door of "the best room" in Mr. Jones's square house, which no one ever dreamed of calling a parlor. The happy couple were standing together looking what is called cheap. Their awkward and sheepish appearance made Paul feel a revelation to find that the bride was Miss Seraphina Elvira, and not Miss Emily Letitia Jones. How Paul wooed his Emily, or how happily she was won, I can hardly tell. Years have gone by since that happy wedding. Sons and daughters have grown up in their home. That faded mother has lived many years with Emily, a setting sunbeam upon her children and her grand-children. Though she is sixty years old, she is fairer and fresher than she was twenty years ago. It is sad to think that the kindest thing Joseph Jones ever did for his wife and children was to die. The bird-nesting, out-at-elbow boys took warning by their father, and all came to good. There are no lazy timbers now, but one of the finest farming counties opens their acres.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical

is a PREVENTIVE OF SICKNESS.—The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years convinces him that it is time the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the public. One quart bottle will last a well person one year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring; nevertheless it will save millions from being sick. Is it not better to pay two dollars or less for a bottle of cider than to pay ten or twenty dollars in doctors' bills, and as many hours for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? To prevent sickness use as follows: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Cider to a pint of water, who has made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he has gained ten pounds of flesh in one month, at the first trial. He continues its use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire preventive to sickness in his case. Also, another who has been practicing in New York has used the Medicated Cider constantly for ten years, and has not been sick one day during that time.
Price $2 per bottle (full quart). For sale every where. All orders should be addressed to TUMORS, ULCERS, Skin Diseases, &c.

While any skin disease, tumor, ulcer, or any local disease whatever, exists, the system cannot be cured by use of Brandreth's Pills. Because healthy blood even can not circulate near or through unhealthy or inflamed parts without irritation. Such irritation causes Scrofula. Brandreth Pills at once disinfect. They prevent the blood from becoming more impure; they stop the progress of the disease, and by their wonderful action on the blood, purify it, create all impurities, and the constitution is restored to health. But, perhaps, their greatest recommendation is, they are always safe and harmless: no one takes more pills than are necessary, and no one can take too many. Explicit advice to occasionally use this Great Vegetable Purifier.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase by or address my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP on the box. See upon it B. BRANDRETH in two letters.

American Watches.

The high premium on gold, and the increased rate of duty on watches, have greatly enhanced the cost of those of foreign manufacture, and have been imposible to purchase a good watch, of English or Swiss make, except at a very extravagant price. For the same cause, the cheapest watches of foreign make, the miserable assays and Lepines which flood the country, have nearly risen to the price at which the American Watch Company furnish their well-known "Wm. Ellery" watch—a watch of the most substantial manufacture, and an accurate and durable time-keeper.

Our higher-priced watches are relatively still cheaper. We have advanced the prices of our finer movements but about 25 per cent. since the war began, while foreign watches of the same grade cost three times their ante-war prices.

THE QUAKER COQUETTE.

BY MILLE O'REILLY.

DEAR, coy coquette! but once we met,
But once, and yet—twas once too often!
Plunged unawares in silvery snares
All vain my prayers her heart to soften:
Yet seemed so true her eyes of blue,
Veiled lids and longest lashes under,
Good angels dwelt therein, I felt,
And could have knelt in reverent wonder.

Poor heart, alas! what eye could pass
The auburn mass of curls caressing?
Her pure, white brow—made regal now
By this simplicity of dressing!
Lips dewy, red, as Cupid's bed
Of rose-leaves, spread on Mount Hymettus;
With balm imbued, they might be wooed,
But ah, coy maide! she will not let us!

No jewels deck her radiant neck—
What pearl would reck its hue to rival?
A pin of gold—the fashion old—
A ribbon fold, or some such trifle.
O past belief! the lily's leaf
In dark relief sets off the whiteness
Of all the breast not veiled and kept
Beneath her collar's Quaker tightness!

And milk-white robes over snowier globes,
As Roman maids are drawn by Gibbon,
With classic taste are gently braced
Around her waist beneath a ribbon;
And there unrolled in billowy fold,
Profuse and bold—a silken torrent:
Not hids but dim each rounded limb,
Well turned and trim and plump, I warrant!

O Quaker maid, were I more staid,
Or you a shade less archly pious;
If coherent suit from crown to boot
Could chance uproot your Quaker bias!
How gladly sw in weeds of woe,
From head to toe my frame I'd cover,
That, in the end, the convert "friend"
Might thus ascend—a convert lover!

TO MY BROTHER EXILES.

Is it true what they say of you, brother,
Do you join in the cry that we fail?
Are you leagued with the white-livered rabble
Who hear of the foeman, and quail?

What? Fat in the ranks of the craven!
Down! down! as you would to your God,
On your knees—grow your lips to the clover,
Ask pardon of Erin's green sod.

The old island would crimson for shame,
And shrink 'neath the tread of the stranger,
Did she know that one child she had nursed
E'er skulked in the moment of danger.

Go tear up the record of fame,
Blot out each bright word on the scroll,
Renounce every martyr and hero,
Forget every patriot soul.

Go wipe out the glorious list,
Ay Wateriee, Inkermann, all,
From remotest antiquity's mist,
To Atlanta's thrice glorious fall.

Yes, Agincourt, Cressy, Poitiers,
And Fontenoy even erase;
Once they echoed to Irish cheers,
Now the record in silence efface.

Let Sheridan, Grattan, and Burke
Be named by each craven as more;
You cry for a cowardly peace,
Their souls were for honor and war.

Ay! forget all the masters of song
Who have sung of our smiles and our tears;
Those we allowed our brothers so long
Now look down in disdain at our fears

We've no share in their memory now;
Leave their names to the ivy and moss.
We forfeit our right to the crown,
Too feeble to carry the cross.

Is it true that you truckle to traitors?
Can it be that your soul is so base?
Stand up by my side, and, my brother,
Fling the lie in the slanderer's face.

God knows we've our measure of failing,
Of pain we have suffered our meed,
But we never yet fled from our colors,
Our friend, or our foe, or our creed.

O! keep the sweet heritage green,
As fresh as the turf of our land,
That he taketh a sacrament who
Once giveth an Irish hand.

Our hand has been pledged to this soil
Through prosperity's bountiful years;
We must not, we can not dishonor
Its flag with our cowardly fears.

Bowed down, O! my God, I implore,
On my knees, at the footstool of grace,
Thou wilt stretch out thine arm and avert
This sin from the soul of my race.

OUR FLAG IN '64.

FLING, fling our banner out,
With loyal song and shout,
O'er every home and hill,
By each deep valley's mill,
And let its heaven-lit beam
Round every heart-blood gleam,
And all the passing hour—
This pregnant, fateful hour—
With all an earthly voice
And the thunder of its power.

The toe is striking hard;
But in the castle-yard
Uprise fresh traitor bands
To snatch from our our hands.
From fortress and from sea,
This banner of the free,
To give it coward flight,
That Liberty's dark night,
With all its muttering thunders,
May swallow up its light.

Ay! when our soldiers brave,
On battle-field and wave,
Sprang forth with deadly stroke
Through battle's dinning smoke,
Our standard to uphold,
And save the pure gold,
These home-born traitors cry,
"God grant no victory!"

Though scores of gallant heroes
Round the old flag there lay die.

Rise, then, each loyal man,
Your home horizon scan,
And plant the nation's flag
On hill-side and on crag;
And let your swelling soul
In earnest tones outroll
That brave resolve of old,
When our fathers, rare and bold,
Swore a fealty to the flag
Which never once grew cold.

The flag, the flag bends low,
For whirlwinds round it blow,
And wild, chaotic night
Is veiling it from sight.
So let us every one,
While yet the winds rage on,
Cling round the striking mast
And hold the banner fast,
Till stormy Treason's rage
Be safely pegged by our sage habit of DENVER, October, 1864.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1864.

BROWN, STEPHENS, & CO.

A BRANCH OF THE CHICAGO HOUSE.

NOTWITHSTANDING the fact that the rebellion has been driven into one-fourth of the space it covered at the beginning—that its money has ceased to have any gold value—that its "cradles and graves" have been robbed for recruits—that its hope of foreign aid has expired—and that its chief can not restrain a sullen cry of anguish and despair—yet Governor BROWN of Georgia, and ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS of the same State, the rebel Vice-President, write long letters to say that if we will just give up the struggle and let them have what they are fighting for, we may have peace. Here are two men, for instance, battling for a prize. One has the richer land, and is equally resisting him, and the gentleman with his head in the air has just breath and strength enough left to gasp: "There! if you'll give me the prize, I'll let you off."

The folly of such performances as Governor BROWN's and MR. STEPHENS's is not worth while to discuss. They both take the same ground. They both declare, with DAVIS, that the only possible terms of peace which they will accept are dissolution and the destruction of the Government. They will not hear the name sovereignty of the separate States, or they will fight until they are overpowered. To debate such propositions only is impossible unless the doctrine of the Chicago platform is approved. For both these gentlemen stand upon that noble foundation, that the people declare that the war is and must be a failure; that those at the front should an immediate cessation of hostilities, and an ultimate Convention with all the resources of statesmanship.

That rebels stand by the Chicago platform is not strange, for they helped build it. It is the work of rebels. Copperheads are rebels in sympathies. And it is the Chicago Convention which explains these letters of Governor BROWN and MR. STEPHENS. Those two men know perfectly well the hopelessness of their cause. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS is, and always has been, a thorough "Southern Rights" man. He has valued the Union as the tool of "the South." But he has known that "the South" could not long stand outside of the Union, and therefore his policy was not to secede but to remain and control. He now beholds his prophecy of disaster to "the South" in case of secession amply fulfilled. He naturally wishes to make the best terms he can, and they are—first, separation upon the ground of State sovereignty, which is a confession by the Union that it is overthrown; and, second, reconstruction upon such terms as "the South" may choose to offer to a conquered group of States.

That is what BROWN, STEPHENS, and the other rebel leaders mean by negotiation and convention. That is what the Chicago platform means by armistice. That is what General MCCLELLAN means by the resources of statesmanship. And STEPHENS and BROWN would never have dreamed of uttering such absurd pretensions except for the encouragement given to the rebellion by the Chicago party and platform and candidates. General MCCLELLAN may be the most faithful of citizens, but the folly, the cowardice, the disgrace, the rebel complicity of terms into which he has suffered himself to be adjusted by VALLANDIGHAM, SEYMOUR, and WOOD upon the Chicago platform, by the side of GEORGE H. PENDLETON, upholder of every rebel against his Government and by every foreign enemy of his country, make him, if he be an utterly loyal citizen, certainly the most pitiful figure in America.

THE SOLDIERS' PLATFORM.

THE army has been heard from. The American citizens who are fighting the rebels in the field have laid down their platform. Its top, bottom, and sides are composed of the indignant resolution that the war is not a failure, and that they do not demand an immediate cessation of hostilities. They pronounce in a voice of thunder for the unconditional maintenance of the Union and Government. Their vote goes off like the volley of an army. It rings out like the salute with shotted guns which General GRANT ordered all along the line upon hearing the news of SHERIDAN's victory in the Valley.

The result of the army vote settles forever the doubt whether the Chicago leaders had been able to blind the eyes of faithful men to the true issue. It shows why the party the supports the Chicago appeal of ignominious surrender and MCCLELLAN and PENDLETON have endeavored to prevent the soldiers from voting. The Chicago party leaders know that United States soldiers could not and would not vote for the national humiliation and disgrace. They knew that the soldiers were not deceived, and were not to be juggled by any false talk of "peace" with armed rebels, and therefore the Chicago party were opposed to their voting. There is probably not a man in the United States who voted against allowing the soldiers to vote who is not going to vote in November for MCCLELLAN and PENDLETON.

Such facts are unanswerable arguments. A man who is risking his life in the cause of his country knows instinctively who are the friends of that cause, or at any rate fails to find with the management or details. He may see that it would be better to do this thing or that thing in a different way, but he looks as the whole ground. He watches the action of parties and the general conduct of public men, and he is not likely to suppose that MR. VALLANDIGHAM is true to the cause that ANDREW JOHNSON, who has bravely battled with the rebels from the very beginning, nor MR. VALLANDIGHAM's candidate has fought loyal to the Union, the country, and the rights of American citizens than ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The soldiers have spoken, and they will speak again. They vote for the same cause for which they fight, and therefore they do not vote for Chicago, MCCLELLAN and PENDLETON, and surrender—for Chicago, PENDLETON, LINCOLN and JOHNSON, and victory. That is the Soldiers' platform, and it is the platform of the country.

THE MORAL OF THE INDIANA ELECTION.

ALL have done well, but Indiana has done nobly, and what is the moral of her majority? Her soldiers have been disbanded by the Copperhead Legislature. "If any citizen loves his country enough to fight for her he shall have no vote," said the friends of the Chicago platform and candidates, and the brave men of Indiana who have gone to the field now know exactly who are their friends. But the voters who stand at home resolved that those at the front should not be betrayed; and in the State which was generally accorded to the Chicago party the valid votes cast are sixty thousand majority. It would be fifty thousand if the citizens in the field could vote.

The moral of this majority is plain. Indiana has been the hot-bed of the bloody and treasonable conspiracies of the friends of the Chicago platform and candidates. "Grand Commander" DODD lives in Indiana. The office of the Hon. D. W. VOORHEES is in Indiana, and in it the treasonable letters were found. DR. ATHON, Secretary of State in Indiana, and JOSEPH ROSTINE, State Auditor in Indiana, were leading accomplices of the VALLANDIGHAM plot for helping the rebels and overthrowing the Government.

Therefore the people of Indiana were not deceived. Any fine phrases that may have slipped into the resolutions at Chicago they perfectly understood. They doubtless did not question the patriotism of many who intend to support the Chicago nominations; but they said, "We know exactly what it all means, because we have the party of it here in our own State. It does not mean Union and national honor, and peace with liberty and security for all rights and for all men. The Chicago programme, which our worthy State Secretary and State Auditor support, means an ignoble surrender to the rebellion, and separation, or reconstruction upon such terms as slavery may dictate. That in the Eastern and Middle States may not understand it yet; but we have had an inside view of the office and papers of the Honorable D. W. VOORHEES. The plot has been exposed, our eyes and minds, and we have no excuse for misunderstanding. Chicago means submission and dismemberment. We mean Union and national life and liberty. Chicago would disfranchise the soldiers if it could, as our Legislature, a supporter of Chicago, has done. Be it so. We will protect ourselves and our friends in the army; and even in their absence Indiana shall be true to the Union and Government."

And true she is by twenty thousand majority.

The result in Indiana shows that the people of this country are not conquered, and it shows that when they are not deeply defeat the tendency or the deliberate intention to betray the cause of the country, they will rally overwhelmingly to its support. There has been no more encouraging sign of the fidelity of American citizens to their principles and their Government since the uprising after the fall of Sumter than the late election in Indiana. It is timely and a glorious evidence of the stability and the essential conservatism of popular institutions, to which the crowning testimony will be given in November by the election of LINCOLN and JOHNSON.

"OUT! BRIEF CANDLE!"

THERE is something delightful in the idea of the Copperhead illumination upon "the auspicious result" in the Keystone State.

Three great States vote, the Ohio the Copperheads lose twelve members of Congress. In Indiana they lose four. In Pennsylvania they lose five, and perhaps six. Hurrah! about the jubilant gentlemen.

In Ohio the aggregate majority against the Copperheads will be from seventy to eighty thousand. In Indiana, without the soldiers,—a State that we had supposed they would carry—the majority against them will be twenty thousand or more. In Pennsylvania it will be probably fifteen or eighteen thousand. "Heaven be praised!" cry the Copperheads; "let's light up!"

And why not? It is the last and best chance they will ever have for illumination and rejoicing. Besides, they might have lost every member of Congress in each State, instead of saving twelve out of thirty-three. They wish to make hay while the sun shines; and they are quite right, for it is coming on to rain dreadfully in November.

ALL HAIL, MARYLAND!

THE Maryland soldiers have achieved one of the grandest victories of the war. They have lifted "the despot's heel" from the shore of their Maryland. They have now redeemed their State from the curse of Slavery, and anchored it fast and forever to the Union, whose cause, as the old Continental Congress declared, "is the cause of human rights." Their victory shows that they, too, understand the meaning of this war. They perceive that it is the armed insurrection of the privileged few against the laboring many. They know that the great slaveholder is the direct rival of the free laborer who lives by his daily wages. They know that while the system lasts permanent peace is impossible, and having learned in the battle-field and the Southern prison that the tender mercies of slavery are cruel, they have, with one manful effort, abolished the root of the war in the soil of Maryland. It is indeed "a glorious victory." God bless the Maryland citizens at the front and the Maryland citizens at home!

THE PLAIN CASE.

THE October elections show that, unless all human foresight fails, the election of ABRAHAM LINCOLN and ANDREW JOHNSON is assured, provided the vote of the country can be relied a moment, and that every thing be accounted doubtful until it is secured. The question is so simple that it can not be avoided. Do we mean to maintain our Government, or do we intend to submit to its destruction? In the consideration of this point the personality of the candidates is of very small importance.

Every good citizen knows that there is not a man who wishes to see the rebellion unconditionally suppressed by force of arms who will not vote for LINCOLN and JOHNSON; nor any one who wishes to make terms with traitors who does not support MCCLELLAN and PENDLETON.

If the latter are as uncompromising Union men as the former, why does every disunionist and rebel sympathizer support them?

If they are so devoted to law and good government, why does every threat of resistance to the result of the election proceed from their supporters?

If they are so zealous for order and free speech, why are all the disturbers of Union meetings for political discussion their vehement partisans?

The reply is very simple. They are not uncompromising Union men. MR. PENDLETON is of the political school of JEFFERSON DAVIS in his own confession, and General M'CLELLAN accepts, without a word of rebuke, the nomination of men who call for an immediate armistice.

In a word, MR. PENDLETON is an advocate of supreme State sovereignty, and consequently believes in a "Confederacy" and not in a Union; while General M'CLELLAN shirks the question, and tells Mr. VALLANDIGHAM that they probably mean the same thing.

The October elections show that the great body of the people fully understand what patriotism requires of them, and that is to vote for candidates who are openly, by their words, by their acts, and by the characters and acts of their supporters, unconditional Union men.

THE COPPERHEAD CONSPIRACY.

JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL HOLT has given the country an astounding illustration of the methods of Copperhead "Conservatism" in the cure "more" by armed insurrection at the North in aid of the rebels, and to maintain the national honor by forcibly overthrowing the Government constitutionally elected. The publication of this report is a great and timely service; for it is prepared with the utmost care, from a vast mass of testimony collected during many months and all over the country.

The main points in this extraordinary and startling revelation are, that there was established a branch secret association, bound by oaths, armed, extending throughout the West and into the rebel section, with careful forms and principles, for the purpose of procuring desertion from the Union armies; discouraging enlistments and resisting the draft; circulating treasonable documents; giving intelligence to the enemy; acting for the rebels; furnishing the rebels with arms, ammunition, etc.; cooperating in rebel raids and invasions; destroying private property; assassinating Union men; and establishing a Northwestern Confederacy.

The head of this conspiracy is CLEMENT L. VALLANDIGHAM, one of the authors of the Chicago platform, and the seconder of General M'CLELLAN for the Presidency. Every leading member of it is a supporter of the M'CLELLAN-PENDLETON ticket. Every member abhors ABRAHAM LINCOLN and ANDREW JOHNSON as the rebels hate them. That every member understands the whole scope of the intrigue is, of course, impossible. That every member would deliberately resist the result of a constitutional election we do not believe. But it is managed and officered by men who would, and who hope to persuade and bully others to follow them.

Thanks to the steady fidelity of our civil and military officers in every degree, this atrocious secret has been revealed, and the vast and wicked conspiracy exposed. American citizens will not fail to remark that the chief conspirator is the chief apostle of "Peace;" which means simply bloody civil war in the Free States. They will reflect that the plot was conceived by men who have constantly denounced and maligned the Administration, and have always extenuated the rebels and the rebellion. They will remember that it was soon after Chicago and sat in convention with the chief conspirator that together they set forth their principles and nominated their candidates; and that at this moment they are straining every nerve to secure the election of those candidates, M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON.

These conspirators are the men who talk loudest of "Conservatism" and "Peace." The people will teach them in November that "Conservatism" is unconditional maintenance of the Government, and "Peace" is the armed overthrow of rebellion and the unqualified assent of rebels to the Constitution and the laws.

REBEL TREATMENT OF UNION PRISONERS.

On the 14th of June, 1864, the rebel Congress issued a manifesto concluding as follows:

"We commit our cause to the enlightened judgment of the world, to the sober reflections of our adversaries themselves, and to the solemn and righteous arbitrament of Heaven." The people, in whose name this was said, profess to be peculiarly "Christian," and "high-toned." Their leader, who said that he would rather associate with hyenas than Yankees, was declared by Mr. CLADSTONE to have "created a nation." He and his confederates claim to be especially generous, gentlemanly, and humane. Yet in all the annals of war, confounded be base, cruel, and loathsome as theirs is without parallel. The more the secret rebel history of this struggle is exposed the more inhuman and barbarous it appears, and every justification we have is wanting of the truth of all that has ever been said of the imbruting influence of slavery upon the master class. It found in the story of their treatment of their prisoners of war.

The Sanitary Commission of the United States appointed in May, 1864, a sub-commission of inquiry, consisting of Dr. VALENTINE MOTT, Chairman, DOCTOR EDWARD DELAFIELD and ELLERIE WALLACE, Esq., and J. CLARK HARE, GOUVERNEUR MORRIS WILKINS, Esquire, and REV. TREADWELL WALDEN, the four last of Philadelphia, to ascertain the real condition of the Union prisoners while in rebel hands. The commission has just made a copious, scientific, and descriptive Report, which is certainly one of the most astounding chapters of modern history.

It exposes the treatment of all Union prisoners from the moment of their capture to their exchange, especially in the Libby prison and on Belle Isle at Richmond. The narrative is derived from the testimony of the prisoners themselves, substantiated by the medical investigations of scientific experts; and such a hideous and revolting tale was never told. Its value is completed by an equally careful report of the condition and treatment of rebel prisoners in Union hands at Fort Delaware, Point Lookout, and elsewhere. The verbal testimony of the Union sufferers is appended to the Report.

The harrowing and sickening details we cannot reproduce. They are sad beyond belief, and they are unspeakably disgusting. But we ought any man who would truly understand the scope of this war, and the spirit from which it springs and in which it is conducted upon the rebel side, fail to read this official publication. The narrative of the Report, simply and cogently prepared by the Rev. Mr. WALDEN, presents the case, and the rest is overwhelming corroborative testimony; and the whole is nearly printed and issued by the Sanitary Commission.

We are glad to know that a large number of copies have been sent to England. They will furnish some authentic refutation of the foul slanders upon the Union cause and conduct which are published by the Times and the London Times by Charles Mackay, and devoured with delight by the British party which exults over the Christian civilization of the South and to our friends in England the spirit of the social system against whose armed assault upon the Government the American people are contending. Such friends abroad are a source of wonder as they read. Yet the painful revelation will but serve them to a more persistent support of our enemies. Nothing will avail while they will agree with the Commission that, "until an excuse or an explanation comes, the Government by which these things are permitted, and the people by whose public sentiment such things are encouraged, will stand arraigned for immeasurable inhumanity and criminality before the civilized world."

THE WRECK OF SECESSION.

Upon page 697 of this paper is a vivid picture of the wreck of the great pirate ship SECESSION. She is dashed upon the rocks and is utterly going to pieces in the terrible storm of PATRIOTISM which beats upon her. Smitten by the fatal thunder-bolts of LINCOLN, GRANT, SHERMAN, FARRAGUT, and SHERIDAN, she lies a helpless hulk amidst the waves. One leg of her—STEPHENS's "Hall, only half"—has been shot away. The Chicago Light-house on whose summit blows the national flag, union down. But the foundation of the Lighthouse is the Rock of Ages, and shall not be given by the irresistible waves of popular indignation.

Meanwhile the copper-bound boat, Peace Democracy First, is hugging the shore. SEYMOUR, BELMONT, VALLANDIGHAM, WOOD, COX, and VOORHEES, while PENDLETON stands ready to show how to steer her, are planning a Mayor-Gen. eral's uniform upon a prancing war-horse—that is the favorite device—and the Chicago platform for them to. Among the crowd the most conspicuous wrecker carries under his arm a huge plank—in capitals—General M'CLELLAN—and the hope is that hope the pirate crew may safely escape, to ship for another voyage. But the storm is overwhelming. The captain, PENDLETON, is at the helm, the ship is built in the eclipse, and rigged with curses dark, is going down forever.

LOYAL PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

We have too long omitted to speak of the valuable service of pamphlets, large and small, by the Loyal Publication Society of this city at 868 Broadway. They are generally short and practical treatises upon every point of the great question, prepared by the most accomplished hands, furnished at the most reasonable rates, and placed in the most valuable collection of authentic references and impregnable arguments. Whoever wishes to aid the rebel party may be sure that he can find it under the best management, a fact which the issues prove, and may confidently send his contributions to Mr. GEO. KETCHUM, Treasurer, 40 Exchange Place.

"THE Peninsular Campaign and its Antecedents, as developed by the Report of General M'CLELLAN and other published documents," by D. H. MAHAN, Brevet, Lieutenant-Colonel of Engineers and Major-General of Volunteers. (D. VAN NOSTRAND, New York.) General BARNARD was Chief Engineer of the Army of the Potomac from its organization under M'CLELLAN to the end of the disastrous Peninsular campaign. He was present and plan before or every detail; and his review of the incompetency of the commanding General is crushing. General BARNARD's contemptuous legislature of a policy which almost ruined one of the noblest armies in the world is not concealed; and in this small volume, originally prepared as an article for a review, the reasons of that impatience are plainly stated. The great victory seems to have been almost wantonly thrown away, and the timid sluggishness of the Commanding General, however pure his intentions may have been, did the work of treason. He was eternally preparing to make the final preparations to prepare for a forward movement; and in the midst of the preliminaries for his preparations LEE and STONEWALL JACKSON stormed in upon him and threw him away. GRANT's terrible grip upon LEE, which nothing can shake off, and M'CLELLAN's fears and doubts, and "mud," and "roads," and "impassable bridges for the enemy," and at last die with my men," and foolish "push them to the wall" show the difference between the operations of a soldier whose whole heart and soul are vowed to victory and a General who has no conception of the earnestness and vitality of the struggle, and thinks first of his own reputation. It is the difference between SHERMAN and DON CARLOS BUELL, between PAT TERSON and HALLECK. . . . It is not necessary to subscribe to the hero of the Chickahominy a traitor to understand why he is a favorite with the rebels. An reader who has carefully considered this little volume of General BARNARD's will see why the advantage won by KEYES, SUMNER, and HEINTZELMAN at Fair Oaks was not followed up, and why LEE was allowed a day to retire unmolested from Antietam. It is not M'CLELLAN's fault that he is not a great General, but he ought to be the fate of the best American people if they ever make him Commander-in-Chief.

"DOWN in Tennessee," by EDMUND KIRK (G. W. CARLETON, New York), is a work which is full of the most interesting and startling revelations of the war upon the border. The sufferings of Union men in East Tennessee, long the theme of which FARNOW BROWNLOW has told in some harrowing passages, are here related with a graphic detail and dramatic power which fix them into the memory. Major GILMORE's experience of life and character in the Southern States gives a peculiar value to his observations, and the book is of uncommon eye permits nothing characteristic to escape him. The book has the full flavor of the Southwest, and its portraits of Union men and rebels are full of interest. Mr. GILMORE argues strongly that the hope of the future Union lies in the middle class of the slave States, in the non-slaveholder, but any sparing of what he thinks the best stock, the Scotch-Irish, that of JACKSON and CALHOUN. The great slave-holding class, which has enabled for its own advantage, must, in Mr. GILMORE's opinion, be entirely overcome. The most interesting is the story of his visit to Richmond with Colonel JAQUESS, and the expression of his conviction that the people of the rebel States were ready to return to the Union. Before he was stoked every thing upon the rebellion, know that nothing remains for them but to push on to the inevitable end.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE MILITARY SITUATION.

Since our record of last week closed there have been no military movements of consequence. Hood, at last accounts, appeared to be moving toward the southeast, without having accomplished his object. On the 19th the division of the Tenth Army Corps and a portion of Kautz's cavalry made a reconnaissance on the Darbytown Road. They met with considerable opposition on the line of the Mechlenburg. Having consulted with Grant and given instructions for the movement, General Logan at Huntsville, Thomas at Chattanooga, and Schofield at Knoxville, to show how they were to cooperate, Sherman began his march on the 1st of May. In the same time, according to his own statement, he gave his serious attention to the question of supplies. At Nashville he found the depots well filled, and well-stocked with all that he needed. At Knoxville, however, there was this difficulty, namely, that the railroad from the mouth of East Tennessee was too great a drain upon its supplies. He wisely determined to subsist the troops between Knoxville and Chattanooga from the country.

The concentration at Ringgold and Georgia commenced during the first week in May. At that time General Sherman had an army of 100,000 men, of whom 6000 were cavalry and 254 guns. Both were yet effective. More than one-half of this force belonged to the Army of the Cumberland, under General Thomas, which numbered 60,773 men. The Army of the Tennessee, under M'Pherson, numbered 24,465, and the Army of the Ohio, under Schofield, nearly 14,000. This force was divided into three columns, the strength during the entire campaign. It was commanded in the vicinity of Chattanooga as follows:

General Johnston: Army lay at Dalton, 36 miles southeast of Chattanooga. The position was not much more than half an ocean, as the Federal army, although superior in numbers, by the Rebel Cavalry were commanded by Hardee, Hood, and Polk. The cavalry, Wheeler's command, also numbered about 10,000.

On the morning of May 6 Sherman's army had approached Dalton. Schofield's column, at Varnell's Station, Pitzgield, on the railroad from Chattanooga, and about 12 miles from Dalton. Thomas's centre army lay on the road, west of Dalton, at Gordon's Mill, and that of the Ohio on the left, and more southerly, at Crow Valley Gap, between Sherman and Johnston's lines stretched the Chetoe Mountains, a high, rocky, precipitous range, running north and south, and covering all the approaches to Dalton. The railroad passes through Buzzard's Roost Gap, Tunnel Hill; but the pass, known as Buzzard's Roost, was too strongly defended to be carried by a direct assault. The road on the left this ridge runs six or eight miles south of Dalton, where it crosses the valley of the Coosawattee River, which runs southwestward to Resaca.

On the 7th Sherman's army was in front of Dalton, while M'Pherson completed the ridge and moved on Resaca, a dozen miles south of Dalton. M'Pherson, finding Resaca strongly defended, was ordered by Sherman to "move upon the rear portion of Thomas's." On the whole army, excepting Howard's Corps, was on the right, Thomas's in the centre, and Schofield's on the left. Sherman was much impeded by the impracticable nature of the country, and was compelled to reach Resaca, or that on the 13th Sherman was confronted by the whole rebel army. Johnston had taken up a position southward across the river to destroy the road in the enemy's rear, but the main body of the army attacked the Federals, lying on a battle, May 15th, the result of which was the evacuation of Resaca by Johnston that night. Sherman's army pursued by every available route. Some was accepted in the mean while by Jeff C. Davis's division. Johnston made a feeble stand at Adairsville, fifteen miles south of Resaca; but he crossed the Etowah without giving battle. This river runs westward to Rome, where it joins the Coosawatta, forming the Coosa.

It was now evident that Johnston would next dispute Sherman at Allatoona Pass, forty south of the Etowah. Sherman determined to turn this position, and on the 23d crossed the Etowah, fifteen miles west of Marietta, off the railroad. Johnston was aware of Sherman's design, and there were several severe engagements on the 25th, by interposing his army between that place and Dallas. On the 26th and the two following days Sherman was just about to change his tactics and approach the Allatoona Pass on the left, when Johnston, after a severe fight on his right at Dallas, which was held by M'Pherson, withdrew to the mountains. The movement on the left was carried out June 1, and all the roads by which Johnston could reach Allatoona were held by the Union. Sherman secured Sherman against a counter attack on his left, and placed him safely on the railroad at Acworth, which was occupied June 6. Big Shanty Station, still further south, was occupied June 8, and Johnston then confronted the Twin Mountains, Kenesaw. On the right was Pine, and more to the west Lost Mountain. The rebel army occupied this line of mountain defenses.

Kenesaw, defended by Hardee by way of Dallas had fallen, but must now be accomplished by a new flank movement. The rebel line, however, was of considerable length, and it was determined, before making another movement, to attack Johnston's left. This was done on the 11th of June the 15th there was sharp skirmishing and a heavy cannonade. On the 16th Lieutenant-General Polk was killed in the rear Pine Mountain was given up. On the 17th Lost Mountain was abandoned, and Johnston's line contracted, but covering the approach to Marietta and to the railroad.

The roads now began to be what Sherman calls "extraordinarily bad." The rebels carried some of the 23d Hood's Corps attacked Hooker's at Kulp House, and were routed. The General Sherman determined to make an assault on Kenesaw on the enemy's left, which was made June 27th. Generals Harker, Daniel Dustin, General Hindman, and M'Cook were killed. The Federal loss was 3000.

The rebels, on Wednesday, July 6, retired from their position for an advance to Nickajack Creek and Turner's Ferry, several miles southward. Sherman was apprehensive that this movement July 8, and Kenesaw was immediately abandoned by the rebels. General Johnston's command. Hindman, Polk, and M'Pherson and Schofield were instructed to attack Atlanta, and Sherman himself to attack the crossing the Chattahoochee. But the latter had prudently destroyed the bridges. By the 9th the army on the Ohio and Federal army moved to the Chattahoochee River.

Johnston, who had made the most extensive preparations to oppose his advance, Sherman threw Schofield's corps across the Chattahoochee, and Thomas across on the 9th. Garrard at the same time destroyed the factories at Roswell, and on the 10th the army was united. M'Pherson was to cross. Another crossing was established at Howard's Ferry, and Thomas by only a little difficulty, but a short rest was afforded the troops. On the 18th Howard's command, Stanley's division, centering on it, broke up the West Point Road, rendering it useless to the enemy.

Until the 20th there were being collected at Atlanta and Marietta. On the 19th the army advanced. Schofield's corps moved on Decatur, and the left wing of the army followed, the Army of the Tennessee moving around by Decatur. The rebels were retiring on the line of Atlanta. Thomas at the same time crossed Peach-Tree Creek north of the city, and Howard's corps was ordered to keep between him and Thomas near the Buckhead Road.

On the 20th the enemy came on in his centre and attacked Sherman's right centre at its weakest point. He was repulsed, and Sherman ordered a line to be laid down south, while his own was only 1500, most of which had been thrown back. General Logan had been in command of Howard and superseded by Hood. The enemy were strongly reinforced during the battle.

On the 21st the rebels attacked again, this time on the left, when Sherman had obtained a commanding position. Early in the fight M'Pherson was killed, and was succeeded by General Logan. The battle was made by Hood's Corps, from Bald and Howard's in front. The enemy gained considerable ground in the early part of the day, capturing several guns, but was afterward defeated and driven back to the position held by Sherman's line. The rebel loss was 8722.

Then followed the siege of Atlanta by Sherman and Hood. On the 22d Sherman began to move his army from the east to the west side of Atlanta, and by the 26th this movement was executed. Hood, finding the battle of the 28th occurred, in which, as we have stated, the enemy were repulsed with severe loss. During this battle our loss was less than 600, while that of the rebel army is admitted to be considerably more. Until the night reached from the Chattanooga Road, just north of Atlanta, nearly to East Point, on the Macon Road, and the Macon railroads. But it was impossible in the night to make the necessary communications. On Wednesday, August 31, issued his orders for the entire army to cut loose from the Chattanooga Road and to raise the siege of Atlanta, the Twentieth Corps alone being left to hold the line of the railroad. Whatever the cavalry's being sent very much facilitated this movement. The entire army was now on the Macon Road, between Jonesborough, where Lee and Hardee were, and the rest of the rebel army at Atlanta.

On the 31st the rebels came out from Jonesborough and made an attack, which resulted in their defeat. The next day, September 1, Jonesborough was attacked and taken by Sherman. The rebels evacuated the line around Atlanta, which General Sherman immediately occupied, making it a grand military post.

MARYLAND.

Maryland has adopted the new Constitution, abolishing slavery in the State, by a majority of about 1000.

FOREIGN NEWS.

EUROPE.

THERE has been in London great alarm in prospect of a serious money panic. The Spectator says: "The country has been drained to the bare bone by a great deal of unwise demand, a great deal of paper discounted represents no real transaction, and the moment the discount is refused the country is to diminish rapidly, the continent is unwilling to send us gold, and we must pay it, and we should the banks begin to go we may look for a crash. Failures are multiplying, and the Government of the Bank of England and London, which will involve an ultimate loss of millions to the shareholders, has not yet ceased to be necessary."

The London Times regards the victories of Sheridan as certain to benefit the Government.

The French Italian Convention has decided that the Pope shall not be forcibly dispossessed of his temporalities. This takes away half the income of every citizen of Turin, and to the Pope it is equivalent to the diminution decreed by the measure broke out in open violence. The troops in the city were called out, and the rioters were fired upon. Without orders they returned the fire. Several persons were killed.

In regard to the Danish Question the Spectator says: "The correspondence between Lord John Russell and Count has been forbidden, exports have been prohibited, and fifty thousand men are thrown upon the winter's resources for the winter. In fact the country is to be gained in order that the other Powers of Europe may receive contentment at Copenhagen. The robber orders his victim's wife to be whipped in order that he may pay up quickly. Nothing so atrocious has been done in Europe since 1815, and the civilized world will be astounded at the apathy of every Government. Had Jellalad one range of countries the Prussian would not have dared to do it."

The Greek Government has decided to abolish its Upper House, however, to Greeks has not the same necessity or use as in the country, and it has not the same influence on the Lower Chamber, describing that body of a great amount of conservative ability.

ROGER B. TANEY,
LATE CHIEF-JUSTICE, U. S.

ROGER BROOK TANEY, the late Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, was born in Calvert County, Maryland, March 17, 1777. His ancestors immigrated into that State two centuries ago. They were English, but of the Roman Catholic faith.

Educated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pennsylvania, he was admitted in 1799 to the bar. He practiced law for a short time in his native county, from which, in 1800, he was elected a delegate to the General Assembly. He took up his residence at Frederick in 1801, and was elected State Senator in 1816. At the age of forty-five Mr TANEY removed to Baltimore, where he resided during the remainder of his life. He was appointed Attorney-General of Maryland, holding that office for four years, at the expiration of which term he was appointed by President JACKSON Attorney-General of the United States.

This, it will be remembered, was the period when there was great political strife on the subject of a United States Bank. Two years after his appointment, in 1833, JACKSON had determined upon a singular measure to carry out his policy. Mr. DUANE was then Secretary of the Treasury, and, thoroughly in favor of the Bank, was therefore opposed to the policy of the President. Without the knowledge of his Cabinet, JACKSON instructed DUANE to remove the public deposits from the United States Bank. The Secretary declined to follow this instruction, and was, in accordance with JACKSON'S usual manner, summarily deposed. TANEY was then appointed Secretary of the Treasury, and immediately had the deposits removed. TANEY had been appointed by the President, but as the appointment was certain to be rejected by the Senate, it was not submitted to that body until the latest moment.

Mr. TANEY at this crisis resigned, but within a year was appointed by the President ASSOCIATE-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in place of DUVALL, resigned. This appointment also was rejected by the Senate, much to JACKSON'S chagrin. But it was not long before Chief-Justice MARSHALL was so good as to die, and leave vacant a still higher office in the President's gift. The Senate had been somewhat remodeled in the interval, and when the appointment of TANEY to fill the office vacated was submitted to that body it was duly confirmed. Chief-Justice TANEY took his seat on the Supreme Bench in 1837, at the age of sixty.

Judge TANEY has held this high and honorable position for twenty-seven years. During this time he has administered the official oath at the inauguration of seven Presidents.—His decisions have been always respected, and, with the exception of the famous Dred Scott decision, have been subject to no animadversion.

Chief-Justice TANEY died at Washington October 12, 1864, at the age of eighty-seven. He is buried at Frederick, his former residence.

THE BATTLE OF DARBYTOWN ROAD, OCTOBER 7, 1864.—[SKETCHED BY WILLIAM WAUD.]

THE ARMY OF THE JAMES.

We give on this page, and on pages 692 and 696, sketches relating to the ARMY of the James. THE BATTLE OF DARBYTOWN, illustrated on this page, occurred on Friday, October 7. BUTLER'S extreme right was held by KAUTZ'S cavalry alone, though not far in the advance of TERRY'S division. In the opening between the woods on the right and those on the left is disclosed the Darbytown Road, on which KAUTZ'S cavalry was driven in. Through the woods on the right the rebels, led by HOOD, GARY, and FIELD, advanced to flank TERRY'S division. From the woods on the left their artillery maintained a heavy cannonade. In the fore-ground appears a section of the Federal intrenchment seized from the rebels in previous engagements. The enemy made two attacks, in both of which he was repulsed with great loss, and on retiring to the Darbytown Road he was attacked in flank, but succeeded, under cover of his guns, in drawing off his men.

An illustration on page 692 represents the PENNSYLVANIA SOLDIERS VOTING at the Head-quarters of the Army of the James. Our soldiers do not by fighting our battles cease to be citizens, but are even more interested than others in the maintenance of the civil institutions for which they are ready to give up their lives. There can be no doubt as to the loyalty and sincerity of these men.

On the same page we have another scene at Head-quarters—viz., at the Guard-House, where deserters and rebel prisoners are gathered together, in various attitudes and costumes, about their wood fire. The two elderly men—one with the silk hat, and the other at his side—are the two clerks in the Treasury Department at Richmond who were out on picket duty, and walked accidentally into our lines. They will be among the prisoners that General BUTLER proposes to place in Dutch Gap, in retaliation for the ill-treatment of our colored soldiers who have been placed in labor at Fort Gilmor.

The sketch on page 696 represents the scenes attending a NIGHT AFTER A BATTLE. The night is usually spent in bringing in the dead and wounded. Sometimes this is not possible, and the sufferings of the wounded are in such cases pitiable, ending not unfrequently in death.

A GROUP OF CAVALRY OFFICERS.

On our first page we give a sketch in which are grouped together three of our most distinguished cavalry officers, namely, KAUTZ, MERRITT, and WILSON.

AUGUST V. KAUTZ was born in Germany. He was appointed to the Military Academy from Ohio in 1848, and four years afterward graduated with the rank of Brevet Second Lieutenant of Infantry. He has performed distinguished services in many a raid during this war. Ill-luck has sometimes attended him—as in the assault on Petersburg, in which he was not properly supported; and also in the late repulse of his cavalry on the Darbytown Road, where he was posted in a situation which is never tenable by cavalry. His daring reconnoissances have penetrated nearer to Richmond than our troops have otherwise been able to reach.

Generals MEREDITH and WILCOX have been prominently engaged in SUMNER'S recent campaign, and have contributed materially to his victories in the Shenandoah Valley.

ALBERT DURER.

THE artists live within the clouds,
And shadow forth a purer
And fairer life than that of ours:
So lived old Albert Durer.

But lest old Albert should begin
To think him more than human,
God gave him, to subdue his pride,
A very angry woman.

And when he fashion'd angels' heads,
And painted eye and lip,
Was cured of his too heavenly dreams
By this morose Xantippe.

Within a little room up stairs
Worked Albert late and early;
Beneath he heard the angry spouse
Tune chaos to rattle surly.

For, like a kite, he sought the sky,
And soar'd on wing elastic,
Until she pull'd the string, and brought Him down to cares domestic.

And still within his placid face
You see the self-same expression
Poor Albert's story teaches us
A somewhat useful lesson:

For when I envy him his fame—
The cities' fame and favor,
I look at home, and am glad That I'm not Albert Durer!

PEGGY HOOD.

A GIRL'S STORY.

PEGGY HOOD was our nursery maid. We were very small, and I have no doubt, very troublesome children when she came among us; but she was never out of temper, or seemingly aware of doing what we wanted done, whether our wishes turned toward a story, a new doll's dress, or a romp in the garden. An admirable manager of children, my mother said, and I remember wondering what she meant. Peggy's art consisted, I think, in never letting us see that she had any idea that we were managed. She taught us our letters and the Church Catechism, also some hymns. Sometimes she read to us, and seemed almost as much interested in the stories as we were ourselves. And she had the secret of pretty, round, kind face that children always like.

From the first my mother took a fancy to her and engaged her despite the warning of almost every lady of the village. The Hoods were a tag set, they said, and they wondered that Miss Payne could think of putting such a person in a responsible a situation. For all answer my mother said, "I like the girl's face, and mean to try her." And so Peggy came into our nursery one morning, and staid there apparently well content. She was one of the clean, tidy, usually comfortable, sort that she a lady. An honest, womanly girl, with frank manners, a pretty face, and a decent, common education—very all. And that was enough. "For," said my mother, "I can bring my children up and teach them accomplishments myself. I only want a help." Peggy Hood was to be that very best in our nursery.

The love for hunting something to the death is inherent in some natures, most, I fear. When nothing else is to be had, they get hold of some poor body's character. No one could say any thing against Peggy; but her father was a man to talk about, and the poor girl was never mentioned without the remark that "the father of a bad stock." When she was a little child he had been a young man in the employ of a merchant of the place, who, taking a liking to him on account of his handsome face (Peggy looked like him, every one was glad to say), had trusted him—though at first his position was almost a menial one—until he was deeper in his confidence than the eldest clerk of the establishment. Soon said through habits of dissipation, others through gambling, young Hood was found to betray his trust at last; and he absconded with an immense sum of money. One morning, when missing matters in such a silly way that the police had nothing to do but to walk quietly up to him, collar him, and take the proofs of the transaction from his pocket. The fiend who tempted him had deserted him in his time of need, and it seemed as though he was deserted, too. So Peggy said who told me the story. He was punished, but, through the intercession of his employer, who had liked him very much, not severely as matters then went. What became of him, and whether he lived or died, no one knew. Then there was a story among the girls of the seminary, where Peggy had earned board and tuition by house-work, that he came to see the poor girl now and then shyly, and that once Miss Richards, the assistant, caught her talking to him from the window. As for the poor mother, she died, but not before people said very hard things of her. She was starved into wrong-doing, I fancy. And poor Peggy was an orphan when Miss Richards took her as a sort of slave. She always called it "an act of charity." Mother said it was one of economy. There Peggy learned to scrub and to read, to wash dishes and to cipher, and, being pretty and clever, brought the taunt of being of a "bad stock" upon her oftener than she would by being ugly and stupid. "As though," mother would say, hugging baby closer—"as though this child would be to blame if I were to steal something. It is bad enough to have such a father without punishing her for it also." And so my mother was good to the girl, who loved her very dearly. And no one in the house ever thought of blaming the kind ingenue while mother took Peggy Hood, as it were, under her protection, except our great-aunt Glengarrow, and as she found fault with every thing no one wondered.

It was annoying, however, when the old lady lost her handkerchief or her gold glasses, as she often did, for she was forgetful, to have her hunt into the room with the most ominous countenance to whisper:

"Ellen, you'll have to have Peggy Hood's trunk searched this time. I always said no good could come of that family."

The last article always turned up, however, and Peggy never heard of the suspicion, poor child! One thing is Peggy's comfort now and then, and not only. She was a sort of miser. Her wages were paid regularly, and were good, but she seldom spent a cent; she hoarded, and pinched, and made over old dresses which were given to her without buying a new one. So much so that my mother often said:

"I've a mind to spend Peggy's money for her, and lay in a stock of comfortable clothes for the silly girl. Economy can be carried too far."

As for aunt Glengarrow, she only said "acquisitiveness was the ruin of Jack Hood, as it will be of his daughter. I must watch my diamonds." For the pride of grand-aunt Glengarrow's heart was a set of cotly diamonds—ring, brooch, and earrings, which had been left her by her grandmother. Mother thought Peggy was jealous of the ring, and in a bunk for a rainy day. I believed that she was "saving up" for some very fine clothes, as I had often saved my pocket-money to purchase a doll or toy, carriage and horses. It was father's custom when he gave the servants to give them change in an envelope to take to her. So I always particularly noticed the day, and always expected to see poor Peggy very fine suddenly upon the bright Sunday. But month after month passed, and still Peggy Hood went to church in mother's old brown merino, with the ribbon that breathes that "faded darned—dress that had been tucked into the rag-bag long before.

One winter's evening—a rainy one, with a damp warm air instead of the bracing cold which we expect at that season—I had been put to bed early, because my father came home to tea, it having been discovered that I had taken cold and was feverish. I had a fearful headache, and nauseous drugs pilled and was tucked in in one of dear old grandma's blankets; but I was not properly thankful, I fear. But I could see a small, pitying face, framed with my brothers, who were spinning a humming-top there.

Mother came in after tea and kissed and petted me, and, while I was tossed and restless, said: "Give Peggy her money," she said; "and, Peggy, I'd advise you to get a new cloak—a good warm one, your shawl is not thick enough for the season."

"Thank you, ma'am," said Peggy, turning scarlet as she put the envelope in her purse just as it had. She made no answer to the advice, but as I said to myself, "She doesn't mean to buy one," and I think mother thought so too, for she looked a little provoked, and I remember she kissed me and went down stairs. After she had gone poor Peggy began to cry, and I heard her say, very soft and very softly, fancying, I think, that I did not notice her. Then she busied herself putting away all untidy things in the room, folding the paper and shutting medicine bottles into the chest upon the table, but with such a poor, sad face that I have never forgotten it. After a little she said: "I shall you be lonely if I leave you?" I said "No;" and she took up her work and went out, but I was so weak and nervous that I began in a few moments to see something white or uncanny black in every corner as soon as the door was shut. I lay awake, listening to the ticking of the clock, until it seemed itself into words, and watched the hands as they slowly moved until I fell asleep, and was by and struck. Then I heard mother and father pass the door.

"I must look at Violet," said mother.

"Nonsense," said father. "You'd wake the child my dear. Sleep is just what she wants," and they went on. Then I fell into a heavy slumber, and Peggy passed the door, and I heard aunt Glengarrow mentioning overhead between her bed and bureau.

"Peggy will come out of it," but though I waited another hour Peggy had not come yet. I began to be wretched. My night-lamp was burning dim. Some hot horrid thing with wings was buzzing in the room. I was afraid to look into the corners at all. And in desperation I resolved to arise and look for Peggy.

I put on stockings and a shawl and took the little night-lamp and made down stairs. I was not sure to go, for Peggy's work was the crimping of some cap ruffles for my aunt, and this she always did in the kitchen. Once frightened by bright fire and in her presence I should be safe.

Over the cold door and down stairs I went on tiptoe, by way of light fell through the door of the kitchen door. I opened it and peeped in. On the table a light was burning, and there lay a white parcel, which looked like a new dress and cloak, but Peggy was not there. Where could she have gone? I went to the fire for protection as well as warmth, and there ill and miserable Peggy crying began to cry. My whimpering wail had just begun to sound through the kitchen when the outer door opened and Peggy came in. She had a shawl over her head, and it was dripping with rain drops. Her fire was swollen with weeping also, and in her hand she held her purse; it was empty; the sides lay loosely against each other, instead of being pulled out by the bank bills as it had been when I saw it last. She did not see me crouching by the fire until the door was bolted; then, when she did catch sight of me, she fell into a chair and began to trem-ble and turned as white as a sheet.

"How did you come here, Miss Violet?" she cried. "Why did you get out of your bed and come down into the kitchen to-night? How long have you been here?"

"Only one minute, Peggy," I answered. "I was so frightened alone."

"I wasn't my fault, my dear," she said. "I had to wait to—to finish those caps, you know," and then she turned as red as she had been pale before.

"Come up stairs," she said, in a quick, sharp voice, unlike her usual one, and she caught up the cap box and the lamp. As she did so she dropped her purse. I picked it up; it was empty.

"Have you lost your money, Peggy?" I asked.

"No, it's safe," she answered, and caught the purse from me and slipped it in her pocket. I felt afraid of her, and went up stairs behind her, wondering what I should do if she were always to be so cross.

When we were up stairs she said: "Miss Violet, your mother would be very angry at you for coming down stairs when she told you not, and at me for not watching you better. We had best not say any thing about it."

I was willing enough, but when I waked up again in the night I heard Peggy, lying beside me, praying to God to "forgive her for teaching the little darling a sin, and soliciting very bitterly. Could she mean me? I wondered. Of course I know that she did now, but I was very small indeed then. I never told anybody about the hunt I did not tell her at that time—and I kept Peggy's secret in keeping my own; for she had a secret. I knew, or she never would not guess at all the ruin that white night. What it was I could not guess.

Time seems long to a child. Peggy was her own pleasant self again during the month I forgot all about that rainy night, or only thought of it as a dream, and remembered that I had happened fifty years before. Only one thing happened which seemed strange. Once, while Peggy was playing with us in the nursery, she left her sewing, with sliced apple for dinner on our china play tea-things, a ribbon which she wore about her neck caught in the work, and I saw something gleaming at the end of it.

"Oh," what is that?" I exclaimed.

She put it into her with a sudden start.

"It's only a ring," she said.

"Why don't you wear it on your finger?" I asked.

"It's too large; I should lose it," she said. And then she burst into tears.

"What a child I am!" she said. "The ring was given to me by some one who is dead."

Her father, I thought, but I said nothing; for I had heard the story of the poor man's crime, and felt as though it were wicked to be mentioned in polite society.

On the 23d of January three important events occurred. Firstly, we were invited to a party—a very grand sort of an affair for children; secondly, my father brought home a present early in the morning, and gave them a gift besides—Peggy's was a dress pattern, and not money; and, thirdly, grand-aunt Glengarrow was missing from her bed in the night, and was found in the cellar—a cellar with a brick floor—people who pride themselves on being able to plunge in head foremost when the occasion requires it are rare, and despise every one else who can not do so. And on this bitter first of January she went into the bath-room, and after she arrived, could not stop it. The room was built in a very peculiar fashion below the level of the house, and steps went down into it. Of course, in a little frightened hurry the town was not supplied with water, but this had been contrived somehow by means of pipes from the river. Aunt Glengarrow grew bewildered, and could neither open the outlet nor stop the inlet. When mother contrived to open the door—mother had the key—for aunt had lost hers on the floor—the water was up to her neck. She was not much the worse for the fright, however, and by the afternoon set her self right. Peggy showed herself very anxious to do all she could, and was busy in grand-aunt Glengarrow's room when the latter returned, and rushing her for fear with hot towels for over an hour. The old lady was gracious enough to say she was "an obliging girl after all." And this was something astonishing for her. After the fright—for aunt had declared that she was sure she should certainly die on the point of fainting—it took some time to collect our scattered senses. My hair was to be curled, and my frock made for the party, and mother decided that a hair-dresser could do it best. So about three o'clock she sent us across the village with a note to the hair-dresser, Peggy giving her directions. To get to Mr. Twist's we were obliged to cross the bridge which divided Mapletown into two parts, upper and lower. Upper Mapletown was the north of the river, and was considered most genteel. In Lower Mapletown the store and the tavern and the post-office stood, with the plainer houses occupied by the poorer people. On our side every one dwelling was of the "residence."

Mr. Froudit's residence was close down by the water's edge; indeed the ground on which the bridge rested belonged to him. There were splendid trees there; two great elms tangled their branches together, making an arch-way, and there were bushes and flowers and grass, of course, the trees were out of our romantic bridge on our side. The other was bald and bare, with only hard gray road to rest upon. The bridge itself, of course, the trees were bare, but the trunks were very large, and the wood of the bushes strong and plentiful. Anyone could see that Lower Mapletown was more populous, and from the bridge could not have been seen at all.

Just as we reached the spot, John, who had very sharp eyes, looked back.

"There comes Peggy," he said. "Mother has sent her after us. I tell you what, Vi!—let's hide behind these trees, and when she passes jump out and scare her."

We agreed. John and little Fred took one tree, and I another, and we waited. I could see the road beat; the boys had a better view of the bridge.

Peggy came on in a great hurry. When she was close by I said, "Now, boys!" But John whispered, "Stop a minute."

"Violette! I say, Violette I don't stir. There's an awful old kidnapper on the bridge, coming as fast as he can!"

I stretched my neck, and there, sure enough, he was—a dreadful man, all rags, and with a bloated face and bloodshot eyes.

"Oh!" gasped John, "he's going to speak to Peggy!"

And so he did.. But not to ask her for her money or her life, or any thing of that sort. What he said was:

"I thought you'd never come."

"I couldn't help being late," she answered "and I must make haste to get back again."

"What have you got for me?" said the man.

"The usual sum," said Peggy. "They gave me a dress, and a piece of money, like the rest, for a present."

"This is not enough," muttered the man, "I say, girl, I must have the ring. I can get something for that. Confound it, if you knew the dreams I had last night you'd not refuse. I'm sure to win. Luck's been against me so far; but we'll ride in our carriage yet. Give me the ring, I say."

Poor Peggy began to cry.

"Any thing else, any thing else," she sobbed. But he clung to her hand, and, though only gently a blow—and caught at the ribbon at her neck. It broke, or came untied, and he had the trinket in his hand before he knew what it did. Peggy sat down on the roots of the tree, with a miserable moan, and held her face on her knee. She had only been seated there a minute when the man came back. He stooped over her, and lifted up her face.

"It's for your own good," he said. "There, don't cry. I'll win, I'll win, I'll win, and then, with such dreams, you shall have it back. I don't rob you to keep it myself. Why, look at my rags? and I live on a crust and a bone. No one will be rich together yet."

He kissed her on her forehead, and she sobbed, "Oh, God help and save you!" and they parted—he crossing the bridge, she going back home.

We were on the Q. Twist's, and went home after our hair was done, and had not much chance to talk over the matter that night. But at breakfast-time next morning John, dinner after a description of the supper at the party night before, burst out suddenly,

"Didn't our Peggy meet a horrid old kidnapper on the bridge, Vi?"

"A kidnapper," asked mother, with a laugh in her voice.

"Yes, ma," said John; "and she gave him a diamond ring, and he kissed her after."

Grand-aunt Glengarrow uttered a little shriek, and started up from the table.

"She's got it back," she cried. "I knew no good could come from those Hoods!"

I felt a presentiment, and rushed up stairs. I began to sing.

"It was Peggy's own ring," I said. "She wore it around her neck by a ribbon."

"Was the man on the bridge," said mother. "Was he a lover?"

"Oh no!" I answered. "He didn't look like one at least not like the one I saw on the play."

"I bet you he was; 'cause he kissed her," said John; "but wasn't he funny?"

"I don't half like this," muttered mother.

Just then back came aunt Glengarrow.

"It's gone," she screamed; "the ring is gone. I'm an old and easy-going sister, but the ring is gone—worth four hundred dollars—five stones in it. I told you I'd have no more of such a bad stock."

Father arose, and put his hand on his aunt's arm.

"Now, auntie," he said, "be quiet; you'll find your ring, as you always your fan and your handkerchief a hundred times."

"I shan't," said the old lady. "Do you suppose I have diamonds of that value lying about loose?"

Father went on as though she had not spoken—

"And before you take away the girl's character you must be certain. Not a word until the house is searched."

Father was master. All that day was spent in the search of every room, every box, every drawer. The very carpets were turned up; but no ring was found.

At night a report was made to that effect; and grand-aunt Glengarrow was so eager to be restrained. Still my father had his way.

Into the parlor, with closed doors, Peggy Hood was summoned to the clerk of every one.

She came in, neat and pretty as ever, expecting some directions for the night, such as were sometimes given if we were sick and well. Her "well, ma'am" sounded pleasant and unsuspicious.

Mother burst into tears.

"Peggy," she said, "remember I don't believe it. You may be a poor silly girl; but you are not a bad girl."

"Bad!" cried Peggy. "What do you mean, ma'am?"

"I mean you are a thief!" cried aunt Glengarrow. "Like father like child. What have you done with my diamond ring?"

"Hush, auntie," said father. "Now, Peggy, listen. A valuable ring belonging to Mrs. Glengarrow is missing; circumstances appear to point to you as the culprit; we have proof that you have had a ring in your possession; that you gave one to a man near the bridge on New-Year's Day. I am willing to believe you sorely tempted—to be as lenient as possible. Tell us where the ring is, and you shall be mercifully dealt with."

Poor Peggy stared at my father, and her very lips grew white.

"I never saw Mrs. Glengarrow's ring, except upon her finger," she said. "Oh, Sir, do you think so badly of me?"

"Hypocrite!" cried aunt Glengarrow. "You wicked woman. I suppose you'll deny being at the bridge at all."

"She won't do that, for I saw her," said John.

"No, master John," said Peggy, "I was there."

"And you met a man and kissed him and gave him something."

"God help us both! Yes."

Poor Peggy clasped her hands as she said this. And my father asked, sternly, "What did you give him?"

"Money," answered Peggy—"money and a ring. It was my own; I have had it three years. You've seen the ribbon round my neck, ma'am."

"A ribbon and a ring," said aunt Glengarrow.

"Can you prove this?" asked my father.

"Miss Violet saw the ring."

"I did," said she.

"After she'd stolen it," said aunt Glengarrow.

"It was on Wednesday," cried Peggy, eagerly. "I'm sure I don't know what day of the month it is," said aunt Glengarrow.

"Peggy," said my father, "if you speak the truth see if this man and let him show the ring you gave him."

"I can not," said Peggy.

"Tell us where he is."

"Never!" answered Peggy Hood; and the tone was so solemn that it sounded like an oath.

"Then you have only your own word for evidence?"

"It is all Sir. Oh, can't you believe me?"

"I could, Peggy," said father, "but appearances are much against you, and I am not the party most interested here. I am sorry for you; but unless you tell me that man's name, and where to find him—"

"I can't do that, Sir," said Peggy, with a sob.

"And to screen one disreputable, idle, and lifelike character and friends," sobbed my mother.

Peggy answered not one word.

So on a long silence short, and Glengarrow used her power, and in a few hours Peggy Hood was arraigned on a charge of larceny. Mother and father testified to her good character and behavior, and what John had to tell, child as he was, seemed proof sufficient, and there was that feeling against her, the old story of her father's crime, and the belief that she came of a bad stock and could not do well. Poor Peggy Hood was found guilty.

When I found that all I had to tell about the ring I had seen, which I thought would save her, only went to prove that she had only received the diamonds in her possession, I was so horrified that it made me quite ill. I fainted, I think, and they took me home; and I was feverish and delirious for a good many days. When I was better, and first able to go down stairs in my little pink dressing-gown, ruffled all around by Peggy's own hands, I found the house in some commotion. The masterpiece in the drawing-room was stripped up, and there had been quite a flood on the lower floor. It had been boiled out, however, and a man was there examining the roof.

He was a red-faced man—redder than usual I thought from stooping—and very fond of talking. Mother, aunt Glengarrow, and the cook were expecting his operations with the skirts of their dresses held gingerly up from the damp floor.

"You see the place hasn't been long out of order," he said. "A gradual accumulation of filth might be the cause—"

"A gradual accumulation of filth in my house, indeed!" said mother.

"Or something might have thrown in bones or potato peelings."

"He threw tater skins in the bath-room!" gasped cook.

"Or some baby might hev lost off a stocking."

"What does the man think of me?" said Aunt Glengarrow. "Nothing is out of order. The day I was drowned I said so."

"Drowned, mum?" cried the man amazed.

"Nearly," said aunt. "Well, what now?"

"I've discovered nuthin," said the man, poking the pipe with vigor. "It is a stocking," he went on now," and out came with a tug a dingy wad of stuff in which might have once been gray, or blue, or even white.

"So it is," said mother.

"It is," said aunt. "It's paper."

The man had come forward with his prize, holding it between a thumb and finger. In the ball without a table and he had laid it down on the gathering around. Twisted by the pipe it was hard to tell what the bit of muslin had been, but the big flowers were still bold, and before me in a hundred horrible embodiments and mark of G. G.

"It's one of yours, aunt
